But a greater liberty at times betrays the poet into being obscure, facetious or double-faced. In the sonnet he is at least sincere, and often "with this key" he unlocks his heart of hearts. Elsewhere, he may give a freer rein to imagination; here, he looks truth in the face and speaks only when stirred.

Hence the sonnet has a high value in witnessing to universal truth. Our faith receives confirmation,—sometimes quite unexpectedly. Let us take an extreme case. There are two Christian testimonies, one minor and one major, which have long been familiar to the Quaker mind—the first, to a life outwardly simple; the second, to an inward life, spiritual and immortal. What Friend "guardedly educated" would think of having these testimonies confirmed by Shakespeare? But listen:

Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
Fooled by these rebel powers that thee array,
Why dost thou pine within and suffer death,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
Why so much cost, having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?
Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store;
Buy terms divine in selling hours of dross;
Within be fed, without be rich no more:
So shalt thou feed on death* that feeds on men,
And, death once dead, there's no more dying then.

On the high theme of immortality, we note the profound question asked through the gifted, though far less versatile, Blanco White:

Mysterious Night! When our first parent knew
Thee by divine report and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This gorgeous empy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus and all the host of heaven came,
And lo! creation wended to man's view.
Who could have dreamed such darkness lay concealed Beneath thy beams, O Sun, or who could find,
While leaf and fly and insect lay revealed,
That to such countless forms thou madest us blind?
Why do we then shun death with anxious strife?
If light can so deceive, wherefore not life?

"As bird and flower made plain of old the lesson of the Teacher," so now the Good Spirit sometimes uses common sights and sounds to bring home to the heart a timely truth. And Wordsworth writes:

One who was suffering tumult in his soul
Yet failed to seek the sure relief of prayer,
Went forth—his course surrendering to the care
Of the fierce wind, while mid-day lightnings growl
Insidiously, untimely thunders growl;
While trees, dim seen, in frenzied numbers tear
The lingering remnant of their yellow hair,
And shivering wolves, surprised with darkness, howl
As if the sun were not. He raised his eye
Soul-smitten; for that instant did appear
Large space (mid dreadful clouds) of purest sky,
An azure disc—shield of Tranquility;
Invisible, unlooked for, minister
Of providential goodness ever nigh!

Can any extreme of loneliness or depth of despair lie beyond the touch of Divine comfort? The Gospel answers: "My grace is sufficient." And Elizabeth Barrett Browning,

All are not taken; there are left behind
Living beloveds, tender looks to bring,
And make the daylight still a happy thing,
And tender voices, to make soft the wind.

*At the expense of death, as explained in the context.

But if it were not so—if I could find
No voice in all the world for comforting,
Nor any path but hollowly did ring,
Where "dust to dust" the love from life disjoined,
And if, before those sepulchres unmoving,
I stood alone (as some forsaken lamb Goes bleating up the moors in weary death),
Crying, "Where are ye, O my loved and loving?" . . .
I know a Voice would sound, "Daughter, I am.
Can I suffice for HEAVEN and not for earth?"

So do the sonnets console, confirm and instruct, and they do more. They have the power to beget their like from generation to generation in prepared soil. The inheritance of poet from poet may at times be traced. And thus the sonnets through the centuries, like a clear river, make their not inconsiderable contribution to the rising tide of revealed truth;—back-eddying at times and in places, yet rising;—"overcoming all that is of a nature contrary to itself," till the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea.

"EVERYLAND."

A MAGAZINE OF WORLD FRIENDSHIP.

The chief object of Everyland is to help us to get acquainted with our neighbors, with the hope that we may all be friends. We may not like all our neighbors equally well, but we shall find that they all have some good points. We may not always agree. Friends rarely agree on all points. But friends will not deliberately injure each other nor try to kill each other; on the contrary, they are in the main helpful and kind and show good-will toward each other. The finest expression of friendship is in what we call missions. A group of Japanese gentlemen visited America recently. The leader made a fine speech at a reception which the editor attended. He quoted the text—"Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends," and added: "That is what your missionaries have done for us in Japan." He spoke of the ways in which missionaries are helping in education and many forms of Christian service. Later he said, "My country has made mistakes, but she is trying to correct them. Be patient with her as she finds the way to righteousness." Every country makes mistakes for we are all imperfect, but if the boys and girls will find the way to righteousness, the future will be better than the past.

It is thus that Lucy W. Peabody, the editor of Everyland, introduces us to the issue of Third Month.

During the war it was discontinued, but with the return of better days, we are glad that Volume XII began anew its career.

The illustrations are mainly photographs. "The True Tale of Jade Flower," for instance, tells of a little girl's life in China. "Frances, an African Princess," is a strong presentation of Negro environment and uplift. "A Letter from a Boy of India," "Grandmother's Story Page" for very little ones, such are some of the articles.

"The Book Shop," too, is suggestive of worthwhile reading matter.

Our children welcome a magazine of their very own every month, and here is one we can recommend. Its address is M. H. Leavis, W. Medford, Massachusetts.

H. P. MORRIS.

"THE sun, which swings the earth around uniformly in its little orbit, carries it forward at the same time in the sweep of a stupendous cycle which is ruled by the mighty attraction of a great chief centre. In like manner the life which revolves unswervingly in the limited circle of obedience is borne onward in the cycle of an eternal progress."

"THE error of a second a day, may in the course of a voyage sink a ship."

THE NEW LEAF.

He came to my desk with a quivering lip,—

The lesson was done.

"Dear teacher, I want a new leaf," he said,

"I have spoiled this one."

In place of the leaf so stained and blotted,

I gave him a new one, all unspotted,

And into his sad eyes smiled,—

"Do better now, my child."

I went to the throne with a quivering soul,—

The old year was done.

"Dear Father, hast thou a new leaf for me?"

I have spoiled this one."

He took the old leaf, stained and blotted,

And gave me a new one all unspotted,

And into my sad heart smiled,—

"Do better now, my child."

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE, COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

When about nineteen years of age I had the pleasure of an equestrian journey to Pottsville, Mauch Chunk, etc., in company with my friend Morris Smith, a very intelligent and agreeable companion, somewhat older than myself. The country in those regions was then a wilderness. A few mines had been opened, but the demand for coal being very limited, they were almost neglected in the vicinity of the present Pottsville, then an obscure village, of which the tavern was the principal building. From Pottsville to Mauch Chunk we traveled by mountain paths, there being no regular roads. The population was almost entirely German, and very sparse. The English language was not used by them and we had difficulty in finding the right way. At Mauch Chunk, under the energetic superintendence of Josiah White, there was more mining done and by means of simple dams and chutes the coal was conveyed down the Lehigh to the Delaware in arks, made of planks, which on their arrival at Philadelphia were taken to pieces and sold for lumber. We visited the family of Josiah White who then resided there. He had a number of deer and elk in an enclosure which interested me. We returned to Philadelphia by way of Easton, Bristol, etc.

Another journey was made to Mauch Chunk in company with my uncle Isaac Cooper. At that time there was no improvement of the Lehigh River above that place. We went up through the dense forest to the spot called White Haven, where the logs were cut for the plank which formed the arks to float the coal to Philadelphia. It was a wild scene on the precipitous banks of the river. The logs were drawn to the summit and then planted in a chute down which they rushed hundreds of feet and went into the water with a fearful dive, dashing the spray high into the air. They were then collected into rafts and floated down the rocky channel of the river. Our principal object in going to White Haven was to descend the rapids on one of these rafts. In many places the channel was contracted between masses of rock and ran very swiftly. The raft was skillfully guided and we could frequently have touched the rock as we were speeding by with great velocity. Amid the grand scenery of nature, then undisturbed by dams, or the iron track of the railroad, this exciting trip was truly enjoyable.

Before passing entirely from the record of youthful days I would mention my skating on the ponds at Tenth and Arch Streets, my pleasant rambles through country scenes and large gardens on Arch Street above Broad which made Philadelphia look like "a green country town and wholesome," as William Penn would have had it.

Many localities even in the heart of the built city had a rural aspect in my boyish days, such as the Norris house and garden on Chestnut Street above Fourth Street (where the Custom House now stands), the Friends' Alms House on Walnut above Third, the Hospital Squares, open from Seventh Street to Tenth Street, between Spruce and Pine, and divers others.

Becoming more and more under the influence of serious impressions I was diligent in the attendance of our religious meetings, and about the twenty-first year of my age was appointed one of the committee to have some care over the boys in our meetings for worship. Thus commenced in a very simple way my service in the church. In my twenty-second year I entered into partnership with my cousin Caleb Cope in the silk and dry goods business and commenced an active career, my time and thoughts being greatly engrossed by it. About the same time I became acquainted with the family of Thomas Wistar, being invited by his son Caspar Wistar, M. D. to be a groomsmen at his wedding with my cousin Lydia Jones. Through this happy event, memorable to me, I became acquainted with his sister Sarah Wistar, and a warm friendship immediately commenced between us, uniting us so closely, that two years after she became my beloved wife, and faithful partner in the joys and trials of life.

We commenced housekeeping at the northwest corner of Filbert and Eleventh Streets, the day of our marriage, which was the eighth day of Sixth Month, 1828. We resided there one year, and then removed to 732 Arch Street where my dear daughter Margaret was born on the twenty-seventh day of the Eighth Month, 1831. It was about this time I took my first journey to assist Friends engaged in the ministry of the Gospel. This was with Dougan and Asenath Clarke from North Carolina, to the meetings of Pottstown, Exeter and Maiden Creek, which was to me an agreeable service.

Being chosen a manager of the Apprentices' Library I became much interested in the selection of books. My decided objection to novels still continuing, the subject of their introduction into the library was fully and freely discussed by the managers. There was much difference of opinion, but it was finally decided not to admit them. This conclusion was maintained for several years, but by resignation and otherwise the management was so altered that works of fiction were gradually admitted.

Becoming increasingly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of our religious society I thought it right to adopt the plain dress, which change involved no small conflict of mind, as at that time, in our large business, I was brought into close contact with many men from distant sections of our country who thought it very singular. The feelings accompanying this change led me to examine closely the propriety of being so largely engaged in business, especially as we dealt in many costly and showy things. On one occasion a customer from the West, who was struck by my change of dress, inquired of me the reason. I endeavored to explain to him the views of our religious society on the subject of non-conformity to the fashions of the world, of simplicity, moderation, etc. He listened with attention, and remarked that he did not see how I could, with such views, recommend some of the articles we dealt in for the use of others. This impressed me forcibly, and I desired earnestly to be rightly guided.

After mature deliberation I decided at the commencement of the year 1832, to retire from the extensive business in silks, etc., in which I had been engaged for six years, which had become very prosperous. But I had no ambition to gain great wealth, and felt that the responsibilities inseparable from large operations engrossed too much of my thoughts. Desiring, however, to occupy my time usefully I proposed to my Cousin Caleb to take charge of the counting-house concerns, until he could make a satisfactory arrangement.

My main desire in giving up active participation in trade was to make myself more useful in various ways to others. Feeling much interested in the welfare of the colored people I joined with other friends in promoting education among them, and became an active manager of several schools which afforded me satisfactory employment for a part of my time.

I was also appointed a member of the Overseers of the Public School chartered by William Penn, and treasurer of the Corporation, which office I held about thirty-six years.

A pleasing variety of employment I found in taking care of a garden and in botanical pursuits. In company with my brother-in-law, Caspar Wistar, M. D., I had delightful walks in the woods, and along the river banks, in search of the flowers of early spring, and occasionally with my cousin Alfred Cope to more distant spots for the beautiful rhododendron. When it was proposed to establish a Horticultural Society in Philadelphia, I attended the earliest meetings, and when organized became a manager and for several years held the office of treasurer. I was especially interested in arranging the floral exhibitions, which were truly beautiful, but not perhaps quite so artistic and competitive as those of modern dates.

The summer of 1832 is memorable as the one in which the cholera visited Philadelphia. We remained in the city most of the time and were mercifully preserved from the dreadful pestilence, though in some places the mortality was fearful, especially at the prison, then located at the southwest corner of Broad and Arch Streets.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN DENMARK THROUGH FORTY-FIVE YEARS.

Peter Gulbrandsen of Vejle, Denmark, is known personally to a few members of Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings. He has written as follows to the Editors and has sent us an interesting paper on Friends' in Denmark. In his letter of Fourth Month 20, he says:

"During a stay at Berlin in last month Caroline G. Norment, of the A. F. S. C., suggested that I should write something of Denmark to the Philadelphia FRIEND. I have now done so, and hope you will peruse my article and make the corrections thee thinks necessary for publication. "I am a regular reader of THE FRIEND, which is sent to my mother's address weekly. I am proud of reading this journal. "With love and best wishes for the work of Friends in Philadelphia.

"Your Friend, sincerely,

"PETER GULBRANDSEN, Journalist.

The Society of Friends in Denmark is small in number. There are sixty and seventy Friends in Denmark when the children are included. The group of Friends dates back to 1877-78, when English Friends visited Denmark and established meetings at different places. There are still a few old Danish Friends living of those who were convinced of the Truth through the message of the English visitors. In the past forty-five years' activity of Danish Friends, the Society has not been taking an outward conspicuous part in the affairs of Denmark. Yet the influence of the Society has left its mark and the work which has been done has not been in vain. Several of the younger men of the Society have been conscientious objectors to military service, (conscription) and some have been imprisoned for this reason. Others have emigrated in order to avoid conscription and a number of these have settled in the United States. Some of the members have taken a firm stand in the struggle for the abolition of the oath. In many cases the oath has been compulsory; for instance, in the court or when entering into an official position in the service of the state. As a tangible result of a Friend standing for his principle, the oath has in one particular instance been done away with.

In the earlier years of the life of the Society in Denmark Friends established a boarding school at Vejle. This was kept going for some few years with the financial support of English Friends. But after a brief but fruitful existence, the school was closed—never to open again. Of other kinds of educational work mention should be made of the attempt of Friends to co-operate with non-conformists at one or two places in educating their children in elementary day-schools independent of the curriculum imposed on the public schools by the state.

It was from the ranks of Friends the Danish temperance movement gained some of its leaders in the early '80's, when the movement was still new and unpopular. Friends took an active and sometimes a prominent part in the work, and some of the older and younger Friends are still actively engaged in temperance work. When the number of Friends in Denmark was more numerous than now, Monthly and Quarterly Meetings were held regularly in the different towns where regular meetings for worship were established. In the years 1809-1900 Friends also issued a small monthly paper, The Friendly Messenger. Since the foundation of the Society English Friends have frequently visited Denmark and attended our annual meeting, which is now the only occasion on which a number of Danish Friends meet. The link between London Yearly Meeting and the annual meeting of Danish Friends has been unbroken through the forty-five years. It is still our chief channel of intercourse with the Society of Friends at large. Also Friends from the United States have visited Denmark with certificates from their Yearly Meetings. In 1907 Wm. C. Allen with his wife and daughter attended our Yearly Meeting, and in 1910 Franklin and Mary M. Meredith, from Indiana Yearly Meeting, were our visitors. Walter Morice and his wife, Louisa M., of Northampton, England, had a true concern for the Danish Friends and they spent several years of their life in Denmark and learned to speak Danish. Through the aid of Walter Morice, a good deal of Friends' literature was translated into Danish and distributed all over the country. It was a great loss to the Danish Friends when Walter Morice died in Norway, in 1908. The late Joseph G. Alexander, of Tunbridge Wells, England, his brother, Samuel G. and the late John Green, of Ireland, and Isaac Sharp were also among the English Friends, who frequently visited Denmark. Max I. Reich was with us in 1914, and in 1920 Effie McAfee from New York visited Friends in Vejle and Copenhagen.

Today the Society of Friends in Denmark is "in ruins" as an old English Friend, Alfred Kemp Brown, said by way of illustration in Vejle in Seventh Month, 1921. There is some truth in this statement, although the whole truth is not in it. We have no public meetings for worship. There are only two small regular meetings in the whole country held in the homes of Friends. There are no regular Monthly Meetings or Quarterly Meetings, as Friends are scattered all over the country. But we have our annual meeting each year on the third First-day in Seventh Month. And we have a "group conscientiousness." Four or five of our young members have been students at Woodbrooke Settlement, England. Altogether between forty and fifty people in Denmark have been either at Woodbrooke or Fircroft, in England, and the international High School, which we now have in Denmark, is an outcome of Woodbrooke and Fircroft. Although this school is not run by Friends, the staff is very much in sympathy with Friends' views and way of life. Thus the outward building of the Society of Friends in Denmark may seem to lie in ruins, but the spirit of life is not dead amongst us. We feel and know we are a link in the great chain of Friends all over the world. But we wish to feel it more keenly. Therefore we are hoping to have established in Copenhagen a Quaker-centre to link up with the Quaker-centres already existing in Paris and Berlin. At present we are looking forward to a two days' conference to be held in Copenhagen on the seventeenth and eighteenth of Seventh Month, immediately after our Yearly Meeting. We hope that one or two members of the American Friends' Service Committee in Berlin will be present. Probably Francis R. Bacon and his wife will be coming. We are also expecting one or two German Friends to this conference and one or two Friends from England. We hope these Friends will give us a stimulating and interesting account of the wider work of Friends. We feel that now the international work of Friends requires the sincere co-operation of all Friends, and of each individual member irrespective of nationality. Remember we are all Friends. Our nationality and our color and our language are altogether secondary. In the Spirit we are all one body.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

The importance attached to the niceties of expression is well illustrated by the discussion which came up when the marriage rules were under review. The Marriage Declaration, which is very similar to our own, revealed the fact that many young people, both Friends and non-Friends, object to using the words "until it shall please the Lord by death to separate us." Some think that separation by death does not always "please the Lord." Others also hold that death does not separate except in a physical sense. A definite ruling as to whether the exact words stated in the Book of Discipline must be adhered to was asked for. Some Friends considered that a variation of the exact words was provided for in the regulation that the declaration was to be "to the following effect." It was suggested that the Meeting for Sufferings should decide the matter. Some objected to this on the ground that any change in the regulations was really a legal matter and should have the sanction of the Yearly Meeting. It was, however, agreed that there would be no objection to the Meeting for Sufferings advising our Registering Officers on the point, and eventually the Meeting for Sufferings was asked to look into the matter, and if they thought any change should be made in the regulations they are to report to Yearly Meeting accordingly.

At a special meeting set apart for Overseers about one hundred and twenty Friends were in attendance. The subject for consideration was that of the duty of Overseers in helping parents to a right presentation to their children of the facts of birth and reproduction. Constance M. Crosland, as Clerk, explained how the meeting was being held under the special benediction of Richard Swain, who was a member of the small committee appointed last year to arrange for this year's meeting, and who only a week before his death had said "how glad he was that this subject had been fixed upon for the 1922 meeting.

Charles I. Evans began his address by the questions, Must the knowledge of sex questions be imparted to children and can it be done? The answer to both is in the affirmative, but the right time must be watched for. There is evidence of the great ignorance on these matters still existing, and of the view still widely prevalent that children and young people can be left to learn the facts of life from school companions rather than being told in a natural way by their parents. A useful list of books was given to each person present at the meeting as well as a copy of C. I. Evans's own pamphlet Concerning Sex, and Overseers were asked, on their return home, to report to their fellow Overseers the concern of the meeting, with a view to seeing how they can do what is needed in their local meetings. In the discussion which followed the fact was mentioned that most of the books on the list were on loan from the library of the Children's section of the Central Education Committee.

The time spent on Finance seemed to show that the machinery is in some respects ill adapted to its ends, and that there is much to be learned in the way of sharing broadly financial burdens. Friends are not, as a rule, trained to give, and doubtless our frequent dependence upon a few large subscribers is in part responsible for it. There was an obvious reluctance to discuss the question of private expenditure and its relation to social and public needs. Frankness about the disposal of private resources is a severe test of consistency in the application of one's theories about the Kingdom of God on earth. It is a difficult subject, in which neither rich nor poor seem yet anxious to embark upon a common search for the right way.

The real implications of our Peace testimony were unmistakably presented by William E. Wilson. The present need for this testimony in every direction was spoken to by many Friends, who appealed for more help from young and old in applying it to politics, industry, education, work in Europe and the East, and in private life. Many are still suffering from war and are feeling out in their weariness for a better way. Can we show it?

Among strangers in attendance at the Yearly Meeting, with and without credentials, were Parker James, from Indiana; George G. and Anna R. Williams, from California; Edward M. and Margaret C. Wistar, Francis R. Bacon and Charles F. Jenkins, from Philadelphia, and Edwin Ashby, from Australia.

An interesting item was the report by Elizabeth B. Emmott, of her recent visit to America, including her attendance at the Baltimore Conference and at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Of the former she said: "Altogether it was felt that the celebration had served its purpose; it had helped to give the Quaker message greater publicity in the city and among other communities. The letter to Baltimore from London Yearly Meeting was much appreciated."

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting also had charged her with a verbal message of love and fellowship to London Yearly Meeting. There was hardly any meeting in Philadelphia which had not, adjacent to it, a Friends' Day School. Elizabeth B. Emmott stated her conviction that the Friends of Philadelphia were earnest and full of life and zeal. Now that they had to some extent emerged from their isolation, it seemed clear that they were going to be a tremendous force in the Quakerism of America. She hoped we should see our way to send a special Epistle to Philadelphia this year.

Robert Wallis, from Philadelphia, said their recent meeting had been a wonderful experience, due he believed, to a great extent, to the help that the English visitors had given.

W. Blair Neatby hoped we might come into a very much closer relationship with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

A helpful discussion followed as to the real significance of Epistolary correspondence, views were expressed which would be novel to Philadelphia Friends who for more than a generation have been out of touch with this ancient Quaker custom. There was some variety of views as to whether a special Epistle should be sent to Philadelphia or whether a general letter to all Friends in America should be sent, with a covering letter to individual meetings. An American Friend, in view of the movement for unity in America, hoped that one letter would be sent to all American Friends.

On the suggestion that the General Epistle be sent, as last year, the Meeting for Sufferings being asked to prepare a covering letter, having regard to the special conditions of each meeting, J. W. Harvey Theobald said that in his own experience he had noticed that the covering letter with the Epistle was often more interesting to the recipients than the Epistle itself.

It was finally agreed that the Meeting for Sufferings be asked to draw up appropriate covering letters to accompany the General Epistle to all the American Meetings.

This further exchange of ideas should increase our interest in the general Epistle published in this issue.

When the subject of religious education was under consideration these six weighty considerations were before the meeting: (1) That the religious education in the home is urgently in need of help. (2) That a revival of family worship would contribute greatly to the spiritual life of homes and the Society, and so open the way to more effective work in our Schools. (3) That small and isolated meetings cannot do the needed educational work without substantial and regular aid. (4) That while much good work is being done for younger children in First-day classes, the teaching should be made more systematic, and there is no adequate attempt being made to meet the needs of the boys and girls of school age who are not at our boarding schools. (5) That for the religious education of young people and also of older Friends (who often need it more), there is the two-fold necessity of meeting a frequent and earnest demand, and of rousing Friends from indifference and apathy. (6) That the call is both for increased opportunities for enlightened Bible Study, and for other and wider avenues of approach to the comprehensive problem of the spiritual life through history; Christian and heroic biography, religious movements and modern experience amidst the difficulties of personal and social life."

A Friend stated that "among Friends as amongst other bodies of Christians, there was a movement towards recognition of true religion," and of the fact that we could not afford to restrict any of the avenues toward God. Might Friends realize that as a Society it was incumbent upon us to help one another to a greater insight and to a truer conviction, knowing that the outward life springs from the inward.

Robert Davis spoke of the need for clear thinking, with accurate knowledge and systematic study, a need which is much greater than the demand for these things. We had really two tasks before us, on the one hand, to meet an existing demand, and on the other, to create a demand that does not exist.

The neglect of family worship was a subject which occupied the meeting for some considerable time, and many Friends spoke on this important side of religious life; it was pointed out that the custom of family worship appeared to have been discontinued by many Friends.

"The religious education of our members is a matter of immense importance. We live today in an atmosphere of intellectual unrest. Many of our own members are unsettled in mind and are seeking for light. Much of our ministry suffers from a lack of knowledge and intellectual training. The Society must, therefore, produce enlightened as well as inspired leaders, and a ministry that is in contact with modern life and thought. No amount of knowledge or training will make up for absence of spiritual life and concern for the ministry and we must avoid the danger of emphasizing education at the expense of the spiritual life. We need both. It is not only for the building up of our own Society that this better equipment is needed. We have a message to proclaim and we need more and better messengers—men and women with the knowledge and ability to expound the Quaker faith and its implications. In addition, many lines of service are open to Friends at the present time. Adult Schools, Children's Schools, Quaker Embassies, Extension Committees, Education Settlements are all crying out for workers. These movements are seeking to adapt their methods to the changing conditions of our time. They deserve the best we can give."

NEAR EAST RELIEF REPORTS TO CONGRESS.

As Near East Relief operates under charter from the United States Congress it is the duty of its secretary to make an annual report to that body. The report for the past year, recently submitted, accounts for disbursements of a total of more than $50,000,000 since the organization was formed in 1915, in addition to the large contribution made by one individual toward the expenses of administering this great relief undertaking. The amount also includes flour to the value of $12,800,000 secured through the United States Grain Corporation and American Relief Administration, but disbursed through the agency of Near East Relief.

The bringing together of this large sum of money for relief work has been made possible through the contributions of approximately 20,000 individuals. More than a thousand American citizens have been engaged in relief operations in the Near East, of whom 230 are at present residing in the various relief centres in Armenia, Georgia, Turkey, Syria and Palestine. Many of these American workers are volunteers, giving their services either without financial consideration or on a minimum maintenance basis.

They include physicians, surgeons, nurses, mechanics, industrial experts, agriculturists, teachers, engineers, orphanage experts, supply, transportation and general relief workers. They care for more than 100,000 orphans, giving them such opportunities for school work as is possible with the handicap of practically no facilities or equipment. They also train them in various lines of agricultural and industrial work in order that these children may be able to earn a livelihood when they become old enough to be dismissed from the orphanages. Some industrial work is carried on for the purpose of giving self-supporting employment to war-widows who are endeavoring to make new homes and keep their children together.

There are at least 1,000,000 people, chiefly Armenians, living to-day who would have perished had it not been for American relief.

Near East Relief maintains thirty-eight hospitals besides fifty-nine clinics. Forty nurses with their native assistants supervise the sanitary work and care for the health of the orphans and refugees of these famine and politically disturbed areas. Special hospitals have been established for the treatment of tuberculosis and of trachoma, that dread disease of the East which is the cause of so much blindness. The results of the treatment of this disease, as well as the campaign for its prevention, have produced most satisfactory results.

In the Russian Caucasus the government has allocated to Near East Relief 17,600 acres of agricultural and grazing land which will be used in developing an increasing measure of self-support among the people as well as furnishing agricultural and industrial training for the orphans of that section.

There can be no question that the money now being used to save the lives of children and to train them will, like any investment in childhood and education, richly bless the world, strengthening international good-will for decades and centuries to come.

General Secretary.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE PATRIOTIC TWINS.—The last term of the school year closed a little later than usual, so that the twins did not bring home their books until the day before the Fourth. Then they rushed upstairs to mamma's room, full of excitement.

"Teacher says we ought to be 'specially patriotic,' Norman began, "cause our birthday comes the Fourth of July."

"And I'm afraid we can't be 'specially on just one bunch of firecrackers piece," Norman hurried to say.

"Why," smiled mamma, "your teacher didn't say that being patriotic depended on the number of firecrackers you popped, did she?"

"N—no, I guess she didn't," answered Norman, thoughtfully; "but what other way could we be patriotic, mamma?"

"Oh, a great many ways!" declared mamma. "A real patriot is one who loves his country very dearly, and who always looks out for its interests."

"We'll talk about it more another time," mamma said. "There she is coming up the walk." Run to the door, Norman, and tell her I'll be right down."

The next morning the twins went to the post office to get the mail. When they came back they were talking earnestly over a letter.

"Oh, mamma," cried Norma, "here's a postage stamp that isn't marked at all, and Billy Waterman says we can steam it off and use it over again."

"Just see, it's perfectly red all 'over!' and Norma handed out the letter.

"Yes," said mamma, "somebody neglected to do his duty. I'm afraid if he is careless like this very often the Government will lose a deal through him."

"How?" queried Norman.

"Why, for instance, what if this were Billy Waterman's letter, instead of mine—what would he do?"

"Take the stamp off and use it on another letter," answered Norman. "He said nobody'd ever know it."

"And so he would cheat the Government out of two cents, and suppose there should be a thousand letters, going to all parts of the country, that had uncanceled stamps upon, like this—if all the owners of the letters were of Billy's opinion, the Government would carry two thousand letters for the price of one thousand, and would lose forty dollars."

"Oh, my!" said Norman.

"Why—e!" exclaimed Norma.

"It wouldn't be honest to use it again, would it?" asked Norman, fingering the stamp.

"Not a bit honest," smiled mamma. "Probably Billy didn't think of that; a good many people don't; but a true patriot would think of it, because, you remember, a patriot must look out for the interests of his country."

"And so that's one way we can be patriotic," said Norma, "by not using this stamp on another letter."

"Truly it is," answered mamma, "and I'll put a mark on it so that nobody can ever use it." She took her pen, and made a cross on the stamp.

"Oh, let's keep it forever," cried Norma, "and it will remind us of the first time we were pa-tri-ot-ic!"

"Yes, let's," replied Norman.—From The African's Friend.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

CHRISTIANITY FOR A WARLESS WORLD.—The Peace letter to the Christian Churches, adopted by our Yearly Meeting and also by the Race Street Yearly Meeting this spring, has been warmly received by the Church Peace Union in New York City and its Trustees appointed an Editorial Committee, consisting of Hamilton Holt and two others, to assist in its distribution. The Trustees expressed the feeling that the churches in various parts of the country have been waiting for some organization to take the lead in calling Christendom back to the true Christian position on war and they considered this to be one of the most important movements that had come before them for a long time.

Twenty thousand copies of this letter are being sent to as many Christian bodies and individual clergymen, and it is hoped that this will help to arouse church leaders to their opportunity to work effectively against war.

TO THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN ALL COUNTRIES

An Appeal from the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings of the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers).

FELLOW CHRISTIANS AND SISTER CHURCHES OF ALL LANDS:—

The small fraction of the Christian Church which ventures to address this appeal to you, does so in a spirit of fervent hope that we may give our united strength whole-heartedly to uphold and advance the standards of peace which some followers of Christ have long cherished as a fundamental Christian principle.

Christianity seems to us to face a grave crisis and a divine duty. In this aftermath of history's most terrible war, we see two paths before us. One leads inevitably to another war by renewed preparedness of the most efficient military, economic, educational and religious means of waging it. The other begins with a complete rejection of war, and of all preparations for it, for any purpose and against any people; it demands definite organization for peace.

These two paths lie in opposite directions; we cannot possibly follow them both. There is no shadow of doubt on which of them are found the footprints and the sign-posts of Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ would not send His disciples where He Himself does not lead. "Follow me" has been forever His watchword. Shall not then the Christian Church follow its Leader with perfect loyalty along this path?

Such loyalty to Christ is consistent to one's native land. The higher loyalty includes the lower, and gives to it all its best and brightest substance. The Christian's love of country finds its source, its inspiration and its direction in his love of God and his fellow-men. Christ taught the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; His church transcends all divisions of nationality, all prejudices and hatred of nation for nation and of class for class. It must rise to the heights of its divinely given mission. It must not depend on the leadership of generals or admirals, or financiers; nor await the changing policies of statecraft, and must draw constantly its Founder's immortal and stupendous contrast between that which is Caesar's and that which is God's.

As Christians, we are striving for "a warless world." We are firmly convinced that this can be achieved only by refusal to participate in war, simply and sufficiently because war is by its very nature at variance with the message, the spirit, and the life and death of Jesus Christ. We unite in supporting treaties of arbitration and conciliation, limitation and reduction of armaments, international courts of justice, a league or association of nations for the preservation of peace. This is well; it is a great achievement for statesmen to accomplish these things; but it is not sufficient for the Christian Church.

A principle is greater than any or all of its applications. The fundamental peace principle of Christianity demands the utter rejection of war, unequivocally and without compromise. With this principle in its charter the Christian Church can always utter a clear and unmistakable verdict on any specific measure of statesmanship that is proposed; it will not be misled or coerced, by argument or by force, into participating in any kind or degree of preparation for war, or into lending the sanction of Christianity to the waging of any war whatsoever.

The achievement of all the great moral reforms in history has awaited the development of a deep religious conviction in the hearts of the people. Vital, uncompromising Christianity when applied to great moral issues, has never failed to bring the Kingdom of Heaven on earth another step nearer to realization.

The most pressing reform of our time is to abolish war, and to establish exclusively peaceful means of settling disputes and promoting co-operation among the nations. These peaceful means cannot prevail until the nations beat their swords into plowshares and learn war no more. To accomplish these results the Christian Church in practice and profession must condemn the whole system of war unequivocally and finally, relying not upon armed preparedness, but upon the awakened conscience of mankind.

Fellow Christians, we can scarcely exaggerate the loss and suffering of the Great War. There is a bitter Macedonian cry in our afflicted time for physical help and healing, but far more for the things of the Spirit—for faith, and hope and love. What greater message of cheer and reconstruction could be brought to mankind today than the assurance that all who bear the name of Christ in every land have solemnly resolved to have no part in war or in preparation for war, but henceforth to work unitedly for peace by peaceful means alone? Shall we not make this venture of faith together in the love that beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things and that never fails? Shall the torch of spiritual heroism be borne by the Church of the living Christ, or shall leadership in the utter rejection of war pass from our hands to men of braver and truer spirit? Which Master shall we who call ourselves Christians be known by all the world to serve, the God of Battles or the Prince of Peace?

With love and greetings to you all, we are your sincere friends.

Here follow the signatures of the Clerks.

PEACE ESSAYS IN FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.—One hundred and seven essays on various aspects of the Peace question were written by boys and girls in the Friends' Schools and forwarded to the Peace Committee last month. Pupils and teachers alike worked faithfully over the subject and the results were decidedly worth while.

Awards of books were made for the best essay in each grade and "Honorable Mention" was given by the judges to the second-best essay.

The following is a list of those securing first place, and also of those who received Honorable Mention, in the various grades. Third Grade—Chapman Brown, Downingtown School, "What Our School Can Do For Peace"; Honorable Mention, Barbara Canby, Downingtown School.

Fourth Grade—George B. Allen, Jr., Media School, "What War Means to a Nation"; Honorable Mention, William Erskine, Atlantic City School.

Fifth Grade—George Smith, Atlantic City School, "Peace"; Honorable Mention, Ruth A. Herzberg, Lansdowne School.

Sixth Grade—Dorothy Hoyle, Haddonfield School, "Disarmament"; Honorable Mention, Margaret Garrett, Lansdowne School.

Seventh Grade—Dorothy Greenig, Haddonfield School, "What Friendship Means"; Honorable Mention, George A. Webster, Atlantic City School.

Eighth Grade—Elizabeth Barton, Moorestown School, "What Disarmament Would Mean to the World"; Honorable Mention, Phoebe Ballinger, Haddonfield School.

DR. HENRY T. HODGKIN, speaking in Tokyo recently on the subject "Must There be Another War?" said in part: "The way to have peace is to prepare for peace.

"Wars come out of policies, policies are made by Governments, and Governments are made and ultimately yield to public opinion, so that it should be possible for the mass of reasonable men to achieve peace. To accomplish anything in this direction we must set our whole lives to a new tune—not that war is necessary, but that the world may get along without war. If we don't get rid of war, war will get rid of us."

The speaker then proceeded to give some practical suggestions for working toward the end of ending war. He urged the following definite and concrete plans:

"First—Let us concentrate our thoughts upon the realities of war, and picture what the next war—if one should come—would be like. Everybody should read those two books by Sir Philip Gibbs. They should be translated into every language, and then we should all read Will Irwin's "The Next War." Thus we may be able to picture the absolute destructiveness and waste of the Great War, and the more horrible truth that another war would mean.

"Second—We should devise a means to deal with international disputes. Something more than an international tribunal is needed. Conference methods should be extended and perfected until it will be that every government that refuses to use such methods will stand condemned before all the world.

"Third—We must cultivate the idea of interdependence of all the nations. Something is needed that will stir the imagination of all the world along the line of world unity. Before the war there were registered at Brussels more than 400 societies of an international membership. Such facts must be made to stand out. The League of Nations must do more than establish courts, it must make the idea live that each nation needs every other nation.

"Fourth—Let us have education of an international sort. If the child is taught to think of history in terms of battles, to believe that all the other nations have been sinners, he will surely grow to manhood with a narrow patriotism. The truest patriot is the man who gives the best service to the whole world. Therefore let us have a text-book of international history, such as Wells', though I do not mean to say his is perfect, a history that will carry the idea of the brotherhood and the essential unity of all the peoples.

"Fifth—A program of disarmament and a Ministry of Peace are needed. The Conference was a step in the right direction. All the nations stand in great economic need of disarmament. And can't we devote a part of what may be saved from the limitation of armaments to the establishment of a Ministry of Peace in our respective governments? If one-hundredth part of the wealth and efforts that went into the Great War should be devoted to bringing about peace, peace would soon come.

"Sixth—Let us have open discussion of all international questions. The Washington Conference gave an opportunity for public opinion to be brought to bear on the weightiest problems. It was the beginning of a new era of diplomacy. Let us appeal to the idealism and the best in men, and thus we shall bring out the best that is in them.

"Seventh—Constant and most earnest study is needed of the questions that lead to war, questions of immigration and shifting populations, for instance. Such questions are not to be settled at the point of the sword. They require the deepest research.

"And, lastly, in every nation we need a body of men and women pledged to refrain from fighting, even to be ready to die for their ideal if necessary. Such persons may be called freaks and fools, but it is reward enough for these to know that they have had the dream of brotherhood and helped to make it come true, though others called it madness."

JAPAN NOTES.

At the meeting of the executive board of the Foreign Missionary Association on Sixth Month 9th, Margaret James was present. She is to sail with Dr. Cadbury and his family on the China from San Francisco, early in the Eighth Month.

It had been expected that Dr. William Pearson would travel with the Binfords, who sailed on the China on Fifth Month 30th, but it was now announced that he had been detained, and no date for his sailing was yet set.

A letter from Gilbert Bowles giving the status of the building operations was read. The several severe earthquake shocks did no damage of any importance. Completion of the work on the school building by the end of Fifth Month was expected. Work on the meeting-house is progressing. The timbers for this building are prepared in Hiroasaki, near the northern end of the main island. The work will probably be finished early in the fall. Money to excavate and wall the basement of the new meeting-house has all been raised in Japan, mostly in small amounts, the total being in excess of three thousand yen.

The old meeting-house has been moved off the lot and will be converted into the new "institute" by extensive changes which will convert it into a two-story building. The two-story building which has been attached to the meeting-house as it was, has been moved entirely away, being placed at the new entrance to the school grounds as a home for the janitor and his wife.

It is expected that the work on the dwelling for Thomas and Esther Jones will begin before the end of Sixth Month. The contract for the dormitory had not yet been let.

At the time that the mission acquired title to the property in Mito, the only organization properly qualified to hold such title was the girls' school, at Tokyo. The present fresh investments in school buildings make it possible to effect legal transfer of the Binford house in Mito to the trustees of the Society of Friends in Japan, "Christo Yukwai Shadan." The meeting-house property has also been transferred for Hijirizaka Monthly Meeting to the same trustees.

Harold Lane and Pauline Rowland Sistare were married at the Bowles residence on Fifth Month 16th, in a small meeting held by authority of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

THE CONFERENCE AT SOROCHINSKOYE.

The monthly conference of the American Friends' Unit was held at Sorochinskye Fifth Month 22-23. The reports were heard from every district; all showed the first real improvement in the condition of the people since the work was begun last Ninth Month. Rains had been abundant, which made the crop prospects good even though the acreage planted was small. According to statistics, which Beulah Hurley secured in Moscow, only about 12 per cent. of the normal planting had been done in the famine area and about 25 per cent. of the population had died.

Anna Herker reported that the people in District No. 8 were fairly optimistic. Though the horses numbered about one-third of the total last summer and some of the seed wheat had to be eaten, the people were hoping to struggle through next winter. For District No. 5 Nancy Babb reported that practically everybody was now receiving some food, for grass and marmots were to be had in addition to relief supplies. Also, garden seeds received from America were distributed in one hour from the warehouse at Totskoe. The unprecedentedly high death-rate of Fourth Month was largely due to the fact that the people were so hungry that they ate the raw corn without grinding or cooking. About 10 per cent. of the normal acreage had been planted in this district. Beulah Hurley and Dr. Elliott had been visiting outlying villages and Children's Homes in District No. 3. The population of one village last year was 2,500. It was now reduced to 1,000. The people would need help next winter.

Jessica Smith had been on an inspection tour with a government official. It was planned to move all the Children's Homes to one place where there were 350 acres of land. In the present Homes there was no way of isolating the sick children. It would also be much easier to equip a central school. The plan seemed desirable, because with the Homes widely scattered it was a difficult problem to look after them properly.

Edna Morris reported on the distribution of clothing during Fourth and Fifth Months. Fifty-seven boxes from Philadelphia and some A. R. A. supplies had been distributed. A sewing-room had been established and adult clothing was being made over into children's garments for the children in the Homes of the district. There were 12 women and 10 hand-power sewing-machines to do this work. Every request emphasized the need for quantities of sheets and blankets, and sacks for mattresses. Home No. 46 was the only Home fairly well supplied with sheets. The Commune had raw material out of which linen sheets had been made. There was much need for wash clothing since the people had begun working in the fields.

Reports on Children's Homes showed some tendency for relatives to take the children out of the Homes whenever it was possible to do so. Fifteen is the age-limit for children; but all the workers felt that those above this age could not be turned out, as most of them had no place to go. They could help in taking care of the younger children and in working in the gardens.

Requests from the various volosts for tractor plowing were more numerous than could be met, even though the tractors were running 24 hours a day. It was agreed that the three tractors should go to one place at one time because of the difficulty of transporting fuel and making necessary arrangements for plowing, and that it would be best to have the plowing done at one place in each district in a large tract, rather than to try to plow a large number of small tracts, and that the plowing must be done for groups and not for individuals. It was decided that it would be best to consult with the Agricultural Department in Buzuluk and see what suggestions they had to offer; then each district could take up the matter and decide where the plowing should be done. There is great need in the whole American Section for tractor plowing on account of the scarcity of horses and cattle.

Dr. Elliott reported a very meager amount of medical supplies on hand. The need for medicines to combat dysentery and cholera was very great. A conference of directors of Children's Homes was suggested for the purpose of giving them some helpful advice regarding the prevention of disease.

Homer Morris reported further upon the improvement in conditions throughout the district. This was due in the first place to the larger number and the larger ration that had been fed during Fifth Month, and also to the fact that the people had been able to supplement the ration with early vegetables, fish and marmots. It was expected that the children would soon begin to gain in weight. He stated: "Within the past three weeks we have had three good rains, so that the fields are all green and the wheat looks very good. In so far as seedling has been possible, the present prospects are bright for a good crop. Of course, it is too early to predict what the harvest will actually be in this district. In a good many places they were not able to seed enough ground to carry them over next winter even with a good crop. This is due to the shortage of horses, the difficulty or inability to get seeds, and in some cases to the fact that the seeds were eaten and the people were too weak to prepare the ground."

Most of the relief work has necessarily been along emergency lines; but after the harvest the situation will be somewhat different. With a smaller percentage actually needing food it was suggested that a constructive program be started. Agricultural demonstration with tractors might be carried on with good results. Nancy Babb suggested that clothing be given in payment for work. Sheets for hospitals and Children's Homes could be secured by having women spin flax for this purpose. It was suggested that so far as possible food next winter should be given in return for work. If this plan could be carried out, it would encourage home industries in addition to feeding the needy people. Almost every Russian peasant's cottage contains a spinning-wheel; and the clothing for the families could well be made in the homes.

MILK FOR VIENNA BABIES.

The business of being a baby, though extra-hazardous in all lands, has some additional hazards in Vienna. In Sixth Month the government established free trade in milk and at once the price soared. Since 1918, the price and distribution had been controlled in the interest of the city's babies. Now they had to compete in a free market with adults whose bidding for the delicacy so long denied them pushed the price skyward. At once the purchases by women with little babies fell off. What was to be done? The only remedy seemed that to which Vienna has had continual recourse in recent years—charity both public and private. The government issued tickets entitling the holders to obtain milk at reduced prices; the Mission did likewise. But charity does not increase the milk supply nor control economic conditions. The krone continues to fall, prices continue to rise. Meanwhile the Viennese babies go without fresh milk.

The problem has not been without its complications for producers and distributors. Many meetings were held trying to decide upon a price which altered at each meeting. The price was finally fixed at 510 kronen a litre wholesale. It was believed that at this price a greater supply would come into Vienna, since it approached the cost of production. At present the farmers have green fodder, but unless rain comes soon the main hay crop will fail as well as the turnip crop, and if one is to believe the farmers, the outlook for next autumn is not hopeful.

The Mission at present is receiving approximately 4,000 to 5,000 litres of milk daily at its centres. This is in the main repayment for cows, oilcake and hay. Arrangements had been made to have all this milk bottled, so as to obviate the need for pasteurization. Just as the plan was getting started and only bottled milk was being received at all centres, the "liberation" of milk took place. The fluctuation in price was so harassing to everybody that the Mission did not feel justified in pressing the matter of bottling which would add 34 per cent. to the price. By the end of Sixth Month, they will be able to judge whether the extra price can be paid. But in the meantime everything possible is being done to ensure clean milk.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Sixth Month 24, 1922—58 boxes and packages; 7 anonymous.

Contributions received during week ending Sixth Month 26, 1922—$15,762.06.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

The gigantic task entered upon by Albert Cook Myers, many years ago, to collect and edit the complete writings of William Penn, is now virtually completed. At the rooms of the Pennsylvania Historical Society in Philadelphia, he has collected a great mass of information concerning the great Founder. This has been assembled at a great outlay of time, labor and money, made possible through the untiring efforts of A. C. M. and generous friends.

The time would seem propitious for the publishing of this great work, which will embrace many volumes. Thomas A. Jenkins, of Chicago, writes in an Exchange before us on this topic and closes his paper thus:

In view of the immense importance of Penn's personality to the world, in view of the place which he holds in the American consciousness and in the hearts of the thinking people of Pennsylvania, it is unbelievable that this project to write of William Penn "more fully than has been done of any other Englishman" (as Sir Sidney Lee has said of Albert Cook Myers' work) should now suffer detriment or delay because of lack of financial or other support. The Sesqui-centennial of 1926 would be the right and fitting moment for the work to appear from the press. May all those to whom Penn is more than a mere name, to whom it seems important to keep alive the words and deeds of a moral hero, to whom the present miseries of the world are a burden, may all such rally now to the support and encouragement of this great and unique undertaking. Penn's was an upright, valiant and helpful spirit, and such are cruelly needed today.

THOMAS A. JENKINS.

A RICHMOND, Indiana, correspondent, has sent us the following for publication:—

In conferring the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws upon Timothy Nicholson at Earlham Commencement, the following statement was issued: "Because of distinguished service rendered to the state and nation in connection with educational, civic and philanthropic activities of more than usual significance, and because of an unusual record for service in the Society of Friends and in Earlham College, having served in very responsible positions as a member of the board of trustees for forty-nine years and as a member of the endowment investment for thirty years, the committee on advanced degrees recommends to the faculty that the honorary degree of doctor of laws be conferred upon Timothy Nicholson by Earlham College at the annual commencement exercises, Sixth Month 7, 1922."

FRIENDS will be glad to hear that Arthur Watts, whose illness in Russia has continued so long, is reported to be progressing favorably. He has been seriously ill and the lung is not yet cleared after pneumonia, but progress is now satisfactory.

A NOVEL feature during London Yearly Meeting week was the issue, by the Central Literature Council and the Bookshop, of a Daily Programme and Book Bulletin. Each day had a separate color, and the books announced were arranged according to the topics before the meeting or at auxiliary meetings. Thus the Bulletin for one day gave details of "New Helpful Books on Today's Problems" and another day on "International and Industrial Peace." These Programmes and Bulletins were distributed freely and seemed to be much appreciated. There was also a book talk one afternoon by H. W. Peet.

HELPING THE WORLD TO RIGHT ITSELF.

We must have been impressed last winter by the deference paid to public opinion by the Disarmament Conference in Washington. "The voice of the people", we are inclined to think, has never before been so studiously sought nor so anxiously followed on any great moral question. Experts were discomfited, old theories were thrown to the winds, temporarily at least, because of this "voice of the people uprising, awake." Nearly twelve millions of our inhabitants endorsed the limitation of armaments, while the sentiment for the abolition of submarines and against the use of poison gas was also highly significant.

And yet these twelve millions were but a little over a tenth of the people of the United States. Perhaps some who followed the doings of this Conference with eagerness, accepting its conclusions with much satisfaction, found to their surprise that this great world-changing meeting—so they fondly hoped—was a matter of indifference to others. Outside their own circle this indifferent class grew surprisingly large. The masses were not alive to the greatness of the issue.

Some months ago a writer in the business section of a daily paper put the situation as seen in New York thus:—

"I gave these instructions to an associate the other day:—'Go out and talk about the Washington Conference to colored laborers, to longshore men, street-cleaners, East-side housewives, immigrants, teamsters, elevator operators, and perhaps young girls in factories and stores. Report exactly what each one says.'

"The reports are not flattering to our standard of education. The percentage who knew nothing about anything going on at Washington is discouraging. A still larger number said they had heard something about cutting down armies and navies, but confess having no interest whatever in the subject. Among the young girls questioned few exhibited any interest. Another thing the interviews brought out was a rather widespread feeling among these humble workers that their ideas and wishes don't weigh one iota with the prominent men who decree war."

These findings make us pause. When we see, on the one hand, how much the views expressed by you, and others like you did count last winter, and, on the other hand, how many, many more were untouched and silent, we begin to realize the greatness of a field that might be cultivated with enormous results. It is a field too that is close at hand, all around each one of us. To arouse others to moral thoughtfulness on worthwhile questions, public or private, is possible for any one who is himself aroused. It may be that you can speak well in the open forum. It may be you can write for your local paper, and so make hundreds think straight. If so, may it not likewise be a patriotic duty? The conscientious objector also was a powerful moulder of public opinion during the war and since. Any one who thus publicly exalts and honors Truth by suffering for her is helping the world to right itself.

But whether or not such trials of strength are within our compass there are humbler efforts that all can make. Let not the slightness of the act nor of the results hold us back from making our contributions to this philanthropy. To arouse in our washerwoman a sentiment against a break-down in the temperance legislation; to give the plumber, the carpenter, or the field-hand a leaning toward the Christian view of war; to set our neighbor to thinking whether there cannot be found a better place than the ordinary motion-picture theatre in which her little boy may while away his evenings; to engage a fellow-commuter in thoughtful discussion on civic or personal righteousness, giving it the turn that leads upward; to hand out the little pamphlet that will set a man straight, or give comfort and courage to a troubled heart—are these acts beneath our notice? Nay, are they beneath our conscientious effort? Though we know that many out of the very fulness of their hearts do speak the "word in season," might not the purpose be still more effectively kept in mind? But if we would express opinions persuasively, we must make some study of the subjects themselves—think, at least, and if possible, read. It is not mere talk we urge, but the voicing of opinions founded on some reasonable basis. Nothing convinces like conviction—nor is it the expression without reference to the suitableness of the occasion. The word must be "in due season" to be pronounced "good"; and there are proprieties of method and manner to be observed.

It may be that in thus speaking out we shall find ourselves at odds with our associates very often and in "a society of one." If our views are right, however, we should be glad thus to sow seed in fresh soil. It is not worth while to spend much time in saying what is already fully accepted. But the great importance of independence of thought, speech and action needs yet to dawn on many minds. What forcible examples we had during the late war of hysterical multitudes led astray by bold and oft-repeated assertions! Romain Rolland, the French pacifist, says that the theme of one of his books is that "the individual soul has been swallowed up and submerged in the soul of the multitude." "Every man worthy of the name should learn to stand alone, and to do his own thinking, even in conflict with the whole world."

And these considerations press upon our minds and make us feel as Jonathan Dymond says, that to contribute to the rectitude of public opinion is to exercise exalted philanthropy?

And we cannot but be grateful beyond measure to One, who "in the midst of a faithless and perverse generation," that had ears but would not hear, nevertheless "opened His mouth and taught."

"AT EVENING TIME."

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Days of my age,
Ye will shortly be past;
Pains of my age,
Yet awhile ye can last;
Joys of my age,
In true wisdom delight;
Eyes of my age,
Be religion your light;
Thoughts of my age,
Dread ye not the cold sod;
Hopes of my age,
Be ye fixed on your God.

—ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

I came across the following a few years ago: "When John Quincy Adams was eighty years of age, he met in the streets of Boston an old friend, who shook his trembling hand and said: 'Good morning, and how is John Quincy Adams today?'"

"Thank you," was the ex-president's answer, "John Quincy Adams himself is well, quite well, I thank you. But the house in which he lives at present is becoming dilapidated. It is tottering upon its foundation. Time and seasons have nearly destroyed it. Its roof is pretty well worn out. Its walls are much shattered, and it trembles with every wind. The old tenement is becoming almost uninhabitable, and I think John Quincy Adams will have to move out of it soon. But he himself is quite well, quite well!"

It is good to see old people with an unconquerable spirit. When their earthly course is almost run how often they fearlessly look into the future. It is well when they have such vital faith in God that they think of the worn body, shaken by every wind, as only becoming "uninhabitable," that soon they must "move out of it," as expressed by the venerable ex-president of the United States.

Generally speaking, there are two kinds of old age. One represents an attitude of mind that has become mistrustful or cynical after participating in the great adventure of life. This sort has not laid hold on that restful confidence in "the eternal goodness" that Whittier sang of. It relinquishes its uncertain hold on this life with doubtfulness or dismay. God pity such—but let these remember that He ever loves them! The other kind of old age reviews its career as a wonderful school in which sweet and bitter lessons have been learned but during which preparation has been made for the mellow years and of the triumphant life beyond. These experiences have developed a firm reliance on the gracious intent of the Great Caretaker of men. The valley of the shadow of death may, in some of the waiting hours, look dark, but beyond is the victory and the glory, the beauty and the joy that awaits the faithful child of God!

And now the searching question comes home to each one of us:—are we regulating our lives so that our swiftly passing days shall become fragrant and beautiful if ripe years shall overtake us? Are not youth and middle age the periods in which to form the habit of voluntary obedience to God and to acquire the happiness of unmixed trust in Him? Shall not his fortitude and grace finally sustain us when physical and mental powers shall diminish and our earthly ties are soon to be sundered? I ask my readers to think of the abundant possibilities associated with age and of how it can become a flower-strewn pathway to the gates of heaven! Zachariah, the far-seeing prophet, wrote:

"At evening time there shall be light!"

NOTES FROM PEKING.

President Mary Wooley of Mt. Holyoke College, has been absent since last summer with a commission sent to study educational institutions in the Orient. The Holyoke News quotes from her personal letters at times, and the following extracts seem of especial interest. The first because of the recent death of Count Okuma, which makes her account of a visit to the Japanese statesman of peculiar interest.

First we visited Waseta University, founded in 1862 by Count Okuma as a protest against the rigidity of the state institutions, with Liberty of thought and freedom of expression as its slogan. Then we had an hour and a half with Count Okuma himself, in a beautiful big room opening by sliding doors onto a lovely garden. The covering of the walls was shaded gold, deep at the bottom, lighter at the top, and a corner of the corridor had purple and white fleur de lis on it. First bouquets were given to the ladies, then tea and little cakes were served. As the Count does not speak English, the conversation, through an interpreter, was leisurely and gave abundance of time for studying the interior of the room and the exterior of this astute statesman.

This noon a luncheon was given for us, at which the guests were progressive Japanese women, heads of schools, the editors of the leading woman's magazine and so forth. All but one spoke English well and from their points of view regarding social, educational and international questions were as like a similar group in America as peas from the same pod! We were one even on the League of Nations and the folly of militarism! An exclusion act, when one comes into contact with such people, seems insanity, and seeing their pride and real dignity of bearing, makes one realize how delicately that question should be handled, not entrusted to cheap politicians.

Then follow two extracts dated from Peking on the Ninth Month fifteenth and Tenth Month seventh, which give us a glimpse of present-day China.

PEKING, September 15th.

The thing you would have enjoyed was a picnic supper at the Temple of Heaven. We escaped from the tea and took rickshaws, Miss Cratty, Miss Burton and I, with a group of Association Secretaries, and after a half hour of "rickshawing" reached the Temple. What would I not have given to put you down there tonight to see the Temple with its wonderful roofs of blue in the sunset, and the uncovered altar of marble in the moonlight. That was built before America was discovered! It takes away or at least reduces a tendency to spread-eagleism. I think we all felt that we had been in a place of worship, as well as of beauty.

Coming home through one of the theatre streets, with sidewalk bazaars and multitudes of people, was another experience. Tomorrow is one of the great feast days, the feast of the full moon of the Eighth Month and every one was buying provisions or collecting debts. The street was a maze of rickshaws, carts, some automobiles and a host of people.

PEKING, October 7th.

Founder's Day, and I suppose that now—eleven p. m., here—you are all rushing around in academic costume, preparing to escorting M. Carey Thomas to the Chapel. What would I not give to look in upon you.

I have dined this evening in a charming Chinese home. (You should see, by the way, how adept I am becoming with chop-sticks!) The mistress of the house, the aunt of one of my hostesses, is one of the Red Cross officers here, on the Board of Directors of the home for aged women and quite like American middle-aged women of leisure and philanthropic instincts. Of the six younger women—I being the only foreigner present—two are American college graduates, one of them spending five years at Wellesley in the regular college course and the physical training department, and two are graduates of Gining. We sat long over the puts and sweetmeats, discussing international questions. Not only did they speak perfect English but two or three of them could easily be taken for attractive American college women. Alert, witty, earnest—one cannot despair of China's future with a group of this sort. I like the Chinese immensely. Even the coolest—some of them—attract me; the cultivated class seem more like the same type of Americans than any other Eastern nation that I have seen—especially the women. Their sense of humor, their quick perception, their directness, are very likable.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

Allusion has been made to The Young Quaker, the newest Friendly exchange on our list. John Henry Barlow in connection with the Young Friends' work, spoke of the service of the late William Charles Braithwaite in connection with the Committee. "He had, we believe, entered upon some higher form of service, and as we paused for this very brief reference to our late Friend we might surely do so with the earnest prayer that, having lost him from our midst we might close up our ranks, and that the younger men and women of the Society might find in his life of devotion and service a trumpet call to a like devotion and service. We must remember that our numbers are not great, and we should not overlook the difficulties of the problems associated with our large and small meetings, difficulties pressing so heavily upon those who have at heart the best interest of the Society. In our smaller meetings there might be Friends who needed to step aside as gracefully as possible and to allow younger Friends the difficult task of binding the younger members into a homogeneous whole. The very poor attendance at many of our meetings was a matter that the Yearly Meeting ought to face. There was the great population outside the influence of all the churches,—the slum dweller, the rich man, the libertine and the doubter and sceptic, all of whom tell us they have no use for religion. What were we doing to help them? How far were we as a Society justifying our existence by carrying our message to them? Here was the great call, here the work before us."

Gerald Littleboy said that young Friends were growing up in a time of stress. With remarkable power there was coming to them a sense of the need for service in the international sphere as well as in the home fields. The call for service had been repeated time and again; it was repeated every time we looked upon the world around us; it was impossible, for instance, to live in a district where a large percentage of the population were living on the unemployment dole without feeling that there was something most dreadfully wrong and that to us came a call to do what we could towards putting it right. The call to younger Friends was coming with tremendous insistence, and we could not feel that the response was at all adequate. Many avenues of service had opened out before the Society within comparatively recent times, and service had been magnificently rendered; and yet when there came a demand for service almost greater than ever before the response was far from adequate.

A Friend followed with these thoughts. The great principle of the Society of Friends was to rely upon the immediate guidance of Christ. Having attended London Yearly Meeting for ten or eleven years, he felt that the principle had not been sufficiently recognized. Experts had been too ready to speak, and he had a sense that those who feel most and were really best fitted to guide the Meeting had not been able to find a place. Let us, as did the early Friends, sit solidly waiting upon the Lord to know His mind and to let Him speak through us.

One who joined Friends less than a decade ago said: "At the time of my joining, particularly in the Young Friends' movement, all the efforts seemed to be to prevent the spirit of energy and enthusiasm from going outside the Society, to give within the Society and to make the Society of Friends a living thing." He went to live in New York in 1908, and the one influence he felt more than any other at that time was the influence of John Wilhelm Rowntree, though he had then passed away more than three years. Much work had been put into the task of reviving the Society of Friends, and so far as he had been able to judge it had been successful. But during the last four or five years, so far as he could see, there had come a new phase in the life of the Society. Those who had obtained the experience of the living God had been influenced to work through the Society to bring the truth that had come to them to all the men and women they knew who were seeking the same truth. Let us go forward with more courage, more humility, more dependence upon God, seeking to bring this fellowship of the Gospel to men.

A Friend said:—"We sometimes needed to remember that the Society of Friends as such was only a means to an end. And the end was not to get people into the Society, for if we got them no further, we had accomplished very little. The end and the object was to bring men into contact and personal relationship with the Lord Jesus Christ, the Head of the Church."

J. Bevan Braithwaite, quoting his brother's lines beginning,

"I wandered wayward, all astray, Till He came by, who is the Way,"

said that our message to the world today was very simple and very clear. We stood in an almost unique position. We were untroubled with any theological formulas, or creeds, no outward ordinances, no professional ministry. We had a splendid opportunity simply to hold forth Jesus Christ to the world as a solution for all problems and troubles. Jesus Christ was the remedy for our soul's needs. He was also the solution of all industrial troubles and political and international difficulties, in one word, the solution of the world's needs.

WHEN the subject of Finance was before the Meeting, there were many references to conditions that find their counterpart in Friends' Meetings generally. One Friend, who acted in the capacity of Treasurer of a subordinate meeting, stated that though he was not prepared to state it as a positive fact, yet he felt quite sure that £285 did not represent one per cent of the income of the individuals forming the Society of Friends. We were always being asked where was the money coming from? Our first duty was of course to our families, but next to that was our duty to religious Society. If we would be loyal to the Society we should not question the expenditures which the central body agreed to in a Meeting which we believed to be guided by the Spirit of God. He was sick of hearing Friends talk about the difficulty of raising money for Society purposes. He had known Friends speak of a holiday for a fortnight costing more than they and their whole families contributed to the Monthly Meeting funds during the whole of their existence! He was talking to a friend with an income of £2,000 a year net who spoke with pride of having for many years contributed for himself and his family £1 a quarter!

ERNEST LORENZ, a German from Berlin, at the invitation of the Clerk, said as a German Friend he was most glad and thankful to take part in that Yearly Meeting. After referring to the translation of Quaker works into German which Friends of Berlin were about to publish, he gave the following as a message to Friends: "In those times great calamities fell upon the inhabitants of the lands, and they were broken in pieces, nation against nation and city against city. But be ye strong, and let not your hands be slack, for your work shall be rewarded."

The golden beams of truth and the silken cords of love twisted together will draw men by a sweet violence whether they will or not.—CUDWORTH.

PROFESSOR JEROME DAVIS, of Dartmouth College, was recently speaking in one of the churches in the interest of Russian Relief. A woman who was present in the audience went home and wrote the following poem, which was published in The Outlook, Third Month 22, 1922. The author has since died; but as she wrote it for the sake of the Russian Famine Relief Work, we pass it on, hoping that it may be of further use.

FROM FAMINE FIELDS.

I am a little better than a movie show
Because I speak reality. You know
That I was there, have worked and shared and seen.
And yet, like shadow pictures on the screen,
The scenes I paint bring but a passing thrill
Of pleasant horror. Self-complacent still,
You murmur, "Sad! So sad!" and go your way,
While cards, and tea-rooms, and the latest play
Will reap their easy millions through the week.
You cannot sense the things of which I speak.
You are not heartless. Could I only lay
One baby's body at your feet today,
Or here and now bring swift before your eyes
One mother watching by her child that dies,
You would be pitiful, would strain to give,—
And thousands doomed by apathy would live.
Great God of Nations, give me words to stir
These sleek-fed aisles of broadcloth and of fur!"

—BY MARTHA HASKELL CLARK.

TEMPERANCE.

A department edited by BENJAMIN F. WHITSON, of Moylan, Pa., on behalf of the Friends' Temperance Association of Philadelphia.

I AM not in favor of amending the Volstead Act in respect to the amount of permissible alcohol in beverages. I am not in favor of allowing light wines and beer to be sold under the Eighteenth Amendment. I believe it would defeat the purpose of the amendment. No such distinction as that between wines and beer on the one hand and spirituous liquors on the other is practicable as a police measure. Any such loophole as light wines and beer would make the amendment a laughing stock.—CHIEF JUSTICE WILLIAM H. TAFT.

EVERYBODY is ready to sustain the law he likes. That is not in the proper sense respect for law and order. The test of respect for law is where the law is upheld even though it hurts.—SECRETARY HUGHES.

AMONG the most subtle and deceptive of all propaganda directed against the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment is the persistent cry that the law is unpopular and cannot be enforced; that it is being violated, and therefore should be repealed. It does not take keen intelligence to see that this contention itself is subversive of law enforcement and is a veiled confession (of belief) that any law that is unpopular may be disregarded. If the Government accedes to such a demand, a precedent is established against the enforcement of any law rendered difficult of enforcement by adverse propaganda.—FEDERAL PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER, ROY A. HAYNES.

KANSAS has had Prohibition over twenty-five years. When first passed there was a great opposition, and for the first fifteen years the temperance question was the storm centre of all campaigns; but each year opposition grew less and its provisions were strengthened. To-day in Kansas the law is enforced as successfully as any other law, and any effort to remove it from the statute books would be defeated by a vote of fifty to one.—GOVERNOR ALLEN OF KANSAS.

SPANISH WINE INTERESTS ASSAULT ON PROHIBITION.—The action taken by the Icelandic Parliament in response to Spain's ultimatum concerning Iceland's Prohibition law, is not final.

The impression prevails that this action was a repeal of the Prohibition law. The fact is, it is a suspension of the Prohibition law effective for one year so that wines containing up to 21 per cent of alcohol may be imported and sold. Both houses of Parliament adopted with but one dissenting vote the proposal from the Parliament's Trade Committee that the Icelandic government be authorized to so suspend the Prohibition law. The Parliament is now closed, and will not meet again this year and the suspension will accordingly hold good.

The Prohibition law will come into force again in a year if it is possible in the meantime to find a new market for Iceland's fish or to make such an impression upon Spain that she gives up her demands. Spain has clubbed the little island into submission by the threat of boycotting their fish market. The whole world knows that Spain's attack was not an attack upon Iceland's Prohibition law but upon the principle of Prohibition, for Iceland was never an extensive market for Spanish wines.

American Issue's correspondent states that this brutal victory of Spain will be a strong factor in the Prohibition fight this year in Sweden. The Spanish and French wine interests are threatening the whole Prohibition movement in the Scandinavian countries.

The situation emphasizes the fact that the liquor question is an international question of vast importance, made such by the liquor interests themselves.

A ROLL OF "BEST MINDS" on the question of enforcing or modifying the Volstead Act was taken recently by The Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore. Those who oppose Prohibition have pointed out, as stated by The Literary Digest, that the list is a selected one; the first thousand names are those of influential men who five years ago signed a petition for Federal Prohibition. It is likely, therefore, contend "wet" adherents that these would still be in favor of prohibition. Then there are manufacturers, who perhaps naturally wish their workers to come to work sober on Second-day morning, alert and efficient. But there are also in the list men who are known to be concerned with the moral, rather than the economic, benefits to be derived from Prohibition—college presidents, physicians, surgeons. And these men vote almost unanimously in favor of Prohibition and its strict enforcement. Says the Manufacturers' Record, in a booklet setting forth the results of the polls:

"These letters come from men of national standing, men known in every walk of life, in the great business interests and professions. They are in answer to a questionnaire which we recently sent to about 1500 manufacturers, bankers, college presidents and others as to whether, in their opinion, Prohibition had proven a success, and what had been the result in their own experience and among the men in their employ."

A compilation by The Record gives the following results in percentage to the total:

	Per Cent.
For Prohibition in Some Form.....	98.50
Against Prohibition.....	1.50
For Strict Prohibition.....	85.50
For Beer and Wine.....	7.00
Against Volstead Law or Present Regulations.....	1.25
In Favor of Modification of Volstead Law.....	.75
In Favor of High License or Government Control.....	1.00
In Favor of Dispensary System.....	.25
Undecided or Noncommittal.....	2.75

Thus we see in this verdict from a hundred cities, that an overwhelming majority are for Prohibition in some form. Warren S. Stone, head of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, says that the longer he lives and the more he sees of the liquor traffic, the more bitterly he is opposed "to the entire question of the manufacture and sale of liquor." "Best of all," notes the Director of the College of Commerce, University of Southern California, "under Prohibition a generation of boys and girls are growing up who will soon come to maturity without the taint of alcohol."

In Detroit "the favorable effects of Prohibition are apparent to even a blind man," declares the president of the Leland Motor Co., "despite the fact that we are but across the river from Canada." In Louisville, reports the Mayor, "saving accounts show an increase of 50 per cent. Moreover, 6,172 persons were arrested for drunkenness in 1919, whereas only 1,053 were arrested for that offense in 1920." In the words of the President of the American Rolling Mill Co., of Middletown, Ohio—whose name, by the way, is Verity—

"Some of the results that have been secured are:

"Less time lost, less accidents, less incompetence, less carelessness and inefficiency, better work, better homes, more thrift, happier families, and sober and safer and more efficient men who are now finding out what it really means to live."

GIFFORD PINCHOT got 1,807 Prohibition votes for Governor on our ballot, that many people writing his name on their ballots. This was because he made the first plank in his platform to stand for the wiping out of the entire license system.

As Prohibitionists, vitally interested in having as Governor of Pennsylvania a man thoroughly in accord with the Eighteenth Amendment, we would feel better satisfied with the nomination which is the equivalent to his election, if we had any assurance that he will have any more influence with a republican legislature in securing the repeal of the Sproul-Woner law than he had with the State Committee in making a state chairman.

Both parties are simply claiming and neither of them have yet demonstrated their ability to legislate in harmony with the U. S. Constitution.—The Index.

A STUDY OF THE MOVIES.

A first-hand study of the moving picture enterprise in Dayton recently was made by members of the class in sociology in Bonebrake Seminary. While disclosures may not throw a vast amount of additional light on the subject in general, they indeed are interesting and will confirm the conviction that the present movie business is indefensible and is one of the greatest evils that are cursing society. First of all, it was found that one person in every six attends the shows daily, or a daily attendance of between twenty-five thousand and thirty thousand people,—from infants in their mothers' arms to the grandires in their eighties. Many showed the marks of poverty, both in attire and in pinched faces. The average price of admission was computed at twenty cents, plus war tax, making a daily income for the picture shows and a daily out-go from the pockets of the people among whom are multitudes that can illly afford it, of from five thousand dollars to six thousand dollars.

Over eighty reels were witnessed, and among them were very few that in any degree could be regarded as instructive or morally uplifting. The tendency is to cater to the sensual and lawless element. Prohibition usually was treated as a joke, the general impression being that prohibition law enforcement is an utter impossibility. Among characters shown, eight preachers received attention, six of them being either hypocrites or fools and were made objects of derision. Two Catholic priests were represented, and, for some peculiar reason, both were made the embodiment of sainthood. Why this discrimination?

Scenes repulsive and vulgar to refined taste were the most common. Home life was shown up in the most unfavorable light. Domestic discord and conjugal infidelity seemed to afford the most inviting subjects for display. Indecent exposure, even to practical nudeness, was quite common in pictures shown, while scenes of a suggestive nature may be set down as characteristic. Gun play, murders and murder plots, drinking and drunkenness, card playing and gambling, smoking and vulgar dancing were found to be among the chief features that make up the menu of the picture show devotee. Surely there is nothing in such a mental menu to appeal to a pure mind or to purify an impure one.

Among the productions witnessed, two were pronounced as being really clean and morally safe, but even these were supplemented by some silly comedy that largely discounted their good qualities. Some made use of industrial scenes, showing processes of mining, manufacturing, etc., though invariably the manager did not depend on these features to popularize his performance. The crowds invariably showed preference for rank comedies and extreme tragedies. "Especially were the old soldiers conspicuous in the vulgar vaudeville." R. L. Brill, who headed the investigation, says: "I have come to the conclusion that the movies could be a mighty force for education, but they are not. They could be a help in a moral and spiritual way, but they are not. They could make their heroes good, clean men instead of cigarette smokers, gun toters, gamblers, and often fugitives from justice, but they do not."

Will H. Hays, who recently resigned his position as a member of President Harding's cabinet to serve as head of the National Association of Motion Picture Producers, has a great opportunity to do some things that need to be done. According to his own statement, two things are included in his contract that should have a bearing upon the moral side of the business: First, "To attain and maintain the highest possible standard of motion picture production." Second, "To develop to the highest possible degree the spiritual, moral and educational value of the industry." It remains to be seen what these "highest possibles" are to be. If he, in eliminating the things which have brought the movie business into disrepute, develops its possibilities for good he will render a great service to his country. The biggest part of his task will be the reconciling of the highest possibilities for good with the highest financial interests of the men who are paying the $150,000 a year for his service.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A STRIKING ILLUSTRATION.—At a meeting in Japan where a number of Christian girls were gathered together, the subject was: "How to glorify Christ by our lives." One of the girls said: "It seems to me like this: One spring my mother got some flower seeds, little, ugly, black things, and planted them, they grew and blossomed beautifully. One day a neighbor coming in and seeing these flowers said: 'Oh, how beautiful! I must have some, too; won't you please give me some seed?' Now, if this neighbor had only just seen the flower seeds, she wouldn't have called for them; 'twas only when she saw how beautiful was the blossom that she wanted the seed. And so with Christianity. When we speak to our friends of the truths of the Bible, they seem to think hard and uninteresting, they say: 'We don't care to hear about these things; they are not as interesting as our own stories.' But when they see these same truths blossoming out in our lives into kindly words and good acts, then they say: 'How beautiful these lives! What makes them different from other lives?' When they hear that 'tis Jesus teaching, then they say: 'We must have it, too!' And thus by our lives, more than by our tongues, we can preach Christ to our unbelieving friends."—From The African's Friend.

A MESSAGE TO BOYS AND GIRLS.—New York Yearly Meeting, in recent session, issued the following letter to its boys and girls. It will be pleased we are sure to have the boys and girls of other Yearly Meetings "listen in" on it.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS:—

Have you worn the radio head-pieces yet—had a chance to "listen in?" "But what has radio to do with New York Yearly Meeting," you may ask. Just this—we wish to broadcast a little message to all the children and young people.

There's another wonderful power, to some just as mysterious as radio, but one that can be just as real to every single one of us as radio has become to those who have listened to its messages. This power is even more wonderful, however, for it can transform human lives. Do you listen to the messages that your Heavenly Father sends to you? You cannot hear them unless your spirits are "tuned" to catch them, as the radio instruments must be if we are to hear distinctly.

You probably know about the many different "wave-lengths" by which sounds are transmitted. Our Heavenly Father sends his messages to us by many different methods—sometimes they seem to come through the beauties of nature, the flowers, the birds and the trees; often His thoughts come through others, from good books and fine sermons; very often He speaks by the wise counsel of those who have had more experience than we; but best of all, like the higher wave-lengths used for official messages, our Father speaks to us Himself—words of comfort, strength and guidance. Sometimes we call this conscience. Friends often call it the "Inner Light."

Radio waves are continuous or unbroken; just so God is always speaking to us. Sometimes, by unkind thoughts or disobedient deeds, we ourselves, may "cut off the current," but always we may reach Him by the simple lifting of our hearts or by the spoken words of prayer.

Now the next time you "listen in" (or the first time) and every time, won't you think about that other wonderful power which is free to us all?

We have asked our clerk to sign this letter.

JAMES WOOD, Clerk.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

In the spring of 1833 we removed to the house 1128 Arch Street, which we found a pleasant change. Here I had the opportunity of indulging my taste for cultivating plants, etc. I put up a small and inexpensive greenhouse, taking the care of it myself. Just after it was finished my brother-in-law, Dr. Caspar Wistar, visited it while I was absent, and wrote these lines on the door:

"Enough has heaven bestowed of joy below,
To tempt our tarrance in the loved retreat,
Enough has heaven ordained of human good,
To make us languish for a happier seat."

The pleasure and the disappointment were both realized, for after a year or two of success, the greenhouse was destroyed by fire, and I did not renew it, finding my time could be employed more usefully, and more in accordance with apprehended duty.

In the fall of 1834 I accompanied our beloved friends Jonathan and Hannah C. Backhouse on their way to Ohio Yearly Meeting. We had journeyed by way of Baltimore, Frederick and Bedford, as far as the summit of the Allegheny Ridge, when H. C. Backhouse became so unwell that she could not proceed. Jonathan Backhouse, however, determined to push on to the Yearly Meeting and leave his precious wife under my care at the country tavern on the turnpike. This was a most unexpected charge. After some hours delay she felt a little better, and thought if I could procure a carriage she would make an effort to follow her husband by easy stages. I met with a suitable conveyance and we went on to Somerset. Here she had a concern to visit the prison which was accomplished, but on returning to the hotel, she again became so poorly that it was decided to return towards Philadelphia. We again crossed the mountains, and night coming on we were obliged to stop at one of the ordinary taverns of that rude region for lodging. Our fellow-guests were a number of rough teamsters, who came to the supper table fresh from the care of their horses, with little regard for cleanliness. I felt much for Hannah C. Backhouse in her weak state without a female companion, but she bore up bravely under this trial, being actually less discomposed than I was by our unkept company. The night was an uncomfortable one from the rudeness of the wagoners who attempted to enter my room, but my barricade prevented it. Happily they did not disturb the repose of our dear friend. In the morning I was shown the horse trough as my washing place, but for "the lady" a stool and common basin were provided. Although we asked for an early breakfast, being very desirous to leave our rude hostelry, we were not permitted to sit down to the table, until the teamsters had curried their horses and were ready to partake with us, they being the more privileged and profitable guests. Notwithstanding all these discomforts the pure air of the mountains improved the health of our beloved friend so that we cheerfully pursued our way to Bedford. At this place we found comfortable quarters which were refreshing. Hearing that there was a Friends' meeting at Dunning's Creek we concluded to attend it. A ride of about twelve miles brought us to the place, where we met with a small company, including several valuable aged friends. After the meeting, being invited by a dear old elder and his wife to dine we went with them. They had shut up their little cottage to go to meeting, and when we arrived the fire was to be made, and the dinner prepared by the aged couple. Seeing this, we joined in the pleasant duty. Our dear friend H. C. Backhouse sat by the blazing hearth, and ground the coffee with the mill in her lap, as was the old fashion. A son of the family who resided near, sent a fine rabbit which had been cooked for themselves, and with several simple additions from the old Friend's larder we had a good meal. After dinner some of the neighboring friends came in, and there was pleasant conversation, in which H. C. Backhouse spoke very interestingly on the subject of Scriptural instruction. We parted from these good people feeling that we had been refreshed together in Christian love. Returning to Bedford we rested for another day. Our dear friend was much improved by this, and her cheering, pleasing conversation was really delightful. She proposed taking a walk to procure some silk to make me a guard-chain for my watch, which she did. Leaving Bedford we went forward to Chambersburg. As we were descending one of the lofty hills we saw over a distant valley a thunder storm, over another a magnificent rainbow, emblem of our Heavenly Father's mercy and goodness which aroused in both our hearts feelings of wonder, love and praise. At Chambersburg our dear friend was brought into close mental trial. She apprehended it to be her duty to have a public meeting, but I became seriously alarmed on account of her weak unerved state, and thought her entirely inadequate for such a service. I therefore urged her to press on to Philadelphia. To this she consented, and we started in the stage, and proceeded as far as Gettysburg. Here she decided it to be her duty to return to Chambersburg, which was a great trial to me. I procured a conveyance and retraced our morning's journey. On arriving again at the hotel, we found our dear friend Eliza P. Kirkbride with the carriage and friendly driver who had accompanied J. and H. C. Backhouse in most of their travels in America. Thus my anxiety was completely relieved. We made arrangement for the public meeting, which was largely attended and was satisfactory. Having now a dear female companion and good carriage and competent driver, H. C. Backhouse concluded again to turn westward where much good service was afterwards accomplished. Thus the way was opened for me to return to my dear family in Philadelphia. The twenty-first day of First Month, 1835, my dear daughter Mary was born, and our little family circle became more and more interesting. The day of her birth happened to be the time of our Monthly Meeting at Twelfth Street. I was then appointed an overseer of the meeting, an office which involved many responsibilities, and which I fear have been very imperfectly discharged. But I can say I ever felt an interest in the welfare of my fellow members, and conscious of my own many infirmities and shortcomings, I have desired to do my part in restoring them who were out of the way.

ALL evil springs from evil thoughts. Yea, in the code of Heaven a bad thought indulged is a bad deed committed.—FARRAR.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.

The commencement exercises were held on the fourteenth of Sixth month. A class of 21 boys and 19 girls were graduated, twelve different states being represented. Essays were read by Hugh Borton, Marion H. Cowperthwaite, William F. Satterthwaite and Marion Rhoads, the valedictory being given by Edward S. Wood, Jr. Andrew Thomas Smith, Principal of the West Chester Normal School, gave the address to the class,—an address full of sound wisdom and helpful counsel. Various honors were announced. The following Seniors, because of high scholarship, became members of the Cum Laude Society, an honor society in secondary schools, corresponding to the Phi Beta Kappa of the colleges.—Edward S. Wood, Jr., Charles R. Tattall, Robert H. Richie, Anna Moffitt and Ruth M. Miller. The class of 1914 Reading Prizes were awarded to Edward S. Wood, Jr., and K. Virginia Wood. The Alumni Association prizes for highest scholarship were won by Robert H. Richie and Edward S. Wood, Jr. (tie) and Edna E. Wetherald, in the upper classes, William K. Alsop and M. Frances Goodwin in the lower classes. Alumni prizes for improvement in scholarship went to Daniel E. Houghton, Ruth Biddle and C. Frederick Taylor. William B. Test and Sarah C. Carslake have been elected as Student Body Presidents for next year.

Marian B. Rustedt is to spend the summer abroad, studying in Paris and travelling in other parts of France. E. Grant Spicer also goes abroad. In connection with his work in the Department of Agriculture, he is to study the native breeds of cattle in Scotland, the Channel Islands and Holland. Lauretta P. James and Eugene R. Raiford expect to take summer courses at Columbia, Cebrun W. Joyner at the University of Pennsylvania, and Jessie A. Wood at Chautauqua. Barclay L. Jones and S. Margaret Lowmes have resigned their positions for further study, the latter at the University of Pennsylvania, the former at the University of Chicago, where he has an assistantship in chemistry, and expects to receive his Master's degree next spring. Elizabeth Thomas is also leaving, as she feels she should be at home another year; she has received an appointment at the South Philadelphia High School. Emma Mae January has been appointed to succeed Elizabeth Thomas as physical director on the girls' side. She is a graduate of the Sargent School in Boston, has been connected with the Cleveland School and Playground Systems for two years, and is this summer a physical director in the School for Women of Industry, held at Bryn Mawr College. Ruth Kellum will have the work of the Sixth and Seventh grades. After graduating from college, she taught for three years in the Junior High School at Cambridge City, Indiana. Both she and Emma Mae January are Westtown old scholars. No extensive physical improvements are contemplated in the main buildings this summer, outside of the usual repairs. A portion of Industrial Hall, however, is to be remodelled into modern working laboratories for the Agriculture Department. Another tenant house is being built on Walnut Hill, just at the edge of the woods and a short distance west of the present buildings.

Thirty-three of the pupils remained over at the school to take the College Entrance examinations: in addition to our own pupils, four others have come in from outside. Walter H. Magill, formerly of Westtown, now Assistant Professor at the University of Pennsylvania, was supervisor of the examinations.

Under the direction of the Alumni Committee on Science and Museum, extensive work is being done in the school museum in classifying and re-arranging the many specimens, and in revising the catalogue. Several collections of various kinds, especially of shells, have been given to the school since such work was last done.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

SOME THINGS THE NAVAL TREATY OF THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE WILL DO.—Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, in a recent article in the Ladies' Home Journal, presents clearly some points of interest in regard to the proposed naval agreements. He said in part:—

"... By the naval treaty we have left each nation with ample strength for defense, but with insufficient strength to make her confident enough of success to tempt her to make aggressive war. With any nation—I care not who she may be, the United States or another—there is no better deterrent from aggressive war than a doubt as to whether she can make the war a success or not.

"There is at this time a real misapprehension in this country as to the financial effect on this country of the naval treaty. The public, seeing the list of ships to be scrapped, has naturally jumped to the conclusion that our present navy is greatly reduced, and that consequently we shall show an enormous saving in the naval expenditure in the coming naval bill over what was appropriated last year. This is not so. Our great saving is in terms of the future. If we had completed our building program and enlarged our shore establishment accordingly, as we should have had to do had there been no conference, the cost of maintaining our navy would have been approximately six hundred millions each year.

"The number of battleships which the navy is going to scrap is twenty-seven. Of these twenty-seven, thirteen are now under construction, with no men of the navy on them. The other fourteen are old battleships out of commission, for the most part with very few navy men on them. In all, there are only about 850 men on all of the ships to be scrapped. Therefore, the total number of men that we are saved by the scrapping is but 850."

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS is reported to have cost the United States a little less than $250,000.

THE BRITISH ADMIRALTY ANNOUNCED SOME WEEKS AGO, that of 9450 officers, 1835 were retired on account of the reduction in personnel caused by the Naval Treaty.

ADMIRAL BEATTY, OF THE BRITISH NAVY, speaking to the Lawyers' Club in New York City last fall, said:—

"Those who have served in the war have seen something of the devastation of war and the sacrifices of war. We have felt that whatever our duties are with regard to the navy, we have a higher and greater duty to civilization and to the Government and the country which we serve. And that is, if it is possible, to make war impossible."

GERMANY AND RUSSIA MUST TAKE THEIR PLACES in the family of nations before real peace can come. Lloyd George spoke very plainly when he said at Genoa, "You have Germany and Russia who are in a condition of semi-antagonism to the rest of Europe. That means two-thirds of Europe, and anybody who imagines you can permanently by any combination keep down two great peoples representing two-thirds of Europe, must be either blind or blinkered. It is an impossibility. It is a folly. It is an insanity. You must arrive at an understanding which will include the whole of these peoples."

WILL IRWIN'S "THE NEXT WAR" is among the required studies in the Freshman class at the University of California.

"THE MORAL BASIS FOR A TREATY OF PEACE."—A memorandum recently issued by the Peace Committee of London Yearly Meeting contains, among others, the following statements:—"What is wanted to express this new sentiment is not so much a revision of the Treaty of Versailles, clause by clause, as a new agreement amongst all the nations, based on wise principles and superseding the treaties dictated by the victorious allies."

PRINCIPLES THAT SHOULD BE ABSOLUTELY REJECTED:—

1. The sole responsibility of Germany for the war.
2. The right of the victors to dictate terms.
3. The belief that any nation or group of nations can register the degrees of guilt resting upon others, and assign the reparation due as atonement for such guilt.

WHAT IS THE TRUE BASIS FOR A NEW AGREEMENT?

1. President Wilson's Fourteen Points:
These were accepted by the Central Powers as the condition of the Armistice and the basis of peace. To deny them in the Treaties is a vast breach of faith.
2. The Restoration of Prosperity.
Important as the restoration of prosperity is, we should regard it as a desirable by-product of applying true principles, not as the ultimate test of the truth of these principles.
3. Forgiveness and Co-operation.

Let us not deny that every nation has much to forgive. Nor, on the other hand, let us regard full forgiveness as a sign of weakness or a dangerous acquiescence in injustice and crime. Within a State, where defined rules of justice are accepted by all, it may be right that crimes should be punished by approximately impartial judges or tribunals. Similarly, the time may be not far distant when all international disputes can be adjudicated by the Court of International Justice or by an all-inclusive League of Nations.

The policy for which we should work may be thus summarized: for the past, forgive and forget; for the future, show our good-will and confidence by disarming, and our desire for the general welfare by contributing what we can to the rebuilding of what has been destroyed and the loyal support of all international humanitarian activities.

W. F. W.

This article appeared in the New York newspapers on Sixth Month 28, 1922.—

Christian churches of all denominations and all countries will be asked to join the Quakers in a definite organization for peace which will demand the complete rejection of war and all preparations for war for any purpose and against any people. The movement has been started by the Religious Society of Friends embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland through the world-wide circulation of an appeal adopted at their recent Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia. This appeal has been commended to the attention of the churches by the Church Peace Union of New York and is now being mailed from the headquarters of that organization to 20,000 clergymen in all parts of the United States. It has already been endorsed by the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends in London, and the originators expect the co-operation of all other local Societies of Quakers. Its general circulation among Christian churches marks an epoch in the history of the Quaker sect, because never before have the Friends made an organized public effort to gain the adherence of other denominations to the recognized fundamental principle of their creed.

The Friends' appeal to the churches of Christendom says, in part: "Christianity seems to us to face a grave crisis and a Divine duty. In this aftermath of history's most terrible war, we see two paths before us. One leads inevitably to another war by renewed preparedness of the most efficient military, economic, educational and religious means of waging it. The other begins with a complete rejection of war, and of all preparations for it, for any purpose and against any people; it demands definite organization for peace.

"As Christians we are striving for a 'warless world.' We are firmly convinced that this can be achieved only by refusing to participate in war, simply and sufficiently because war is by its very nature at variance with the message, the spirit, and the life and death of Jesus Christ. We unite in supporting treaties of arbitration and conciliation, limitation and reduction of armaments, international courts of justice, a league or association of nations for the preservation of peace. This is well: it is a great achievement for statesmen to accomplish these things; but it is not sufficient for the Christian Church.

"The fundamental peace principle of Christianity demands the utter rejection of war, unequivocally and without compromise. With this principle in its charter the Christian Church can always utter a clear and unmistakable verdict on any specific measure of statesmanship that is proposed; it will not be misled or coerced, by argument or by force, into participating in any kind or degree of preparation for war, or into lending the sanction of Christianity to the waging of any war whatsoever."

In sending this appeal to 20,000 churches the Friends suggest that it be read at the First-day morning or evening services, published in church bulletins, discussed at prayer meetings and studied by the adult classes of First-day schools or other appropriate groups.

RELIEF IN THE COAL FIELDS.

The proposed relief work of the American Friends' Service Committee to be carried on in West Virginia and Pennsylvania among the families of the miners is under way. Investigations by their representatives and by many other agencies indicate that a very serious condition exists among the children and families dependent upon the mining industry. Already a number are developing tuberculosis on account of malnutrition. There are hundreds of children who are without necessary food.

Christian people cannot sit by and see people starve. Without discussing any of the issues involved in the present controversy in the coal industry, the Committee believes that it should engage in relief for the most needy cases. Economic strife does not justify the starving of innocent people. No civil or industrial warfare should ever be allowed to progress to the point where the lives of children are at stake or where there is a possibility that they may be dwarfed in body for the years to come. While the officials on both sides of the controversy are coming to an agreement we propose to see that the little ones are helped to such an extent that they may develop into normal men and women and thus become a real asset to society. The work is being undertaken, therefore, with the desire to bring a message of good-will to these people in their time of need. Beginning on a small scale in the district around Charleston it will be extended to other sections just as rapidly as funds will permit.

The press is giving the matter favorable publicity, and from all sides sympathy with the work is being evidenced through letters of appreciation and money contributions. Philip Furnas, an instructor at Earlham College; Cyril Harvey, a student; and Lucile Ralston, an experienced dietician and social worker—one of this year's graduates from the same college—have been chosen for the West Virginia field. Edward W. Evans, of Philadelphia; Herbert Bowles and Lawrence Dale, students at Earlham College; Luella Jones, of Iowa; and Frieda Burkle, dietician in the German child-feeding, will constitute the Pennsylvania Unit.

The immediate work will be the feeding of the most undernourished children and of expectant and nursing mothers. One meal a day will be served for six days in the week. This will consist of the very simplest but most nourishing kinds of food, such as milk, cocoa, rice and fats. The menu will be worked out by expert dietitians and the meal will be made supplementary to that which they receive at home. The closest kind of co-operation will be sought with the community and the owners and operators of mines. Nothing is to be done which will create partisan feeling. The whole work is to be kept on a humanitarian basis. Advice and counsel will be sought from the relief committees among the miners, the men in charge for the operators, local physicians, and others. The character of the work, the manner of conducting it, etc., will be entirely in the hands of the American Friends' Service Committee.

DEDICATION OF THE CHÂLONS MATERNITY HOSPITAL.

On Sixth Month 17, 1922, the formal opening of the Châlons Hospital occurred. A letter to the Service Committee makes the following reference to the occasion:—

I am writing to tell you a little about the ceremony at Châlons. Twenty or more English and American Friends were in attendance, most of them as appointed delegates.

All of these from both committees were invited to the Assemblée Générale which was held at the Préfecture at ten o'clock.

It was very interesting to meet in that beautiful building which has its historic associations with the Revolution, for it was there that the Royalist party was met by the mob after they had been captured at Varennes in the attempted flight, and it has many associations for us of those early years of the war.

The Treasurer's Report was made. Mlle. Merle gave a most able and moving account of the last year at the Maternity. I am sure that those who did not already know her agreed with the rest of us that she is absolutely the right person for her task and that we may have great confidence in the future of the Maternity.

We also got a glimpse of what an excellent body the French Committee is, what a keen interest they take in the work, and how admirably they support the matron without in any way interfering in the professional matters which have to be decided by the professional staff.

We had a little opportunity after the Assemblée of the French, Americans and English to meet each other. We missed Melvin Cawl very much and felt that it was a great loss to the functions of the day that he could not be there. A warm and appreciative reference was made in the opening address to the excellent and devoted work which he had done and to the fact that the building could never have been put through in the time without him.

The function at the Maternity began at three, but a good many people began to arrive at 2.30. There were certainly over 500 there altogether. The Préfet arrived punctually at three and a selected party set off to go round the hospital with him. Everything was looking charming—it really was wonderful how spick and span everything looked, considering the difficulties of getting a new place straight after a move, and wonderfully cosy and homelike considering that it was quite new and the patients only in a month. The nurses had certainly worked very hard to get it all ready.

When we came to the hall where the presentation tablet, which was covered by the flags of the three countries, was located, Robert Maris, of Wilmington, Delaware, performed the ceremony of unveiling it, and said in French, that he handed the building over in the name of American and of English Friends and of International Friendship to the French Committee. Everyone admired the tablet very much. We then adjourned to the porch at the end of the children's ward where T. Edmund Harvey and the Préfet spoke to the multitude assembled around.

The acclamation to Edmund Harvey's speech in spite of his explanation of the Friends' pacifist attitude was very good to hear.

The Châlons people are certainly very much delighted with the Maternity and very proud to have such a place in their town. At the Assemblée in the morning the Maire of Epemay, who was present, made a most beautiful little speech saying that this Maternity was in advance of anything in France and would surely serve as a model that would be copied by other Departments.

The beauty of the building has drawn attention to the work as a whole, and people are much impressed with the tone and spirit of the nurses' work, and with the evidence that a Committee representing so many shades of religion can work together.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The following extract from a letter of William Littleboy to a "younger Friend" is generously shared through THE FRIEND with others. It is dated Jordans, Sixth Month Tenth, 1922—EDS.]

"My life has been wonderfully enriched and blessed through the experience of the last months and now, more than ever, I feel it to be true that a good deal of my heart remains behind in America.

"I did not know how much I loved my friends there, especially younger friends. I remember them often in my quiet time, the last thing before I go to rest, and just long that God's blessing may be poured out upon them, good measure, pressed down, shaken together and running over."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CANADA YEARLY MEETING (Conservative) was held this year at Norwich, Ontario, from the 22nd to the 27th of Sixth Month. Several of the sessions were felt to be very favored, and despite the numerical weakness of this group of Friends, there was a distinct note of encouragement in the meetings. Three Ministers with minutes of concurrence from their home meetings were present, from Ohio, North Carolina and Philadelphia, and there were other visitors too. Eleven members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting were in attendance, including two ministers and two elders, although neither of the latter went as companion to the former. The interest and dedication of the younger members and the use made of them by the Yearly Meeting for some of its most serious business impressed some of the visitors. Taking all their meals together in the basement of the meeting-house, and joining in afterwards in washing and wiping the dishes, made the social side of more than usual value and everyone felt at home, and on the friendliest terms with everyone else, almost from the start. We hope to publish an account of the Yearly Meeting a little later.

It is reported that there is an appeal being made for help in building a Friends' Meeting House in Vienna, Austria.

The following is taken from a late message from Carl Heath:—

"The Monthly Meeting in connection with the Wilhelmstrasse Meeting for Worship (Berlin) is of great interest. It has builded a way into the life of the community. It is carrying on a steady effort at Russian relief work and other practical matters, as well as a study circle. Its last meeting reports twenty present." . . . "There is a small but growing nucleus of German members. No one has ever been urged, to my knowledge, to join the Society. These memberships are entirely a personal response to a sense of need. I welcome this fact, because it is creating a group with a common responsibility around which a German religious society will grow and adapt itself to meet its own needs."

"The lines of right development in respect to Quaker needs in Germany seem gradually becoming clear. Groups at Elberfeld, Berlin, Charlottenburg, Frankfurt and Darmstadt, with many individual links in all parts of Germany, indicate a growth which is entirely normal and healthy. Friends are responding to a searching. As way opens the door the growth will be natural, and have German roots."

WALTER H. ABELL, who has been the efficient editor of the Intelligencer, has terminated his connection with the paper. For the present Paul Wager will be his successor.

THE sale of foreign embroideries in Philadelphia alluded to a few weeks since proved a real success. The net proceeds were a little in excess of $600.00. The money will be used to help relieve the suffering in the respective countries from which the embroideries came. Two or three hundred dollars worth of supplies, all priced, will be sent upon request to the Committee, to any meetings wishing to make a sale of these foreign embroideries. Profits are to be returned to the Service Committee. For further information write to the office, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. The production of the sale is under the direction of Friends' relief workers who constitute a medium through which the deserving people of Europe can dispose of their handicraft.

CARL HEATH expected one of the features of his present visit to Berlin to be a meeting with a company of Friends from Denmark to consider the question of establishing a Friends' Centre in Copenhagen.

GREAT satisfaction has been expressed by Friends in London Yearly Meeting over the the appointment of John Henry Barlow as Clerk of the Friends' Home Mission Extension Committee, which place was left vacant by the death of William Charles Braithwaite. The position is one of great responsibility and calls for an almost unceasing supply of spiritual energy.—The Friend (London).

NEW EDITION OF JOHN WOOLMAN'S JOURNAL.—Friends and others will be much interested to know that after years of consecrated labor, Amelia Mott Gummer has completed her Journal of John Woolman. The guarantee fund to make possible the publication of this monumental work is not completed, though sufficient cash and pledges have been received to warrant signing a contract with Macmillans of New York to go ahead with the work. The final instalment of "proof" has been received today (Seventh Month 10). It is confidently expected that the Friendly reading public will await with much interest the appearance of this new book.

THE town of Moundridge, Kansas, with its seven hundred inhabitants and the surrounding community contributed two carloads of flour during the campaign a few months ago, when the American Friends' Service Committee were collecting for the Russian relief. This was the best record made by any one place.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING seriously considered the holding in 1924 a joint meeting of American Yearly Meetings to mark the ter-centenary of the birth of George Fox. The object of such a gathering should be "to make it an occasion for projecting into the present and the future the spirit in which George Fox lived and worked."

WANDERING SCOTT, writing in the Edinburgh Evening News of Fifth Month 27th last, says of English Friends:

"One of the most arresting addresses I have heard for a long time was that given by Carl Heath at the opening of the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends. His subject was 'Christianity and Public Life.' In loftiness of the thought and expression, in the sweep of its comprehension of the 'fundamentals' in religion and ethics, few Moderators or Presidents in the big churches could match this address. Is there any other religious body with so many gifted laymen as the Quakers? It is probably the absence of a priestly class that gives the Quaker his exceptional power."

H. M. P.

DR. WILLIAM I. HULL'S summary of the results of the Washington Conference have been sent to over 20,000 clergymen in the United States; this summary appeared in THE FRIEND at the time of the close of the Washington Conference.

AN English Friend who attended the recent Annual Conference of the Mennonites in Holland reported that they numbered in that country about 13,000 at present, with 120 pastors, who were nearly all maintained by invested funds. They welcomed very much their fellowship with the Society of Friends. He thought there was a great future for Quakerism in Holland.

AN English correspondent writes us: "The long awaited Prison book by Stephen Hobbhouse and A. Fenner Brockway is announced for publication. Its accurate description is the report of the Prison System Enquiry Committee, which is based on the evidence of nearly 300 ex-prisoners of every type, including two men who have served life sentences for murder, 50 prison officials of the different grades, as well as many visiting magistrates, agents of Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies, and other persons with direct knowledge of the subject. The conclusions of the Committee regarding the mental and moral effects of imprisonment are of a startling nature and are likely to arouse much discussion. The publishers are Longmans, Green & Co.

SEVERAL of the Friends' Grade Schools have adopted J. Russell Smith's Geographies. These books, called "Human Geography," published by the Winston Co., Philadelphia, are a Friend's attempt to promote better international understanding, and therefore international co-operation, by writing a text-book that should be both good geography and good ethics. The second of these books has recently appeared, and is producing favorable comment.

THIS startling statement was made in London Yearly Meeting by a Friend but recently returned from Russia. He said that until he reached Russia he had not realized what an immense number of Quakers there were in that country. He was visited by representatives of those calling themselves Quakers, and in mingling with them made the discovery to his surprise that their beliefs were very like those held by Friends. They were absolutely convinced of the unlawfulness of all war to the Christian, and believed in the positive side of communion with the Lord. Those who held the views of the Society of Friends in Russia were reckoned to be quite one million; that is to say, there were more Friends in Russia than in the whole of the rest of the world. It is hoped that there will be some method of getting into touch with these people.

DEAN INGE'S DANGER SIGNALS.

The picture of an Anglican ecclesiastic appealing to the Society of Friends against "losing their distinctive testimony and their peculiar strength," is not without epic quality. It might very well make an additional panel in the mural decorations at Harrisburg; it will suggest to some minds the heroic figure of Jeremiah as depicted by Sargent in the Public Library at Boston. The misfortune of the situation is that the modern prophet will probably share the fate of his great predecessor. Because he sounds a note of warning and of seeming ill, we shall complacently exclaim jeremiad, and pass heedlessly on! A prophet of ill, if we may suggest an addition to the accepted Scripture principle, is without honor in every country. The reason is patent enough. Pessimism, although it is sometimes said to be "the other name for truth," is a cheap quality—the refuge, it is to be feared, of shallow minds. But Jeremiah is not properly described in such a formula. He, and moderns of his class, have an undoubted background of perception and knowledge. They may sound alarms, may speak in gloomy tones, but their burden is of hope and their pleading is for the preservation of the very foundation principles of causes or of communities. Readers of Harold Begbie's (?) characterization of Dean Inge in "Painted Windows" will recognize that the dean is in the Jeremiah class. His gloomy atmosphere is but a shadow of an intense moral earnestness, or of a "living concern," if we may use a Quaker phrase. It is after all the frivolous background of a thoughtless world that makes such men seem to be prophets of gloom. So it behooves Friends to "stop, look and listen," before the danger signals of the Anglican dean.

As one reads his analysis of Quakerism it is apparent that he is deeply instructed in its history and profoundly sensible of its serviceable contribution to religious thought. The change of "the centre of gravity in religion from authority to experience," the "untouched foundation of Quakerism" in "the crumbling of traditional theology", are salient points treated in his article with revealing understanding. His conclusion that "the safeguard of mysticism is the belief that we have not merely to renounce the world of ordinary experience, but to find its deeper and more spiritual meanings, and so to advance the knowledge of God, the world and ourselves, that every aspect of our experience may be exalted and consecrated together"—this conclusion, one may readily observe, epitomizes the Society's successes and failures during two centuries of history. When confined merely to "renouncing the world" how pitifully poor have Friends (or other religionists) been. On the other hand, finding [mysticism's] deeper and more spiritual meanings, has indeed "advanced the knowledge of God" and enabled the Society to make worthy contributions to the progress of the world, as well as to the unchallenged catalogue of saints.

These brief references and quotations may serve to indicate to those who have not read the dean's article how clear a perception he has of the fundamental theory and practice of Quakerism. With such an understanding the "danger signals" as defined by him, should have place, it may be said without hesitation, with Friends everywhere. "They are threatened," he says, "with two dangers; one of being assimilated to other Protestant organizations, and so losing their distinctive testimony and their peculiar strength; the other, that of being entangled in social politics, and so carried out of the religious atmosphere altogether."

On our side of the Atlantic, and particularly in the conservative circle, the first named danger may seem to be directed to the majority type of Friends' meetings. These have programmed services, arranged and led by pastors and conform so nearly "to other Protestant organizations" as to be hardly recognizable as having any Quaker stamp. Very probably this situation was in the dean's thought, but he was actually dealing with a far-reaching principle, as his article shows, and not alone with a specific violation of it. Do we appreciate how far we can go in the process of "being assimilated" without abandoning the ancient forms? Duly recommended ministers, regularly appointed elders and overseers, even committees set aside in the usual way, to say nothing of secretaries and strong executive boards, will not safeguard the Society of Friends, if it is not keenly sensitive to its basic principles. The dean's chief service is in giving this basic principle clear expression. After a word as to the second danger signal it will be well to focus attention on that point.

The idea of "being entangled in social politics and so carried out of the religious atmosphere altogether," which is the second danger signal, might seem to be a veiled thrust at social work as such. The dean's record makes it clear that this is not his intention. Closely analyzed it carries us back to that oft-repeated thought that all the activities and interests of life should have the religious motive. He would join Friends in the effort to break down the distinction between religious and secular. A social gospel with religion left out is as meaningless to him as it should be to Friends. Let us maintain that ancient position. Our modern world needs nothing more than that.

The constructive side of the dean's warning is of course what concerns us most. What really is the basis of his objection to having Friends "assimilated to other Protestant organizations?" At a time when the general call is for unity, why should a dean of the Anglican church appeal to us to maintain our separateness? He says that the doctrine of "the immanence of God is increasingly recognized by Friends themselves," and he adds that "it is a doctrine which appeals to the present generation." But he knows, we all know when we think about it, that a doctrine, a principle, a message, will not save individuals or groups. In that keenly analytic "Life of George Fox," by the trained historian, Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, it is claimed that as great as George Fox's message was, his method of life and work—the method* he expressed in his organization of the Society of Friends was far greater. That, it is definitely urged, is his special contribution. Others had expressed the message quite as convincingly, some much more powerfully than Fox. But he established a method of practicing immanence in every day life and in the affairs of the Church that has kept a small body alive, and potent for good, during two-and-one-half centuries. Doubtless it is this method of immanence that the dean wishes us to preserve and transmit. Shall we be moved from this by the force of the urge for efficiency, and in competition with such highly perfected organization as other denominations are using? Is it not in essence the old conflict between a religion of authority and the religion of the Spirit? Can we not still hear the pathetic words, as we pursue a prescribed way rather than seek an inspired one, "Oh ye of little faith?"

TUCKERTON, N. J.

J. HENRY BARTLETT.

FRIENDS MUST HELP!

An international "No More War" Day will be observed in ten countries on Seventh Month 29th, running over to the 30th and it has become of very great importance that the American people shall renew at this time the demonstration for peace which was so impressive and influential during the period of the Washington Conference. A persistent effort is being made to prevent further progress in the outlawry of war by a revival of the old outcry against "pacifism." Our army officers have recently been given orders authorizing propaganda in support of our military policy, but forbidding criticism of it without special permission. Our Assistant Secretary of the Navy and others have announced that our reserve officers are to be organized in Ninth Month to advance "the military policy of the United States as expressed in the Act of Congress of June 4, 1920." A militaristic revival is on foot and it is under the leadership of members of our War and Navy Departments. Only an overwhelming expression of world opinion in favor of unceasing progress towards the substitution for war of world organization in some form will be adequate to overcome the forces that oppose it. The National Council for Reduction of Armaments, of which Frederick J. Libby is Executive Secretary, appeals to Friends everywhere to rise as one man to meet the situation that confronts us. Shall we drift back into barbarism or are we going resolutely forward to achieve permanent peace?

WHAT OTHERS ARE DOING.

The National Council informs us that parades are being arranged in New York City, Milwaukee and elsewhere, similar to those that will be conducted abroad, but that the day will be observed chiefly in three or four ways in which Friends can well participate wherever they may be.

1. Order posters immediately which bear the slogan, "No More War," from the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, 532 Seventeenth Street, Northwest, Washington, D. C., paying the cost price of 25 cents per hundred, which includes postage. These posters are to appear simultaneously on the morning of Seventh-day, Seventh Month 29th, in windows and on automobiles, fences and trees, wherever the law allows, in cities and towns and on country roads, all the way from Eastport, Maine, to Puget Sound. The State W. C. T. U. of Georgia ordered 43,000 for their use in Georgia alone. The National Y. W. C. A., the Women's International League, the Foreign Policy Association, the Fellowship of Reconciliation and the National League of Women Voters, have endorsed the idea and their State and City groups in all parts of the country are ordering posters. When other organizations are taking so strong a stand in a "No More War" demonstration, the Friends must not hold back.

2. Give your local editor the story of "No More War" Day with the request that he participate in the nationwide expression of the universal longing. A special publicity story can be obtained by application to the National Council.

3. Ask the ministers of your town to make clear in the services on First-day, the 30th, that they stand firmly for further progress on practical lines in the direction of world peace. Remember that on this issue Catholics, Protestants and Hebrews are united.

4. On Seventh Month 29th—and this is particularly important in view of world conditions—write or telegraph President Harding that he will have your support in further steps towards permanent peace. Address your letter or telegram to The President, The White House, Washington, D. C. One sentence will carry the message.

5. First-day, the 30th, churches and meetings everywhere should circulate petitions or adopt resolutions of similar import for immediate transmission to President Harding. Such a petition might read in whole or in part substantially as follows:

TO THE PRESIDENT,

The White House, Washington, D. C.—

We assure the Administration of our support in further steps along the path on which the world entered at the Washington Conference until war has been outlawed and permanent peace has been achieved. We favor American recognition of the World Court at The Hague, American participation in the reconstruction of Europe, and the outlawry of war by international agreement.

WHAT WILL YOUR MEETING DO?

Experience shows that good intentions alone accomplish nothing. The world drifted into the last war because of the apathy of the peoples who later paid a bitter price for their indifference. Your meeting will be missing in the roll call on the 29th of active workers for peace unless you who read these lines accept your responsibility to do your full part to end war by every means that offers. Send for posters at once, regardless of what others do, and see that they are used effectively at the time appointed. Urge your friends to write or telegraph to the President on the 29th with the earnestness that they would show if the next war were upon us. Get signatures to a petition, carefully written in advance of the meeting. There is no reason why the circulation of this petition should not begin at once. Then take it to your meeting for completion. Be thorough, be earnest. Don't spare yourself. Colonel Frederic Palmer said in Washington last winter that he should not put much faith in the success of the peace movement until he saw in pacifists the same devotion that he found among the boys at the front. This is a challenge to you. Do your full part.

[The foregoing will appear this week in various Friends' papers in the United States. The copy has been prepared at the Washington Office, 532 Seventeenth Street, N. W. If

Friends and others allied with them could be as active in their propaganda as members of the War Department are in theirs, no one can guess the issue of such a campaign as the one suggested. The very fact that we have no "axe to grind," and that our salaries are not directly associated with the outcome must not allow us to be in the least degree lukewarm.—Eds.]

H. T. HODGKIN'S VISIT TO PHILADELPHIA.

Henry T. and Elizabeth Joy Hodgkin are sailing for England on the eighth instant, having been absent from home for nearly two years. Most of this time has been spent in visiting missions and educational institutions in China. They were stationed in northwest China as missionaries from 1905 to 1910, and so are well able to estimate the changes which have taken place and are still in progress in China.

During their short stay in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, they have spoken at many gatherings of Friends and others, arousing intense interest in the problems, particularly the mission problems, of the Far East. Some of the points touched upon in three of these meetings will be briefly stated in what follows:

At Friends' Institute, on Second-day afternoon, Seventh Month 3rd, the Executive Board of Friends' Foreign Missionary Association and the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Missions met to hear suggestions in regard to mission policy in the Far East. E. Joy Hodgkin told some incidents illustrating the increasing part taken by women in outside affairs in recent time.

Henry T. Hodgkin expressed satisfaction that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has taken steps to bring the work of its members in connection with foreign missions into direct relation to the Yearly Meeting. He told how the work among Friends in England had been for many years carried on by an organization having no official connection with the Yearly Meeting, and how gradually this association had come into closer and closer relation to the Meeting, until the mission board is now chosen in the first instance in the various Quarterly Meetings, each appointing some members. These, who constitute a majority of the whole number, nominate the remaining members to the annual meeting of the Missionary Association, which all Friends are privileged to attend.

After a very appreciative review of the work being done by our Mission in Japan, he gave some account of his visits among influential men in Tokyo in the interest of improving the relations between China and Japan. In this work the co-operation of Gilbert Bowles, in introducing Dr. Hodgkin to the men he wished to meet, was most essential. The cordial spirit in which he was received, the respectful hearing accorded to his frank recital of the existing difficulties, and the crucial questions which were asked by the listeners, all point to a real desire on the part of those in authority in Japan to get at the root of the troubles and try to cure them.

In considering the future of the work of our Mission in Japan, Dr. Hodgkin offered his opinion that it would be well to concentrate on three kinds of work. First, public affairs, with special reference to international relations. This is the line in which most of Gilbert Bowles' effort has been directed for a long time. Second, work for women. The Girls' School in Tokyo and the work of Minnie P. Bowles have given this department a high relative importance. Third, work among college students. While Horace Coleman was with the Mission he did a good deal of work of this character, and the speaker expressed great satisfaction that Thomas Jones, in his teaching at Keio University, has a favorable opening for influencing the coming men of Japan toward Christian ideals.

He believes that among students, who are becoming impatient of authority in control of subjects of thought, there is a strong drift toward what may be called the early Quaker point of view.

Dr. Hodgkin's final point was the relation between individual concern and corporate concern. This relation was long ago worked out in harmonious fashion with reference to the affairs of traveling ministers and a great variety of other matters, individual concerns being laid before meetings for discipline for their judgment. When such a concern is approved it becomes the corporate concern of the meeting which approves it, and the meeting then assumes responsibility, more or less complete, for carrying out the concern. The part which the individual himself takes in executing the concern may then be different from what he anticipated.

A parallel example is that of Dr. Livingstone, who volunteered for missionary work in China, and was sent by the London Society to Africa instead. His work in Africa is a sufficient evidence of the rightness of this change.

At West Chester on the same evening, in the Chestnut Street Meeting-house, Dr. Hodgkin spoke on the general situation in the Far East. He explained how the prevalence of brigandage is a direct result of the civil war, defeated and disbanded soldiers becoming brigands quite generally. In fact, the soldiers are often no less a scourge than brigands, looting stores when their commanders fail to pay them.

The present situation in China, Dr. Hodgkin thinks, is more promising than any which has obtained recently, perhaps since the death of Yuan Shi Kai. Practically all of China is under one authority, and the new President is at least an honest man, and one who promises to carry out progressive policies. He announces that he will devote all his salary and perquisites as President to educational needs. During the period of anarchy, educational matters have been sadly neglected.

A very interesting part of this address dealt with the conference of Chinese and Japanese Christians, held at Hangchow at Dr. Hodgkin's instance. The number of delegates was small. The conference lasted a week, and the relations between the two countries were discussed in the most fundamental way. One day was spent in a statement by the Chinese of the grievances which their countrymen entertain against Japan. Many of these were not before known to the Japanese representatives, who were very sorry to learn of such abuses. The whole conference was a "get together" occasion, and the delegates found it possible to develop mutual confidence and appreciation, based on their common faith. A student conference at Peking soon after carried the good work further, a feature of this occasion being fellowship meetings arranged by the Chinese delegates for the Japanese, in which both participated with the greatest cordiality.

In the meeting-house on Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, on Fourth-day evening, Seventh Month 5th, a representative audience of Friends heard Henry Hodgkin present the challenge of the Orient, particularly China, to the Society of Friends. Statistics fail to show the real hold which the religion of Jesus Christ has already taken on the life of China. Many of her outstanding men are known as aggressively Christian, and it is being increasingly recognized that probity is an element of character to be normally expected in a Christian man.

The old idea that the authority of the past is absolute has been discredited in many respects. In this revolt against outward authority, it is not surprising that religious teaching which appeals to the spiritual faculty of the individual rather than to some external standard has a special attraction for the forward-looking Oriental. A young Chinese Christian who had come to England to study just before the outbreak of the war was bewildered by what he heard in the great churches. The preachers were presenting something which he could not recognize as consonant with the teaching of Christ. He became so discouraged that he concluded he had made a mistake, stopped reading the Bible and left off praying. Then he found a little book* by Dr. Hodgkin which showed that there were Christians who understood the teaching of Christ as he had understood it. He came to the writer of the book with his troubles, and was soon rejoicing in the recovery of his faith.

A recent writer made use of a well-known fact in the treatment of disease to illustrate what has taken place to a great extent in the countries of the West with regard to Christianity. It is well known that there is no such thing as a Christian nation, and a reason why there are so few thorough-going Christians is because they have been inoculated with an attenuated virus which has given them an exceedingly mild form of Christianity and rendered them immune from taking the real thing. Romain Rolland expressed it by saying that we have modified the message of Christ to conform to our mediocrity.

The Oriental has not been protected by this inoculation, and is liable to the full fervor of the unmodified disease. At a missionary conference a whole day had been spent most unprofitably in a somewhat acrimonious dispute on theological matters. This sort of wrangling among the missionaries has done and is doing untold harm to the work of missions. At the close of this dispute, one of the Chinese who had witnessed it said to one of the missionaries, "If you could only leave matters like that to us Chinese, we would settle them very easily." The Oriental approaches problems of the Christian life with a mind unclouded by the effect of centuries of bickering, and he is better able than we to distinguish which is vital and which is non-essential.

This not only do the Chinese need us, but we need the Chinese. It is not to be desired that sectarian divisions be perpetuated in the Chinese Christian Church, but the Society of Friends has something to offer in aiding the Chinese to get at the real fundamental message of Christ.

A National Christian Council has been created, consisting entirely of Chinese, and this body has testified its appreciation of the Quaker point of view by inviting Dr. Hodgkin to come back to China for a term of years as some sort of advisory secretary. Whether this invitation will be accepted is yet undecided.

In the course of his address, Dr. Hodgkin referred to the work of Joseph and Edith Platt at Mukden. At the close of the meeting, among those who came forward to speak to the Hodgkins were the parents of Joseph Platt. Another was Charles H. Haines, son of Robert B. Haines, who is soon to sail for the East, to teach in the Canton Christian College.

"THEREFORE BE STRONG, BE STRONG,
Ye that remain, nor fruitlessly revolve,
Darkling, the riddles which ye cannot solve,
But do the works that unto you belong,
Believing that for every mystery,
For all the death, the darkness and the curse
Of this dim universe,
Needs a solution full of love must be:
And that the way whereby ye may attain
Nearest to this, is not thro' broodings vain,
And half rebellious questionings of God,
But by a patient seeking to fulfil
The purpose of His everlasting will,
Treading the path which lowly men have trod."

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

About the year 1836 my desire to engage in some rural occupation led me to purchase a small farm just outside of the then improved part of West Philadelphia. On this it was my intention to establish a nursery of trees, etc., but this plan did not succeed and was abandoned. The place was held for several years, and afforded me and the children many pleasant hours. We called it Hillside. It was finally sold. It was I think in 1837 that I accompanied Thomas Kite in his religious visit to the meetings of Caln Quarterly Meeting, and at another time to the meetings of Bucks Quarterly Meeting. The mingling with our country friends and partaking of their kind hospitality was pleasant to me. In the fall of 1842 I felt it right to offer to accompany our beloved friends, Regina Shober and Jane Johnson, to Baltimore Yearly Meeting, and the meetings composing it. Our dear friend Regina had not been accustomed to public conveyances, and I therefore procured a carriage and pair for the journey. We were the greater part of three days in reaching Baltimore, lodging two nights by the way at the houses of Friends where we were kindly entertained. Arriving at Baltimore we were favored with a delightful home with Galloway and Margaret Cheston during the Yearly Meeting. When this closed we left for a place called Indian Spring, where a small meeting was kept up by some interesting Friends named Hopkins. Two or three of these were single sisters, living in a humble cottage, very neat and simple. As Regina stepped over their threshold, she felt, as she remarked afterward, that "the Son of Peace was there." We attended their meeting and soon after left for Goose Creek, where we were kindly entertained by our friends Hannah Hoge and her daughter, one of whom had been our companion from Baltimore. At this place we attended their Monthly Meeting. The Clerk being absent, a valuable elderly Friend named John Griffith was desired to act. He quaintly remarked he "had not been used to clerking," but he took the pen and succeeded well. Our next destination was Hopewell near Winchester to which place we were accompanied by our friend John Griffith. We crossed the Blue Ridge and enjoyed the fine scenery. The meeting at Hopewell was principally composed of the children and grandchildren of John Griffith, a numerous and interesting company. Several of them came on horseback, brother and sister on the same horse, quite in primitive style. There are memorable historical reminiscences connected with this locality. It was to this place that a number of prominent Friends of Philadelphia were exiled during the war of the Revolution, on account of their conscientious refusal to participate in the war, or to aid it in any form. Some of them laid down their lives there, and we were shown their graves. We were now in the Shenandoah Valley, which is very fertile, but has some of the worst roads I have ever traveled over. The mud was deep, and rocks and great holes filled with water abounded. The greatest care was needed in driving even at a slow walk lest there should be broken springs. As we were about starting, one of the young men, knowing by experience the condition of the roads, said he pitied me in the prospect of our journey. We got through the worst without accident, and crossing over into Pennsylvania reached Gettysburg. On our arrival, to my great surprise, we were met by my dear friend Stephen P. Morris, who informed me he had been sent to take my place as my presence was required at home on account of the alarming illness of my daughter Margaret with scarlet fever. This was a great blow under the fearful uncertainty of my seeing her again in life. I took the earliest conveyance homeward. On my way I opened the New Testament and the first passage that met my eye was the miraculous recovery of the daughter of Jairus, she being the same age as my dear Margaret. This seemed like a ray of hope which comforted and sustained me, and I have ever regarded it as a favor from my Heavenly Father. When I reached home I found the dear child living, though so ill that it was thought best I should not see her until there was some improvement, which under the Divine blessing soon took place. The next year, 1843, proved a memorable one in our religious life. It was thought best by several of our elder Friends that we should send an invitation to John Pease, a beloved minister residing at Darlington, England, who had been liberated for religious service in America. This after serious reflection my dear wife and I concluded it would be right to do. He arrived in the autumn and we soon felt him to be a dear personal friend. To aid him in his religious concern became a pleasant duty. Many Friends being desirous to meet him, our parlors were often occupied, and frequently large companies were assembled. These occasions were often times of spiritual refreshment, and we felt that a blessing rested upon our household. In his social character John Pease was very pleasing and instructive, and he became more and more one with us in the domestic circle. In the Third Month of 1844, his religious concern led him to the New England States and I was invited to become his companion in travel—I met him at Salem, Mass., at the house of Wm. Henry Chase, who then resided there. We went on to Portland where we were joined by John D. Lang. A great snow-storm had covered the country and we commenced our journey in sleighs which we found a pleasant mode of traveling. Meetings were held at Salem, Portland, Berwick, Vassalboro and many other places much to the satisfaction of Friends and their neighbors. We became much attached to the dear Friends of those parts who welcomed us very cordially to their homes. After visiting the meetings in Maine we returned to Dover in New Hampshire. Thence we went on to Wolfsoord on Lake Winnepesaukee where we lodged. During the night there came up the most fearful snow-storm I had ever witnessed. Our journey for the next day was across the lake on the ice about seventeen miles. After breakfast a council was held as to the safety of travel on the lake. Several of the Friends were in doubt about it, but they said there was one man who could guide us over the trackless ice, and if he was willing to go it might be accomplished. About 10 A. M., there being a little lull in the gale, our guide came, and we determined to go on in two small sleighs, I riding with the guide. In a few minutes we lost sight of land, and the terrible storm increased, driving the snow in our faces. It was impossible to use umbrellas, so that we were much exposed.

CANADA YEARLY MEETING, 1922.

The opening session of Canada Yearly Meeting of Friends was held at Norwich, Ontario, on Sixth-day, the twenty-third of Sixth Month. After a period of worship the business of the meeting was taken up. Mordecai F. Starr and Janet H. Pollard served efficiently as Clerks. Minutes for five visiting Friends were read: David Holloway of Ohio; Thomas W. Fisher and Alfred Lowry of Philadelphia; Sybil J. Barker of North Carolina, and Anne E. Warner of England. Other visiting Friends were Eliza Holloway, Solomon Barker, Henry B. Leeds, Anna and Adelia Crawford, Elisabeth Harmer, Ruth Brown, Charlotte Wood and daughter Rachel. Nineteen members of Scipio Quarter in New York State were present. Meals were served in the basement of the Meeting-house, which made it possible for the meeting to adjourn for dinner and finish the business of the day at an afternoon session.

Meetings of Ministers and Elders were held both Fifth-day afternoon and Seventh-day forenoon. At the latter session a meeting was appointed for the young people for First-day evening. This made three meetings for worship that day; the morning was a time of spiritual refreshment, and in the evening our Friends Marianne V. Wood and Alfred Lowry were especially favored in their ministry to the younger Friends.

Second-day a long business session was held in which a great degree of Divine guidance was manifest. In speaking of this meeting afterwards one of our visiting Friends remarked that it was his ideal of a Friends' meeting. One matter of interest was the sending of a letter of commendation to the Attorney-General of Ontario for his earnest work in behalf of Temperance. The report of the Relief Committee showed that $1000 in money and clothing had been sent abroad during the year. This committee was continued for another year. There was a large epistle committee appointed which was enabled to discharge its duties in a very satisfactory way.

Third-day morning was the last business session. In its exercises our visiting Ministers took considerable part. The address to the absent members caused a great deal of sympathy to be expressed for our smaller meetings. As it contains much of the exercises of the various sessions, we print it below. A final meeting for worship was held in the afternoon. The meeting was adjourned to meet next year at Norwich where, at the present time, there are more Friends and some large families who could not attend if they had farther to go.

Sixth-day evening there was an interesting meeting held under the auspices of the Good Will Literary Union of Norwich. A paper by Elma McG. Starr was the keynote of the discussion of the evening. Many lively testimonies and much good advice were handed forth. There were also some very good recitations given by our young people.

Second-day evening, Henry B. Leeds and Alfred Lowry talked to us in an intimate way on very interesting subjects. They gave to us from their rich store of personal experiences. Henry B. Leeds told something of Tunessassa and his work among the Indians, while Alfred Lowry gave an account of his journey to Central Europe as companion to James Henderson of Ohio. At the close of this meeting, as in many of the others, we felt we were brought together as one family at the Master's footstool.

It was my first experience in attending so small a Yearly Meeting and from it I am convinced that numbers do not in the least determine the amount of strength to be gained from such gatherings.

NORWICH, ONT.

LUCINDA STRATTON POLLARD.

ADDRESS TO ABSENT MEMBERS.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

At this time, when we have again met together as a Yearly Meeting, those of our number who are not present with us are often in our thoughts; and we desire that you, too, may enjoy with us the refreshing of spirit, and the strengthening of desire, and the renewal of courage, which through condescending grace, we have experienced. It is with this earnest hope in our hearts that we endeavor in this letter to gather together the fragments of the feast, remembering that the bread blessed and broken by our Heavenly Father alone satisfieth "the longing soul."

We have with us at this time many Friends from a distance, ministers of the Gospel and others, whose presence has been a comfort and a strength to us, and we are deeply grateful to our Heavenly Father who has strengthened and preserved these fathers and mothers in Israel, so that we may be again encouraged by their presence. It has been earnestly pleaded that the soil of our hearts may be fallow for the precious seed of Truth; and we have been comforted with the thought that God who sends the message will prepare the way for it, for He has said, "So shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth. It shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please; and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."

A care has been felt for the growth and enlargement of our Society, and we have been reminded again that only in waiting upon God can we find a true spiritual growth, for "they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint."

The reading of the Queries with their answers has led to a deep and thoughtful consideration of our spiritual condition, not only as a Society, but as individuals; and it has been brought to our remembrance that this consistent searching of heart before the Lord, while often humbling to our self-esteem, is of great assistance in our spiritual life. The fact that, while we obey in letter, we may fail in a real, spiritual obedience, has been also brought before us; and it has been questioned whether we in reality attend our meetings for worship if we are present in body, but with a mind wandering away to worldly things; and whether we "read the Scriptures in our families" if, though we pronounce the words of the text, a few moments later (or even in the reading) they are entirely lost from mind.

An earnest invitation has been extended to all to "taste and see that the Lord is good," for he "satisfieth the longing soul and filleth the hungry soul with goodness," and from the living waters of his salvation "every one that thirsteth" may drink. We have been deeply impressed with the great truth that wisdom is not to be found in intellectual effort or attainment, but is from above and "cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning." It is to the word of God in our own hearts that we must look for inspiration and guidance. Faithfulness to this inner word will bring us peace and joy in this present life, and "in the world to come life everlasting."

We have been reminded that our Lord has said, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." And again, "And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee saying, 'This is the way, walk ye in it,' when ye turn to the right hand and when ye turn to the left," and have been again admonished to acknowledge Him in all our ways, and wait for His directing of our paths. We have been urged to submit to this Divine guidance in all the ways of life; being ready to give up our own way and our own wills to follow Him. In this waiting obedience we may be humbled, but we shall never be humiliated; and we shall be directed in a true and living service of our Lord—a service of love which will be like that at the marriage in Cana of Galilee where they filled the water-pots "to the brim."

The young have been earnestly urged to seek the God of their fathers, being reminded that if they seek Him, He will be found of them, a precious Seed deep in their own hearts, to which, if they give heed, God will give growth and life. They have been encouraged to be faithful in following the dictates of Divine guidance, and prepare earnestly to take up the burdens which soon the older members of our Society must be called upon to resign.

A general concern for the welfare and a feeling of deep love for the members of the smaller meetings of our Yearly Meeting have been felt at this time. Desires have been expressed that they may be encouraged in faithfulness in attendance at mid-week meetings as well as at those held on First-days, and that each individual member may feel as his own the weight of the responsibility of the meeting. Mid-week meetings are often our best meetings, because of the sacrifice made in attending them. We are reminded in this connection that our Lord has said, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

We have been comforted and encouraged in the assurance that God is Love. Jesus desired that his disciples should follow Him because they loved Him. There is no adequate service where love is lacking.

We have been reminded also that our Lord desires His people to be "overcomers;" that His grace is sufficient for us, for His strength is made perfect in weakness; and that, though weak and poor in our own strength, in Him we shall do valiantly, for He it is that shall tread down our enemies. "He that overcometh," He has said, "will I make a pillar in the temple of God." "I will not blot his name out of the book of life." "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me, in My throne, as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne."

We have been led to feel a renewed thankfulness for our communion is with God, and that we are not alone dependent on the spoken word of His ministry; but may all be taught in our hearts of Him; and that as man does not give, so, while we remain close to our Divine Lord, man cannot mar this "peace of God which passeth understanding."

JAPAN NOTES.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF EDITH SHARPLESS.

During Edith Newlin's visit to Mito we made numerous calls on the Nicholsons. One was a picnic lunch which we brought with us and ate around the table. Another was a dinner to which they invited us to meet the bank president and his wife. We talked intermittingly Japanese and English, and had a very pleasant evening.

Madeline takes everybody up to see the baby, and every one is thrilled, of course, for Virginia is a remarkably good and happy little baby. I think it a grand education for the people, too, to see the effects of not picking her up every time she cries. One of my kindergarten mothers asked to be introduced, and went to see her get her bath. She was much impressed and promised to do likewise with her own.

EXTRACTS FROM TWO OF THE ESSAYS READ AT THE GRADUATION EXERCISES AT THE FRIENDS' GIRLS' SCHOOL, TOKYO, THIRD MONTH 28, 1922.

Fuka Oishi spoke on "Women and Peace," in part as follows: "One of the great questions in the world today is peace. People have recognized the necessity of it, and since the war they are thinking very earnestly about how to bring peace into the world. I think it is good for us here today to think about women in their relation to peace.

"Some Japanese women have already begun this work. The Women's Peace Society was organized a few years ago, and the members are thinking about peace and working for the peace of Japan. Last year Madam Yajima went to America, taking a letter signed by ten thousand Japanese women to President Harding. We all know that it was the statement that these Japanese women are wishing for the peace of the world in earnest. Madam Yajima's eagerness, in spite of her old age, has melted the hearts of many people in the lands she has visited, and her influence in her own country is very great."

Minako Ikegami wrote on "Three Phases of Tokyo City." "The future Tokyo city must be the most convenient and well arranged city in the world. In Tokyo there are still so few schools that many young people are suffering for want of them. If young people cannot be educated, after they become men and women, they cannot live their best."

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

Commenting again on the London General Epistle which we hope all our readers have pondered and which appeared as the leading article in a recent issue of THE FRIEND, this comment is made:—

The Epistle, addressed to Friends Everywhere, is the shortest we have ever had. As brought in by the Committee of twenty-five, it had but one direct quotation, but the four lines from the poem by William C. Braithwaite were introduced in the Large Committee in response to a widely expressed desire. The marginal references (which show in the original, but which we have not reproduced) indicate how closely the thought of the Epistle follows the teaching of the New Testament. A few Friends were uneasy at the emphasis on the human side of the life of Jesus, but it was not found possible to add to the Epistle, which was left with its one message, stated as simply and shortly as possible.

One who has been a regular attendant at London Yearly Meeting and who has been present at the final session when the reading of this document brings the Meeting to a solemn close writes:—

"Then came the reading of the General Epistle—briefer than usual—in the quiet, attentive atmosphere which we have learned to associate with this closing chapter of our Yearly Meeting."

It was a matter of unusual interest that Lord Robert Cecil figured on the program in one of the evening meetings, which like our own are given over to addresses on special topics.

He was pleasantly introduced by the presiding officer—who expressed a satisfaction at seeing him "on the upward path." To this bit of pleasantry our correspondent writes, Lord Robert responded and remarked that the Chairman had greeted him with true Christian charity as "a brand plucked from the burning." This put the speaker on good terms with his audience. He evidently tried to go as far as he possibly could in the direction of the Quaker pacifist position and went further than some of his audience expected. Amongst other things, he referred to that "curious but widespread delusion, a belief in force." Lady Parmoor expounded clearly and faithfully the Quaker principle that all war is un-Christian, basing her argument on the teaching of Jesus and the statements of George Fox. It was good for the people who do not hold the absolute pacifist view (of whom there were many in the large audience) to be given the pure milk of the Quaker Gospel of Peace.

The demand for the New Book of Discipline exceeded the most sanguine expectation of Friends. Our readers will recall the review of Part I published in THE FRIEND a few weeks since, written by Anna Moore Cadbury; about the same date a similar review of the same appeared in The Friend (London).

Those who have not procured and read this Part I of the London Book of Discipline have a real treat in store when they do gain access to it. A Friend in commenting on it said: "The book is one which should be used by Friends. It may be found useful in connection with family reading. Where Monthly Meetings are in the habit of giving copies of the Book of Discipline to newly admitted members, they should remember especially to include Part I."

When the consideration of the work of the Book Shop was before the meeting, Friends spoke with much freedom on the value of the written word as a teaching agent. The task Philadelphia Yearly Meeting seems called to, through its Extension Committee, found able exposition from many Friends.

The value of the printed word was emphasized in many ways; one Friend said: "The printed word reaches hundreds, perhaps thousands, where the spoken word only reaches units." Satisfaction was felt that through the influence of the Central Literature Board and other kindred efforts, Preparative Meeting Libraries were no longer merely places where ancient leather-bound volumes are carefully preserved and never used, and have become means for spreading the Truth. Use is being made of the public press to spread the Quaker message. Several Friends spoke of the value of the work of the various central organizations connected with printing and publishing and urged the need of more co-ordination. We were reminded too that it is not merely a question of Quaker literature in a narrow sense, but that for young and old, wholesome reading is necessary, and our usefulness should extend beyond our own borders.

It was not to be expected that a topic like the Book Shop should escape all pointed criticism, especially in view of this year's deficit. On the whole, however, the sentiment of hope prevailed and encouragement was offered the Committee in charge of the store, with the honest expectation that another year would show better results.

In considering the Education of the children the statement was made that the cost per pupil in the English Friends' schools is just double what it was in 1914. Friends have an increased responsibility to see that children are not, through limited means, deprived of the opportunities of a Friends' Boarding School, and they need equally to care for the other 50 per cent. who attend day schools and depend on the meeting for Quaker nurture.

Fitting references were appropriately made to the life of service at Ackworth of Frederick Andrews. Schoolmasters and teachers and committee men and women, identified with our Friends' schools in America, would find much of stimulation in the character of this Quaker schoolmaster.

When statistics were called for, the figures showed that a little more than 50 per cent. of Friends' children were at Friends' schools. There were 750 in attendance last year and 735 this. This would give the approximate number of children in the Yearly Meeting as 1500.

Touching the Foreign Missionary efforts, many statements were made which have the air of novelty to most of us, because our lives do not even remotely touch the people referred to. This especially applies to the Missions in Madagascar and India. Of the former one in attendance said he represented 20,000 people who met together in our meetings in Madagascar each Sabbath in the 207 meetings for worship in the Island. Without education, the Malagasy were a most patient and loving people; but what, he asked, could be the state of mind of a people whose children of six or seven or eight years of age learn all the secrets of adult life? There was a great willingness on the part of the people to learn; if we would send the teachers, they would provide schools, etc. The Malagasy had a great contribution to bring to our Church; we had a large body of native Friends who were ready and willing to take the message to their own people; but the time had not yet come when we could assist to educate and help those who were doing that great work.

Of the work in India a Friend remarked that there was hardly a more hopeful thing in the world than the great movement led by Ghandi, which seemed to him a great piece of practical Christianity. If we compared that great movement and sentiment of non-resistance with the state of this country only two or three years ago, it would seem strange that anybody could speak of Christian England sending out missionaries to the non-Christian East. Following a discussion of unusual power, the Clerk offered a minute, of which the following is a portion:—

"We have been told of non-Christian visitors to the Friends' settlement of Calcutta who, while unwilling to accept Western dogma, and church system, are yet anxious to lead their lives after the pattern of Jesus Christ; and the Christian teaching shown in the non-resistance side of the national movement in India has been made evident to us. With these evidences of doors opening for service we have been urged to take any opportunities that may offer by personal contact and friendships to bridge the gulf between East and West. While the practical working of the Mission Stations is being rapidly transferred to the communities on the spot, and while it is true that the future of the churches founded by our missionaries in the East must depend more and more on the native adherents gathered to them, there will still be a place for the Home Base. Our standards and methods of education are being adopted and we must continue to send out educational and spiritual leaders."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE CHOSEN MAID.—Many, many years ago in a little town of Palestine lived a young girl named Mary, about fourteen years of age. Mary had often visited the magnificent Temple in Jerusalem, set high upon a hill, its gilded front blazing with the reflection of the morning sun; but imagine her surprise and awe when one morning a servant of that great Temple appeared at the door of her humble home with a special message, summoning her, the young maiden, to accompany him to the Temple.

"The high priest bids you come," the servant said. "What would the high priest with his humble servant?" asked the gentle maiden, not for a moment forgetting the reverence due to the religious ruler of her people, though she could scarcely find breath to shape the words.

"There hath been held a council of the priests," answered the servant, "in which it hath been decreed that a new veil must be made for the Temple, to hang before the Holy of Holies. It is to be woven of linen, with embroideries of many colors, blue and scarlet and purple and gold. But that the work may be holy, undefiled by hands that have committed sin, the order has been given that seven pure maidens be summoned—maidens of the royal family of David—to spin the thread for the weaving. For this purpose hath the high priest summoned thee."

Mary's heart beat with rapture as she prepared herself to accompany him. Once, when she had visited the Temple with her father, she had looked past the altar where the priest was performing the sacrifice, through the open doorway into the Holy Place where none but the priests ever went; and far within she had seen the glimmering folds of the rich curtains that hung before the most sacred chamber of all—the Holy of Holies. If her heart had leaped within her then, how much more so now, when her own hands were to help in the making of newer, more beautiful curtains than those! How glad Mary was that she had not neglected the spinning her mother had taught her! She could not have offered anything but perfect work to the Temple of her God.

Soon Mary found herself in the Temple with six other young girls, all fair and shy and radiant with joy like herself. Before them stood the great high priest in his robe of many colors, with his heavy turban bearing on a golden diadem the words, "Holy to Jehovah."

"Bid them draw lots," he said, "for the colors they shall spin."

While the lots were arranged, the girls whispered among themselves. "There is gold thread," said one. "I would fain have that for my spinning."

"I choose the blue," another answered.

Mary did not speak, but her eyes were fixed upon the purple, the color of royalty. She was thinking of the stories her mother had told her about the great King David, her ancestor; and of a still greater King who should some day come to rule his people.

"Mary, come hither!" It was the high priest, calling her to draw the first lot.

"She shall weave the purple," she heard his voice pronounce when she had drawn. He bestowed a kindly smile upon her from under his austere, shaggy brows, as she took the purple flax that was placed in her arms and walked joyfully from the Temple. She was to weave the royal thread for the Temple of the Most High!

As the days went by, Mary would be seen in her home again, busy with her spindle, twisting the thread in even, perfect form; but her thoughts were busy with rainbow dreams, such as come to few young maidens. Visions passed before her eyes which she could not have told to anyone; visions in which the purple thread seemed always entwined.

Days passed and Mary again trod the road to the Temple, bearing the thread neatly spun and rolled, ready for the weaving. Would the high priest praise her work? Would he tell her the reason for the visions that had come to her while she toiled?

Trembling, she placed the work in his hands. The old priest reached out to bless her, saying, "Mary, the Lord God hath magnified thy name, and thou shalt be blessed in all the ages of the world."

Mary went away filled with joy, yet wondering more than ever what future awaited her; she felt that she was some day to give a greater service to the Most High than even this work of her loving hands.

She did not know then, but afterwards an angel told her, what this service was to be; she was to be the mother of Jesus, the Prince whom the prophets foretold. The greatest joy and the greatest sorrow that can come to womankind were awaiting her; and Mary accepted them as lovingly as she had accepted the task of spinning the purple thread.

This is one of the stories of the mother of Christ which were told in his own land, but were never printed in our Bible, because we cannot be sure that they are true as the Bible stories are; but we can enjoy it as a beautiful fable and a true picture of the gentle, pure girlhood Mary must have lived in order to be worthy to be the chosen maid.—Adapted from the Apocryphal Gospels.

He is the complete Christian who copies the image and likeness of God, who imitates God as far as possible, deficient in none of the things which contribute to the likeness, practising self-restraint and endurance, living righteously, reigning over the passions, bestowing of what he has as far as possible, and doing good both by word and deed.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

RATIFICATION OF THE WASHINGTON TREATIES.—The Prince Regent of Japan has approved the ratification of the treaties and resolutions concluded at the Washington Conference. As they had been previously approved by the Privy Council, their ratification by Japan is complete.

The bill for their ratification encountered no opposition in the English House of Lords, and yesterday was passed for the third time by the House of Commons. It now awaits royal approval, which is never withheld from an act three passed by the House of Commons.

The United States Senate ratified the Washington treaties in the spring, so the three great naval powers have now adopted them, and the naval reductions at least are an assured fact.

ACTIVITIES OF THE PEACE COMMITTEE.—The Peace Committee has under way several promising pieces of work, and is already planning for vigorous activity in the fall.

The letter entitled "Christendom for a Warless World," approved by both Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, and later by London Yearly Meeting, has met with an enthusiastic reception by the officers of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches. This organization concentrated its entire office force for a week on the task of mailing copies of the letter to twenty thousand clergymen in all parts of the United States. These are men who have shown interest in the problem of bringing peace to the world. Replies are being received now, with requests for six, a dozen, fifteen copies, in some cases more, for distribution in the congregations, or for use in Bible Classes or Study Groups.

Hamilton Holt, who, while editor of The Independent, was largely responsible for the development of the idea of the League to Enforce Peace, from which grew the League of Nations, acted as chairman of a publicity committee of the World Alliance, which distributed an account of the appeal to some three hundred newspapers throughout the United States. Such papers as the New York Times gave the story space.

Plans are being developed for an educational campaign at the state and county fairs in New Jersey, Delaware, and eastern Pennsylvania. It is hoped that members of local meetings will co-operate energetically in devising interesting features for this campaign. Needless to say, suggestions will be welcomed.

The Peace Committee is paying for sewing and knitting materials furnished to members of our Yearly Meeting who are making garments for the American Friends' Service Committee.

The Committee is preparing suggestions to be distributed to the teachers of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland for the appropriate observance of Armistice Day in the schools.

Robert G. Taylor, who has been acting as Disarmament Secretary, has resigned, and Richard R. Wood has been appointed in his place. Robert Taylor intended to join the Friends' Relief Mission in Russia, but at his doctor's advice has postponed his departure for a little while.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.—The Amended National Defense Act of 1920 is constantly appealed to by those who feel that the provisions of the Army Appropriations Act passed by Congress on Sixth Month 26th last are inadequate. The Defense Act of 1920 is an attempt to provide a skeleton army that can be easily filled in in case of war, and to provide for the military education of students in schools, colleges and universities, and of all interested citizens in summer training camps.

The frame work is provided by Chapter 1, Section 3, of the Act, which says:—

"The original peace establishment, including the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserve, shall include those divisions and other military organizations necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress."

Section 3a provides for a committee of officers, half from the General Staff, half from the Organized Reserve and the National Guard, to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the land forces of the United States.

Provision is made for officers and enlisted men to serve as instructors in schools, colleges and universities offering courses in military training, and at summer camps for members of the Organized Reserve, and for citizens who wish to spend their vacations in military training.

The present Appropriations Act reduces the number of officers from 17,000 to 12,000 as compared with the Defense Act, and the number of enlisted men from 247,000 to 125,000.

The Army and Navy Journal feels that while such a reduction in the number of enlisted men is serious, the reduction in the number of officers is disastrous, because under the National Defense Act, with the army too small for either peace or war, the number of officers should be determined by the amount of instruction to be given, not by the number of men to be commanded, and that 12,000 officers are not enough to give the instruction contemplated by the Defense Act.

It is hoped to present an analysis of both the Army and Navy Appropriation Acts in the near future. It is encouraging to note that in both appropriations and provisions for personnel, they are more moderate than the corresponding Acts of last year.

PRESIDENT A. LAWRENCE LOWELL, of Harvard University, has accepted the position of Vice-Chairman of the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments.

Current History reports that the Nobel Prize Committee proposes to introduce a bill in the Swedish Parliament for the provisional discontinuance of the Nobel Peace Prize Award.

CONDITIONS IN THE RUSSIAN FAMINE AREA.

BY MURRAY S. KENWORTHY.

[Murray S. Kenworthy, chief of the Russian Unit from Eleventh Month 1, 1921, to Sixth Month 1, 1922, returned home on Seventh Month 1st. He is the first worker to return since Anna Haines came back last autumn. His account of conditions during the winter shows that all reports about the severity of the famine are without exaggeration. The following extracts from his comprehensive report to the Service Committee covering every phase of the situation give an indication of the problems that the Unit has had to meet and of those which still confront it.]

When I went south of Buzuluk to Andrievka in Eleventh Month, many peasants had already died. Thousands were leaving, seeking more promising areas where food was to be had. Bones of animals which had died by the way were already bleaching by the wayside. Peasants were stripping the thatch from their house-roofs to feed their stock. In the village they told us that the last cat and dog had been eaten. The situation was desperate. People fell on their knees by the scores begging for food.

Passengers on the boat coming home told me that they had not thought conditions to be so bad as I reported them. They had not believed that people could be driven to eat the things they were reported to have eaten. Personally, I have seen enough to make me believe that practically anything might have been eaten. Bread made from grass flour, stuck together with glue from horses' hoofs was common. Harness leather broth was not unknown! Cannibalism was more than occasional. I have seen hundreds of dead bodies thrown, like cord-wood, into piles in the cemetery. I have walked around the dead lying in the streets. This continued until the day I left the area.

The Russian Government undertook to relieve this condition by obtaining food in the Ukraine, White Russia, Siberia and other more favored sections. The result was that some of this territory was, by this spring, reduced to famine conditions. Conservative estimates placed the starving in the Ukraine at four to five millions.

When I left Russia the combined efforts of all relief organizations were probably giving relief to well up to 10,000,000 people. But there were large untouched territories begging assistance. Over and over again we were compelled to tell delegations that we did not have food enough to come to their aid.

What the total population loss will be is beyond estimation at present. We have statistics for a part of our territory. Present figures indicate that the average loss is twenty-three per cent. for six months. Some volosts have lost forty-one per cent. in that time. What would have happened if we had not come? Whole villages would have died to the last man. In others, a few would have survived, and, along the railroad, many would have pulled through. The remote peasant villages would have suffered terribly."

LIVING CONDITIONS FOR THE PERSONNEL.

We live in Russian houses which, although the best available, are not equal to those we are accustomed to. Our food is canned or dried foods to a great extent, for we dare not eat raw or uncooked foods for fear of cholera. Our workers must in consequence go through the summer without green vegetables such as radishes, lettuce and onions, unless they choose to try them cooked. There are no places of amusement or recreation. In winter, skating on the Samara River, just back of our home, might be available but for the snow. Skiing and coasting are possible for months on the bluffs beyond the river. A good Edison or Victrola with suitable records would be very acceptable. If a vacation is desired, Moscow is the nearest point, and it offers little real rest; while the trip back and forth spoils all one gets by going.

People should be selected for the Russian work with even greater care than for the other fields. The nervous and emotional strain had been very great, due to the distressing sights and sounds. I hope that these will be largely removed by the autumn of this year.

The danger from disease is very great. We know of no way to avoid the possibility of becoming infected. None of us know where we got the bites giving us typhus. We have tried to use all practical means of protection. I wish right here to say that we have not been careless in this respect. All houses are carefully cleaned, floors washed with carbolated soap, cracks liberally supplied with anti-vermin chemicals, walls and ceilings whitewashed. Our clothes are laundered in our own houses by people who we have reason to believe are clean. When traveling we avoided crowds and traveled only in cars we felt were reasonably clean—the best Russia had. When making inspection trips, we carried our own folding beds and a liberal supply of anti-bug powder.

DISTRIBUTION OF FOOD.

One of our most difficult problems lay in selecting those whom we should feed. The Soviet Government had made an effort to find out the actual food situation, and had divided the volosts into five categories based on these findings. At first we did not provide food to the volosts listed in the best provided sections. As time went on and conditions changed, both as to the number of rations at our disposal and the needs in our area, we changed the percentages of our distribution until by Sixth Month 1st practically every one in our area was getting food, either from us, the A. R. A. or the Central Russian Government. The Government was feeding a certain number of children in kitchens under its own management; we were feeding the rest of the children, and distributing American corn to the adults for the A. R. A.

The problem of feeding the inmates of the children's homes was particularly puzzling. Many of them were all but dead when received. Quarters were crowded, sanitary conditions serious, vermin numerous, disease rampant and adult help inadequate and mostly inefficient. To give food to some of the children meant sudden death—the first mouthful would kill them. Hundreds of others would die in a short time even under favorable conditions. If a farmer had one hundred pigs and only enough food to get fifty of them through the winter, would he select the weakest to be fed? Should we apply these calculating tactics? We did not: our code of ethics somehow got in the way. We did our best to relieve the situation in all its phases. These children slept on board platforms or the floor without mattresses and often without covering, and frequently wore but one garment and that a short skirt. Conditions gradually improved, so that when I made my round of inspection the last of Fifth Month the situation was decidedly more hopeful.

RATIONS.

"More than once our famine ration has been called in question. The Russian is a bread eater, often eating nothing but bread, and when he can get it eating as much as three pounds a day. His daily menu is more simple than that of Western Europe and America. We have introduced foods about which he knew nothing, though all wholesome and much used by us. The Russian fuel and brick oven are ill-adapted to cooking some of these foods. White flour is a luxury at best. Whole rye flour is the first choice. 'Why don't you sell your white flour and buy rye—it's cheaper?' was a question frequently asked. Millet and buckwheat are much used, and the common ingredients of kasha. Our experience would warrant a careful study of Oriental and Near-Oriental (Russian) tastes and habits before sending in foodstuffs for famine relief."

MEETING AT EXETER.

On the afternoon of Seventh Month 9th, at 2 p. m., about one hundred people gathered at the old Exeter House, near Stonersville, Pa., to a Meeting appointed by the Visitation Committee of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting.

The Divine Power which touched the heart of young Robert Barclay when he came "into the silent assemblies of God's people" was spoken of at the opening of the Meeting, with the desire that the same unchanging Power might be felt among us.

The next speaker emphasized the thought that it is only as this Power is "given way" in our hearts, that its transforming virtue can be manifested, and that through it we may be enabled to keep so close to our Heavenly Father and to trust ourselves to Him so fully that "He will trust us" with His work and strengthen us for it.

That we should be earnest in our service, and, as professing Christians, "be doing something for Christ," in building up His Kingdom in the earth, was the message of another minister, and that "the way to this is by prayer."

What Friends, as a branch of the Church, stand for, and our view of the spiritual sacraments of worship and communion, was clearly pointed out, and fervent prayer was offered that we might not be separated from our Heavenly Father's love, but united to one another, and to Him.

Under a sense of thankfulness for this opportunity, and for the beautiful summer sights about us; the green hills, and the clear bright sunshine; the gathering dispersed, some lingering to look into the ancient burial-ground where the grassy covering is unbroken by any stones, to show where rest those whose memories are still fragrant about their place of worship.

A marker placed by the Berks County Historical Society, in front of the Meeting House records that "here are buried ancestors of Abraham Lincoln, and of Daniel Boone," but whether they were Friends it does not tell.

VACATION DAYS AND WAYS.

As this number of THE FRIEND comes to hand the vacation season may just be over for some of us, but for others it may be yet to come. For it has become a longer and more varied season of late years.

Time was when the trip to a river beach on the Delaware—in that period of supposed leisure known to the farmer as “after harvest,” was quite sufficient for one family; and that day was cherished in memory for the rest of the year. Even the city dwellers of that time found two weeks in the mountains or by the sea all that they needed.

But now there are winter as well as summer vacations, and week-end trips and motor-excursions between seasons.

And so as “a right use of all our leisure time” has been put before us in the consideration of our Fifth Query, it seems worth while to give some thought as to how we shall spend these vacation days; what our best equipment for them will be; in what spirit we shall enter on them. “So as to have a thorough change and rest,” is the first thought. “No more office-work, or house-keeping, or teaching, or committees—or whatever is our special duty in home surroundings.” A recent periodical says:

“Every person needs a vacation. Perhaps there are a few in the world to whom the only real vacation would be an honest task faithfully performed, but most of us have to work and need a typical vacation. We need this to increase our capacity for effective work. We need it for physical and mental recreation. We need it for soul expansion. To my mind the ideal vacation would be to be wealthy enough to risk wearing old clothes, and get out in the open among the hills or lakes, or along the seashore, there to forget duties for a real duty (self-enlargement) so as to live differently from the rest of the year. But most of us are denied this luxury and must invent our own vacation and go through it in our own backyard.

“Marguerite Wilkinson has suggested that for a vacation three things are essential: solitude, imagination and books. She says that solitude must be taken with us for it is a state of mind, an opportunity for retirement into ourselves, the chance to get on pleasant terms with ourselves. ‘We ought to take our imaginations with us because they are probably in dire need of fresh air.’ ‘We ought to take books with us because they are such good friends of solitude and imagination.’”

Speaking of books recalls the notices sent out by publishing houses, and the many advertisements of “Books for Summer Reading,” and “Greatly Reduced Books for Vacation Time.” A little further study of the books in these lists brings us to the same conclusion as a writer in The Literary Digest, who says, “In the main the advertisers who are urging people not to forget to read something in vacation lay too much stress on the idea that only the lightest of light fiction can be read with any enjoyment during the summer.” . . . Why not assume, on the other hand, that if one wants entertainment he wants it to be of good quality in summer as well as in winter? . . . And, by the way, how about re-reading an old book?”

Dallas Lore Sharp, Dr. Schmucker, Henry Van Dyke, Samuel Scoville, and others of their kind, who have brought the great outdoor world near to us, and made it vivid, have always found sympathetic hearers among us.

The Friends of a past generation had a marked love of Nature, and each of us has his or her well-beloved memory of relative or friend to whom the stars, or birds, or flowers were as familiar acquaintances, who studied carefully some natural science, and who was always glad to help a beginner in it. And many of us love best a vacation passed as nearly as can be in our variable summer climate, “under the open sky,” and take with us not only some worth-while books, and equipment for field study, but whatever else makes it easy to live near to Nature, and share her secrets.

Now as to our need of solitude, and our right to indulge it. This was illustrated to the writer by the remarks made by two doctors of her acquaintance.

One, when asked about where he was going, declared that it should be where “he knew nobody, and need never speak to anybody but the hotel waiter.”

The other, returning from a trip, spoke of a bad cut which he had been able to sew up, although the bit of surgical thread he “happened to have” with him was hardly long enough. “Three or four more stitches would have been better,” he said, “but at least it will hold.” To the comment, “I should think thee would be glad to get away from sick people,” he replied, “O, but some of them needed to see a doctor so much! It was a pleasure to help them.” His service was only measured by their need, not by his own right to well-earned rest in this remote spot.

We have not all his ability to help: but here again is a chance to answer the searching question, “What hast thou under thine hand?” for we all have something.

It may be in Christian fellowship. One family group had spent several summers in a certain locality, gathering for a little meeting in their own cottage, or attending a religious service nearby, before they found that it was quite possible, by some speeding through morning duties, to attend a small Friends' Meeting some thirty miles away, and that they were greatly the gainers by doing it.

There are many services to the community in which our vacations are passed, and to certain individuals in it. Some of these have been pointed out and followed up by such groups as that at Pocono Lake, but there are others waiting to our hands.

Some of us may have felt that Friends "are different," and that it is easier and pleasanter to be in a group composed largely of our own people. But we are not alike in this.

Years ago a plain Friend was heard to say that she did not choose the hotels where she met only people of her own kind; she liked to meet others. At one time she discovered that the "pretty young woman" by whom she had been sitting at table, and with whom she said she had had "some very pleasant talks," was a well-known actress. Knowing the Friend as we did, we could be truly glad that their paths had crossed.

If, then, we can add to our vacation equipment the inspiration of a genuine interest in human nature, in its marvelous variety, and "for the sake of One who bore it, making it Divine," if we desire to be really neighbors (i. e., high-dwellers) to those with whom our lot is cast for a time, however unlike us they may seem at first, shall we not come back to our home surroundings refreshed in spirit as well as in body? Will we not be richer by many ties of friendly interest, as well as by memories of mountain and sea, bird and flower?

These are not new thoughts to those who may read them, but it is worth while to re-consider some of the old things, to strengthen ourselves and one another in them; to feel afresh our responsibility for a right use of every part of that "rich gift of God,

A year of time."

ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

The first contingent arrived at Ras-el-Metn in First Month. The rain was pouring, and they looked wretched enough. They were gathered into our large meeting-room, hot tea was quickly provided, and in front of a good fire, they soon felt better and babbled at a fine rate in Armenian. We commandeered empty houses that were suitable for our purpose, and the Ras people were very kind, so the housing problem was easy.

The following morning we fitted out all in clothes. The four bales of second-hand clothing had just arrived from the American Friends' Service Committee, and were exactly what was needed, coming in the nick of time to meet a most urgent need. The men had their hair cut with clippers and then took a bath outside on a sheltered terrace, and each received two sets of underclothes and, in most cases, trousers and jackets. I will not attempt to describe how necessary clothes were in most cases. How different they looked when washed and clad in clean garments. Also they felt they were safe. However, most of them were afraid of the Druses, but we assured them that the Druses were a fine, manly, generous people, that we trusted them absolutely and they could do so also.

By degrees we heard the history of many of these poor people. All knew what it was to suffer; to have lost many—in some cases all—of their loved ones, and to be facing a world in which they think there is little justice and no home for Armenians. And yet it is good to see their courage, their perseverance and industry. A few instances will give an idea of what they have gone through.

Joseph.—Comes from Hadgin, a town a considerable distance north of Adna. There was a population of about 10,000.

These Armenians were attacked by Turks, but held them at bay until the Turks brought up a big Italian gun they had, and began to bombard the place. The confusion and the wreckage then baffled description. The wounded and the dying were everywhere. Joseph lost all his relatives, including his wife and only child. With seventy young men Joseph cut a way through the Turkish lines, and they fought until only eight remained alive of the seventy. These fled to the mountains. There Joseph hid for five days without any food. He wandered about and ultimately got some food at a house. He hid by day and traveled by night until he made his way to Adna—only to find that the Armenians were in motion there too. This was in 1921. Joseph is about thirty-six years of age. I have sometimes seen him smile, but it is not easy for him to be optimistic. In his dark eyes there is a far-away look and a wistful longing for other days and faces that come no more. He is a wanderer and a refugee. Why?

Because the European war kindled afresh the fires of hate and intolerance everywhere, and especially between the Turks and Armenians, it lowered all moral values and particularly the value of human life. It again emphasized (not in words, but in acts) the false doctrine that might is right, that the victors may possess the spoils, and that the vanquished must suffer. Joseph (and tens of thousands like Joseph, not to mention the one-and-a-half million Armenians who lost their lives during the past few years) have suffered the loss of all and have become refugees, to-day depending on charity, or on a day's work here and there. Armenia is in the centre of Asia Minor, where its population is surrounded by Turks who are in a large majority. There is difference of race and religion, but what has inflamed and intensified all this is that during the war the Armenians were in sympathy with the Allies.

When Ever Pasha early in the war with an army of 40,000 attacked the Russians in the Caucasus, the Turkish army was practically annihilated and Ever Pasha with difficulty made good his escape with a handful of his men. The Turks blamed the Armenians with giving information and other help to the Russians. This may be correct or incorrect; I am unable to say. But from that date the evacuation of Armenia was determined upon, and has been carried out with a cruelty and callousness of which the world now knows. The feud has gone on ever since. The hope that the U. S. A. would step in and give the Armenians a chance to live in safety and under good government in their own country has not been realized.

Surphi is a young widow with a boy about two years' old. She was among those banished to Aleppo. Soon after her marriage her husband was murdered, and some months later, when her baby was born, she was facing the world alone without a single living relation. She has no education and is in no way trained to make a living for herself and her child. She has been put into a class which has just been formed here for young women to learn fine needle-work and embroidery. For such finished work there is always a demand. She makes very slow progress, however, as she has trachoma in her eyes, and her child takes up some of her time.

Artin, a young man about twenty-two years of age, was born in Sevas. All his relatives have perished. He has had many hairbreadth escapes and exciting experiences and imprisonments, but (after we cured him of his chronic malaria) he is now strong. Like most of the Armenians he has no education, and cannot even read or write his own name.

I could go on telling of case after case—all sad reading—but our gospel is a message of restoration through Jesus Christ—teaching men and women to take heart and to hope "the best is yet to come." After months of care and feeding we have secured labor for all the men. It is not permanent, but it will last for a month or so—and what then? We are like the opportunist governments in Europe. "We are looking for something to turn up." Some of the women have still to be provided for.

There are thousands of Armenians in Beyrouth who can find no work. The government had been giving bread and cereals to those scattered along the coast, in places such as Sidon, Junivah, but that help has now been stopped, and so more refugees are flocking into Beyrouth, which is already full of these half starving people. The small Armenian Committee is giving soup daily to about 700 of the worst cases.

ORPHANAGES.

The boys and girls are growing in mind and body. A more diligent lot of students it would be difficult to find anywhere. We have an excellent staff of teachers who are doing most faithful work.

The Carpet Factory for young women and girls remains closed. Our funds are so low that we cannot attempt reopening at present.

We recently had a visit from the French Governor General for the Greater Lebanon, Commandant Albert Tra baud and his assistants, A. Privat Aubouard, and Sheik El Khasim. The Governor General is a fine, warm-hearted man with a most genial manner and a deep desire for the improvement and uplifting of the country. He expressed his admiration of our location, for the work we are doing, for the old castle, and he said:—"It is a great work for the benefit of the country." He promised to help us in any way he could. Thus we and our work are in the most friendly personal touch with the authorities.

We had also a most pleasant and helpful visit from George G. and Anna Rhoads Williams. They are traveling with a minute from California Yearly Meeting. Both had acceptable service in a special meeting on First-day evening. They cheered and encouraged us and we were loath to let them depart. Any other visiting Friends should remember that Ras-el-Metn is now quite accessible from Beyrouth by automobile, it being only a journey of two hours up, and one-and-a-half hours return.

Our present needs are:—

Contributions in money.

Clothing—good second-hand clothes are most welcome, stockings, socks, etc., etc.

Pieces of material, calico, flannelette, print.

All clothing (American) to be sent to Store-room, Care of Elizabeth Marot, Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

MESSAGE, IDEALS AND WORK OF FRIENDS, PAST AND PRESENT.

ELMA MCGREW STARR.

(Read at Canada Yearly Meeting, Norwich, Ont., Sixth Month 23rd).

The doctrines of Friends were set forth not only with the religious energy common to the age at the rise of our Society but they were preached and enunciated by George Fox and his coadjutors under the deepest convictions that the Lord had sent them forth as messengers for the further reformation and more thorough conversion of the nations.

Those Friends believed in their inmost souls that whether life or death, liberty or imprisonment were their portion, these Gospel principles would live and spread until they obtained possession of all people, and they themselves prepared to start on religious missions to any or every part of the earth for their propagation. Absorbed and strengthened by such convictions, they seemed to lose all fear of man and to think of obedience to the Lord Jesus, watching for the pointings of the Holy Spirit manifest in their souls. At home they were seen traversing their native land on all sides addressing the people in the market-place, in the fields, by the wayside, and in the chapels, after the regular service had closed.

How very far short many of us to-day fall from following their example in such perseverance to tell others our message! If all Friends since the rise of the Society had been as consecrated to their message of "peace on earth, good-will to men" and to their duty in telling it to others, as well as in living it themselves, surely the great world war would never have occurred. While we know and appreciate that some of the Lord's servants are faithful to His call to preach the gospel and others to visit the sick and afflicted far and near, are not many of us too content to settle ourselves down in our own comfortable homes and social circles, following the lines of least resistance, thinking if we live moral social and business lives, and so are in these respects good examples to all men, that that is enough? When there is a vote, we quietly try to cast our vote in what we think is the right way, but are we not often too backward to speak a word of caution or encouragement, privately or publicly, direct to others about theirs?

It is possible that by undue silence Friends have been misunderstood by the world. Of more recent years they have contented themselves with quiet philanthropic action, without sufficiently holding before the world the Christian principles which have produced that action.

Far may we be from desiring self-exaltation for our Society or its individual members, but herein as elsewhere the grace of God is sufficient to guard us as we look for it, and if we do not look for it, we go astray on one side or the other, in this matter as in any other.

For the candle, which the Lord has lighted and which should give light to a great household, to be hidden under a bushel is contrary to our Savior's teachings.

Let us arise and shake ourselves from any self-contented, easy-going state and see if we are doing our full duty. If we have had more opportunities and privileges than some other people, are we not the more accountable? We read, "To whom much is given, much will be required."

How many of our predecessors, as, for example, Joseph Sturge and Elizabeth Fry, felt a burning in their bosoms to help in some way people less favored than themselves! Joseph Sturge's biographer says: "The lesson I would have people learn from his life is Courage. It was courage that made him stand up for the weaker boys at school. It was courage that enabled him to go to the West Indies to find out if the slaves were being cruelly treated after England had paid £20,000,000 to free them. It was courage and love for the starving Finns that made him go to Finland to do what he could for them. Therefore learn from his life, 'Be not afraid!' . . . Though in many things he failed, he went on trying. When he went into business for himself, he made up his mind that he was not going to spend all his energy in making money. He determined on a certain sum that should be spent on his household and private expenses, not to be exceeded however much his business improved. He is known to have gone without his dinner in order to have something to give to others."

Elizabeth Fry's concern of mind and exercise of body greatly improved conditions in hospitals, prisons, and houses of correction.

The lives and work of these two Friends cited from among many others, encourage us to follow the examples set before us. Such labor as theirs involves many a sacrifice of vain inclination and selfish desire, yet though strait is the gate and narrow is the way, how infinitely blessed is this course of Christian devotion!

Each of us may feel it said to him direct,

"Thou hast a work that no other can do.
Do it so nobly, so bravely, so well,
Angels will hasten the story to tell."

It is written that at the rise and during the early life of our Society, "the bright course of those faithful servants of God and benefactors of mankind is designed to serve as an ensign through succeeding generations, to exhibit, by the force of a holy example, the blessedness and the duty of treading in that pathway of Christian dedication in which they sought to follow Him who 'went about doing good' and 'who came to seek and to save that which was lost.'"

Many of these early Friends were comparatively uneducated, and their doctrines and teaching were unacceptable to many people, but scattered among the multitudes were others who responded with joy and gladness to the spirituality, the purity, the unswerving truthfulness and the Christian love that their lives and preaching manifested. The public trials and the persecutions which they endured tended to make the principles of the "Friends of Truth" all the better known. Therefore, so long as such persecutions lasted, the Friends as a people continued to increase.

Friends' efforts on their own behalf to lighten this persecution, by getting laws enacted to favor themselves, have been it would seem a detriment to their growth in numbers. How about it with regard to their growth in life and spiritual power? We feel it a privilege and a blessing to live in an age when we are permitted peace and quietness for our Society. This being so, should we not strive the more diligently that others may also know and enjoy this peace?

Have not many of us had conversations with our neighbors and friends, and with strangers, who are very much interested to learn what we do believe and what the doctrines of our Society are? And have we not heard some of them express the wish that this or that principle were more generally known and practiced by the people of the world at large?

One means to this end and one which is within the reach of all of us, is to welcome visitors who feel drawn to our meetings, and to invite them, as way opens in the Light, so to do.

It is well that at some of our meeting-houses literature is kept to be handed out discriminately; would it not be well for such to be the case in all? Surely, if we are humble and prayerfully watchful, what to give and when to give it will be shown us by Him who knows the thoughts and intents of the hearts of men.

"O Spirit of that early day,
So pure and strong and true,
Be with us in the narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew.
Give strength the evil to forsake,
The cross of Truth to bear,
And holy, fervent love to make
Our daily lives a prayer!"

"CLEAR THE WAY."

William McAndrew, of the New York Board of Education, answers an inquiry recently made in The Outlook as to the authorship of this poem with above title; saying that it was written by Charles Mackay in 1848; and further adds that "in these troubled times," it might be well to reprint the whole poem, which is done, with a reminiscence added of the writer's mother; so pleasantly told, that it may be repeated here for readers of THE FRIEND.

"CLEAR THE WAY."

Men of thought! be up, and stirring
Night and day;
Sow the seed, withdraw the curtain,
Clear the way.
Men of action, aid and cheer them
As ye may!
There's a fount about to stream,
There's a light about to beam,
There's a warmth about to glow,
There's a flower about to blow;
There's a midnight blackness changing
Into gray;
Men of thought and men of action,
Clear the way.

Once the welcome light has broken,
Who shall say
What the unimagined glories
Of the day?
What the evil that shall perish
In its ray?
Aid the dawning tongue and pen;
Aid it, hopes of honest men;

Aid it, paper; aid it, type;
Aid it, for the hour is ripe,
And our earnest must not slacken
Into play.
Men of thought and men of action,
Clear the way.

Lo! a cloud's about to vanish
From the day;
And a brazen wrong to crumble
Into clay.
Lo! the Right's about to conquer,
Clear the way.
With the Right shall many more
Enter smiling at the door;
With the giant Wrong shall fall
Many others, great and small,
That for ages long have held us
For their prey.
Men of thought and men of action,
Clear the way!

In 1886, Bishop Potter, of New York, delivered the baccalaureate address at the University of Michigan. His theme was the University's duty to deliver to the Nation an output of men concerned with more than athletics, dances, fraternities, and passing examinations. He pleaded for public-minded youth, trained to a desire and ability to serve the general welfare as the Fathers of the Republic expected public education would do. When he came to the close of his moving appeal and swung into Mackay's verse,

"Aid it paper; aid it, type;
Aid it, for the time is ripe,
And our earnest must not slacken
Into play,"

the little gray woman beside me became more and more excited. She took up the words with the eminent orator, spoke them more and more distinctly with him, until the recitation was a duet, and when he finished she rose and waved her parasol and shouted, "Hurrah, Hurrah!" much to the enthusiastic approval of the auditors. Old friends still remind me how my little mother helped the eminent Bishop conclude his address.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

I could see nothing but the icy surface over which we glided and the thick snowflakes in the air. It was intensely cold and the breath congealed on the handkerchief with which I covered my face. We were favored to reach the landing-place in safety about seventeen miles across. Our guide assured me afterwards that he thought it "very risky," but as I made no remark during the ride about danger, he would not speak of it. When we came to land we still had a long distance to go through the snow, in which the horses sunk every step nearly to their bodies. We had strong, tough animals of northern breed, but one of them drawing the sleigh in which John Pease was, became so much exhausted that he had to crowd into our little vehicle, leaving the driver to get on as best he could. It was some time after dark before we arrived at Benjamin Fry's hospitable home, thankful for our preservation in this memorable journey. The intention was to have had a meeting in the afternoon, but the storm prevented. Quickly, however, after our arrival notice was sent in various directions and Friends were gathered the same evening in B. Fry's large kitchen fitted up for the occasion. The meeting was a very precious one, and especially interesting as showing the zeal of Friends to turn out in the dark in the snowstorm. The next morning was clear and being First-day we attended the regular meeting at Sandwich, and in the afternoon returned to Wobfsboro across the lake as we came. But the scene was wonderfully different. The sun shone on the clear ice and on the pure white snow of the many islands, forming a most brilliant and beautiful scene. At Wobfsboro a large evening meeting was held. The next morning we again crossed the lake in a different direction on our return to Dover. Our journey continued to New Bedford, Providence, Newport, etc., holding meetings at each place, then on to New York and Philadelphia. Our beloved friend John Pease remained in America until the Seventh Month of 1845, during which time he was much at home with us, and memorable meetings were held in our parlors, many Friends attending. The sweet, loving spirit that prevailed on these occasions is now, after the lapse of more than thirty years, comforting in remembrance. He embarked from Boston for Liverpool, and we went on to see him depart from our shores. There was a large company of Friends from various parts assembled to accompany him to the ship and a solemn meeting was held in the cabin. Our dear friend Isabel Casson returned in the same vessel. She and Rachel Priestman came over with John Pease and it was my privilege to wait on them occasionally. Their religious services were truly acceptable among us. R. Priestman returned the year before. I, Casson, my sister Elizabeth W. Wistar and I went on to see her embark from Boston. In the Twelfth Month of 1844 our beloved mother Mary Wistar died. Her sweet, loving Christian character always impressed me deeply. I felt it to be a great privilege to have her affectionate, wise counsel and example continually before me, and was strengthened and edified by it. In 1846, our dear friends, Josiah and William Forster, John Allen and George Stacey from England, came over as the deputation from London Yearly Meeting to endeavor to reconcile the separation which had taken place in Indiana Yearly Meeting on anti-slavery grounds. The two latter lodged with us and the others were frequent visitors. Thus commenced my friendship and correspondence with our beloved Josiah Forster, a blessing for which I trust I shall ever have a grateful heart, and which ended only with his departure from this life. With my dear friend John Allen, who came from Kiskeard in Cornwall, I also had the privilege of correspondence until his death. He was truly one of the salt of the earth. A public-spirited man in the best sense, ever aiming to promote the true welfare of his fellow-men, both in their temporal and spiritual interests. George Stacey was also a very interesting man and highly esteemed for his sound and vigorous judgment. He died soon after his return to England so that I received very few letters from him. Their mission to Indiana was a successful one, and such a good feeling was promoted by it that in a comparatively short period the breach was almost entirely healed. The same fall of 1846 came our beloved friends Benjamin Seebohm and Robert Lindsay from England, a record I made at the time is here introduced:

Eleventh Month 11, 1846.—"This day went to Burlington to meet our dear friends, B. Seebohm and R. Lindsay, who arrived at Boston on the 7th inst. They came at 8 p. m. in the train from New York and lodged at Stephen Grellet's. They attended the week-day meeting at Burlington, in which B. Seebohm appeared in testimony, in the course of which he alluded to our dear friend S. Grellet as one whom he considered as his father in the truth, having been brought through his instrumentality at a critical period of his life (about fifteen years of age) to enter upon the narrow way which leads to life. He acted as interpreter to S. Grellet at Pymont in Germany in his religious communications, and subsequently for Elizabeth Coggeshall and Sarah Hustler, and by the latter was invited to come to England, which afterwards became his residence.

"Soon after, these dear Friends came on with me to Philadelphia. On First-day, the 15th, they attended Twelfth Street Meeting, and in the evening the meeting on Arch Street, where he was largely and impressively engaged in testimony, expressing as his decided conviction that if ever there was a revival among Friends it must be through faithfully living up to the pure first principles of our religious Society without modification. He alluded touchingly to the sufferings and sacrifices of our early Friends, to their lively convictions and great tenderness of feelings, to their self-denying lives and to their love one for another. He enlarged upon the soundness and fulness of their Christian faith, upon their firm reliance on the great atoning sacrifice of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, that through Him alone was the forgiveness of sins, inasmuch as He had borne upon Himself the amazing weight of the sins of the whole world and had yielded up His precious life that their sins might be washed away by His blood from all who fully believed in His name. On the 18th, our dear friends attended our Monthly Meeting and produced their certificates. Much unity was felt and expressed and their Gospel labors among us accepted as edifying. Our dear B. S. mentioned his satisfaction in being with us. On the 24th, 25th and 26th, our friends attended the other three Monthly Meetings.

"I was favored to accompany our dear friends in some visits to the aged and feeble and have been instructed and confirmed by the evidence of our Heavenly Father's love influencing their hearts and enabling them to minister comfort and consolation to the afflicted and cast down. Oh, for more of the purifying and enlightening operation of Divine Grace in my heart, that through its irresistible power, the stony heart may be broken, self may be laid low, all idols stricken down and the Lord alone exalted in His temple. 'Know ye not that ye are the temple of God? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.'

In 1847 I went to Ohio Yearly Meeting with our dear friends Rebecca Collins and Jane Johnson. There I met Benjamin Seebohm and R. Lindsay. It was a time of great trial on account of great division of opinion and feeling in relation to the separation which had taken place in the New England Yearly Meeting. It was painfully evident that with many the pride of opinion and the self-will of man were largely mixed up with a desire to maintain the truth, as each of the opposing divisions viewed it. Others differed in a more Christian spirit, but a few years afterwards the divergence appearing irreconcilable a separation took place. The recollection of this scene is a sorrowful one. Our dear friend B. Seebohm took little part in the discussion, but very opportunely proclaimed the sound Scriptural views of the founders of our Religious Society, which some of the ardent disputants almost lost sight of in the heat of their zeal to maintain some of their own opinions. Although our dear Friend was involved in much trial on this occasion, I was glad he was there, his calm unprejudiced mind enabling him to exercise a soothing influence over many.

During the five years of his extensive travels in the United States, I had much interesting correspondence with him, and his frequent trariances with us as a member of our domestic circle were always felt to be seasons of comfort and instruction. After his departure from America I received many valuable letters from him, which for depth of feeling, comprehensiveness of view, and soundness of religious and moral sentiment are seldom equaled. Our friend R. Lindsay we also found to be a dear Christian brother who in a quiet, unobtrusive way was devoted to the service of his Divine Lord and Master. They embarked from Boston in the summer of 1851, but we were prevented from witnessing their departure from our country.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE QUAKER CAPTAIN.—We are all interested in true stories. Now that Friends have rendered to mankind the great service of showing there is a better way than force, I am reminded of some of the early experiences of Friends in the Far West of the United States; the "Far West" in that early time meant principally Kansas, the State in which I live; it was then a territory, not a State; many of its first settlers were Friends—Friends of varying degree and quality, as there are now.

Lawlessness in those days was very great; there were some unfriendly Indians, but most to be feared were border ruffians, "bushwhackers" or "guerillas," as they were called; these were outlaws, often murderers, common, wicked men, who made no profession of religion, and were a real menace to all settlers who entered the Kansas Territory. Congress exerted very little control over it, and made no attempt to keep order there—even leaving it to its own decision whether to be a Free or a Slave State. As its people differed on this point, this caused much fighting and bloodshed.

Now nearly one hundred and fifty miles inland from a river trading post, many Friends, mostly from Indiana, had formed a settlement—that is, they had made their homes for many miles up and down the banks of a beautiful wooded stream; behind them and in front, as far as the eye could reach, rolled the rich prairie, a waving, grassy picture of great beauty.

There were many other settlers here also, and all had to journey every few weeks the one hundred and fifty miles down to the trading post on the river where they could get provisions, clothing, etc. As the journey was so full of danger, it was necessary for them to go in long wagon trains or caravans. At each going they would elect a captain for the journey who rode at the head and of course gave orders and was responsible for the safety of the caravan. Each night they camped in a circle, ready at a moment's notice if an attack should occur.

Now a venerable-looking, middle-aged Quaker and his son-in-law invariably went along on these trips, but they never carried weapons of any kind. On one occasion, when nearly ready to start on the river journey, the elder Friend, much to his surprise, was elected captain. Of course, he protested as any good Friend would have done, but the rest would not take no for an answer. So our Friend rode in the lead, as stately as any captain, but with no weapon of self-defense except his kindly heart and an honest smile.

All went well on the outward journey; no attack was made upon the little caravan, but on the return trip our Friend had an opportunity to try out his peace principles. A savage-looking man rode up to him, and addressed him very gruffly and discourteously; the Quaker captain only smiled his usual smile of kindness and treated this border ruffian as becomes a gentleman and a Christian; soon the man rode away. Later, it was learned that the weaponless, smiling captain had proven too much for this outlaw and his band; when he went back to his comrades, and told them of him, they said they were not after peaceable people, but quarrelsome ones.

This is certainly one of many instances where the smile is mightier than the sword and also where those who put their trust in the Lord shall be saved.

This Quaker captain afterward sat for forty years head of his meeting and held the love and esteem of all who knew him. He had many other thrilling experiences, sometimes with Indians, but his trust in the Lord never forsook him and he was not harmed nor was he ever armed except with love and kindness.—JOHN E. HINSHAW.

He sees God in the star-lit night,
In every sun-kissed flower;
Each bird-song sings life's mystery,
Each forest tree its power;
In every voice of harmony,
He hears the Voice Divine;
In every wavelet's sparkling hue,
He sees God's wonder shine.

OUR CITY MEETINGS AND THEIR INFLUENCES.

(This paper was read before the West Philadelphia Christian Fellowship.)

In considering the subject of our city meetings and the position of influence which they hold in our Religious Society, and in the religious life of the community, it will be interesting, I think, to look backward, a little, and consider under what conditions they were first established and under which they grew.

As nearly as I can learn, eleven meeting houses, not including those built by Fifteenth and Race Streets Friends since 1827, have been erected in Philadelphia since 1684, all except two having been situated between Sixth and Noble Streets on the north and west, and Front and Pine Streets on the south and east. At one period between 1700 and 1850, five meeting-houses were in use within this small area. Within the memory of some of our Friends now living our meetings were large on both First-days and week-days and overflowed into the youths' galleries.

All through this section of the city, which was the principal part of Philadelphia in those days, were situated the homes of Friends.

"Travel on Arch Street was only occasional," we are told, and we can believe that Market Street was sufficiently quiet to afford a safe playground for some, who, within our memory, have been valued "pillars in the Church."

It is not surprising that such a large Friendly population, estimated at the beginning of last century at one thousand families, should have stamped their individuality upon the city, and that, because of their influence, Philadelphia continues to occupy a unique position.

As we read of the worthy characters of those early days, we wonder whether we of this generation are letting our light shine as did our ancestors, and whether, a century from now, our posterity will be able to refer to us as a group which substantially influenced the life of Philadelphia.

For the last seventy-five years we have steadily decreased in numbers. Several causes have contributed to this condition.

In the first place, as the population has increased, it has become easier for many who were Friends only nominally, to go with the greater number.

In the second place, we have been sadly torn by separations. A third reason is that Friends have very largely removed from the city. This migration began about 1800, when many went West, and probably about fifty years later Friends began to settle in suburban towns where their children would have better surroundings.

We are all acquainted with the present situation in our meetings.

At Fourth and Arch Streets, where we have a membership slightly under three hundred, only five persons live nearer to our own meeting than to one of our other city meetings or to a suburban meeting. Probably the situation at Twelfth Street is much the same.

It follows that if our two city meetings are to be maintained it must be through the efforts of those Friends who believe their continuance is sufficiently vital to warrant them in making considerable sacrifice of physical comfort to attend them. The question, then, naturally arises just how essential is it that we shall have substantial representation in the church life of our city?

We have many trusts that must be administered, but this could be done by non-resident members, just as business concerns are carried on by persons who live out of town and commute each day.

The work of the American Friends' Service Committee, of the Young Friends' Committee, of the Friends' Institute and of various Yearly Meeting Committees is carried on largely by those whose membership is in our suburban meetings. There has probably never been a time when Friends have been more active.

Is it not possible for us to exert our influence upon the life of the city through these various activities, some may question, and is it necessary for us to be so concerned for the life of our city meetings for worship?

The gathering together "in His Name" is a duty and a privilege enjoined by Christ. It strengthens us individually and collectively and it is an influence for good upon the community. We are apt to forget that we do not go to meeting for the sole purpose of renewing our own spiritual lives, but that we have the further duty and privilege of praying for our fellow-men.

We hold to a belief in regard to worship and ministry that differs quite substantially from that held by other religious denominations.

This belief is a vital principle just as is our testimony in regard to war. I do not believe we should have been able to take the advanced position which we have held upon practically all reform questions, if it had not been for the strengthening influence of our meetings for worship, held under the authority and prompting of the Holy Spirit, and characterized as our Spiritual Power Houses.

If it is true that our spiritual message is the answer not alone to the evils of this age, but to the heart yearnings, as well, how very important it is that we should zealously hold our meetings for worship, right in the heart of this busy city, making the necessary physical sacrifice even more willingly than for any other cause, believing that through them, if they are held in the Power of Truth, we will have an opportunity for larger influence in the community, and that without them our strength to work for the dawn of a better day will fail.

ENGLISH AFTER ALL.

The following in The Friend (London) of some weeks ago deserves consideration:—

I have been greatly interested in reading the correspondence in The Friend on the value of Esperanto, the importance of which was specially brought before me by a circumstance which occurred two-and-a-half years ago on the disbanding of the German Prisoner Camps. I had charge at the time of the workshops belonging to Friends in the camp near Hawick, and I sent a working carpenter to arrange for the removal of the huts and their contents to the railway. On his return, after carrying out the work, I asked him how he got on with the men there. "Oh, all right," he said; "some were very nice, one was a particularly decent fellow, indeed he could speak English perfectly." The fact that he could talk to him in a language that he could understand seemed to this artisan to transform him from being an ordinary barbarous Hun into a particularly decent fellow.

Now I do not wish to base a plea for a common language on this single example; but, like many others, I am firmly convinced that the power to converse in a common language would very greatly tend to promote good understanding and confidence among the different nations of the world. Our late Friend, Ellen Robinson, was so strongly convinced on this point that, at quite an advanced age, she made herself proficient in Esperanto. On one occasion she strongly urged me to do the same, but on my mentioning the matter to a German business friend, his reply was as follows: "An Englishman already speaks a language understood by far more people than that of any other nation on the globe; and there is little doubt but that it will ultimately become the international language, so there is no need to invent another."

It used to be said that the Japanese would have adopted the English language if it were made phonetic and possibly the grammar simplified. I do not know what truth there was in that assertion, but I believe that if that were done, all the Northern nations of Europe would very soon make it a compulsory subject in their schools, and I have no doubt Germany would very soon follow. Doubtless there would be a difficulty with France, at first, just as there was when the movement for a universal system of reckoning time was started. The French wanted either Paris meridian or that of a neutral spot in the Atlantic Ocean. The other nations desired Greenwich and adopted it. The French stood out against it; but during the late war finally gave way, and now practically every country bases its time on so many exact hours before or after Greenwich time. We might show a little return to the French and at the same time do ourselves no harm by adopting their weights and measures.

In writing this I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not throwing cold water on Esperanto or Ido; but I do believe that English is the finest language in existence, especially that more shades of thought (nuances) can be expressed in it than in any other language, and I think other peoples should have the benefit of using it. By all means teach our children Esperanto or Ido as temporary expedients; but let us look to reformed English as the language of the federated countries of the world, as we desire them to be five hundred years hence under a reformed League of Nations.

"Say not thou, I will hide myself from the Lord." (Eccles. xvi. 17.)

Among so many, can He care?
Can special love be everywhere?
A myriad homes,— a myriad ways,—
And God's eye over every place?

I asked; my soul beyond of this;—
In just that very place of His
Where He hath put and keepeth you,
God hath no other thing to do!

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL NOTES.

(SIXTH MONTH, 1922.)

The Commencement Exercises of the Germantown Friends' School were held in the Meeting-house on the afternoon of Fourth-day, Sixth Month 7th. A class of thirty-seven graduated, of whom two, Edith T. Harris and Ninah May H. Cook, received diplomas Magna Cum Laude, and the following six Cum Laude: Lorna C. Brown, Elizabeth L. Burton, Elizabeth Rebmann, E. Eleanor Stutz, William McP. Huber and Winthrop M. Leeds. Six members of the class were elected to the Cum Laude Society, four girls and two boys.

The Honor Alumni Scholarships for next school year were awarded as follows:—

Susanna S. Kite Scholarship—Ruth E. Bleckwell; Davis H. Forsythe Scholarship—Edward R. Fiske (both of the Class of 1924).

An interesting announcement was the establishment by a gift of Walter H. Jarden and wife of a Memorial School Library and Annual Awards for Excellence in English, in memory of their daughter, Roberta V. Jarden, a member of the upper school, who died after a brief illness last spring. The gift is particularly appropriate because of Roberta Jarden's excellence in scholarship and particular interest in English. The Library will supplement the work of the English Department, and will be started by an expenditure of about $400 for books. A capital fund provides income for the maintenance of the Library and for the annual awards of four prizes of $25.00 each. The awards are for excellence in English, designed to encourage a delight in company of good books, and a desire to own them. Each award brings to the recipient the privilege of spending $25.00 for the beginning of a library of his own, or for the development of one which he has already begun.

The address to the class was delivered by Frederick J. Libby. The Annual Meeting of the Alumni Association was held in the evening.

As part of the program Frederick J. Libby spoke briefly on The World Drama.

The work of the school year has been successful and inspiring. The student activities of the school have been well maintained, with successful seasons in athletics, the boys again winning for the fifth time the Inter-Academic Championship in soccer, and the girls winning the Private School Championship in hockey.

The Student Council has continued to function with growing influence in the school life. The most conspicuous service rendered by it during the past year has been the successful organization of the School Study Hall under the general care of the Student Council on an honor basis, with no teachers present. A Junior Student Council has also been organized in the Intermediate School to take over such duties and responsibilities as are appropriate to boys and girls of younger age.

The college preparatory work has a growing importance in our upper school. All of the sixteen boys graduating this year expect to enter college, with one exception, and fifteen of the twenty-one girls. More searching and rigid examinations have been given to the upper classes as a preparation for the college tests throughout the year than heretofore. Two sets come regularly now in the school schedule, one coming just before the Christmas holidays for the Seniors, general examinations for the upper school at the middle of the school year, and special examinations for the First Class at the end of the school year. These, of course, are supplemented by special coaching and drill work, based largely on College Entrance Examinations for the college candidates during the ten days immediately following Commencement.

Four of our teachers will again be Readers for the College Entrance Examination Board in New York this month:—Jane S. Jones in Mathematics, Edith H. Knight in French, Helen M. Zebley in Latin, and Joseph H. Price in History.

In Third Month a joint Editorial Board, consisting of members of the School Committee and the teachers' staff, issued the first number of the Germantown Friends' School Bulletin, which will be published two or three times a year and distributed among the members of the Monthly Meeting, patrons of the school, and Alumni. The first number of the Bulletin is an interesting pamphlet of twelve pages, giving general comments on the school life, the Annual Report of the School Committee, Frederic H. Strawbridge's article on our Foundation and Our Future, and an article on An Experiment in Social Studies, by Dorothy Brooke, describing the work she has been carrying on in the Intermediate School in combining history and geography, on the general plan of experiment of the Lincoln School in New York City. Emma D. Roberts wrote interestingly on Two Years of Ivy Lodge, dwelling on the value to the school of such a home for its teachers.

It is a matter of regret that several teachers of experience and valuable influence are passing out of the school life at the end of this school year. They are as follows:—Jules Marcel Wilmar, Assistant Teacher in French; Dorothy Brooke, Teacher of Geography and History, who is to be married during this summer; Ruth Bridge Winkler, Teacher of Drawing, and Elizabeth S. Knight, Assistant in the Kindergarten, both of whom are to be married; Eleanor Shane, who has been taking the place this year of Katherine E. Dobson, who returns after a year's leave of absence; Gladys Brooke of the Primary Department, and Dorothy Shane of our Secretarial Staff, who will be married early in the fall. The positions for next year will be filled as follows:—Eleanor D. Harris, a graduate of Germantown Friends' School and Bryn Mawr College, Teacher of French, William W. Price, graduate of Swarthmore College, and widely known among Friends for his work in reconstruction and in Peace, to take the place of Dorothy Brooke; Elizabeth Wood, a graduate of the Germantown Friends' School, and the School of Industrial Art, to teach Drawing and Crafts Work; Edna E. Mendenhall, to take the place of Gladys Brooke in the Primary Department, Margaret Culin, Assistant in the Kindergarten, and Martha A. Tierney to take the place of Dorothy Shane as Secretary to the Principal.

As a tribute to her long and useful service to the school, the Committee has made possible a vacation trip to Emma D. Roberts.

Hadassah J. Moore has been granted a leave of absence for next school year to take her degree at John Hopkins University. Sarah H. Kohler, who has been this year substituting for Jane S. Jones, who was also granted a year's leave of absence, will fill Hadassah J. Moore's place.

The Wistar Brown Athletic Field will be completed this autumn by the erection of a locker house, providing facilities for 250 lockers, with an attractive second floor apartment for the head groundsman. The contract has been let and work is now under way. Clark Field, which the boys have previously occupied, will this autumn be made over for the girls' athletics, and the locker house there will be converted to the use of the girls.

The prospects for next school year are favorable. The enrollment is practically complete and exceeds the figures of last year by a small margin. The school has now practically reached its limit of growth, and there is no desire on the part of the teachers or Committee to change the present policy of double section classes, which provides for ample individual care on the part of the teachers, and yet gives sufficient numbers for competition and school spirit. Without a fairly large school aggregate built up by small class units, many helpful activities in the school life cannot be maintained without over-strain on the part of the few chief burden-bearers. Our ideal is a large school, so organized that each individual boy and girl receives specialized attention and care in the matter of character development, and at the same time feels himself to be a part of a great whole, with the enthusiasm and strength that come from numbers working together with helpful spirit and high ideals.

CHÂLONS HOSPITALS—OLD AND NEW.

Esther Whitson, now serving as a nurses' aide at the Châlons Maternity Hospital, sends the following letter to Mission members. Interest in this vivid picture of the old and the new hospitals will not be confined to Mission members.

DEAR MISSION MEMBERS:—

Have you forgotten the days you spent in sunny, muddy France? Have you forgotten Châlons-sur-Marne, with its quaint canals and bridges, its crooked streets and old cathedral? Do you remember the French army-barrack out on the Route de Suipes? Can you recall the red-brown wall of the Asile (porchouse) just opposite?

You were told that within that walled enclosure Edith M. Pye of England had started her "French Hospital." When you went inside you saw six huge, bare buildings and a well-kept kitchen-garden. You were surprised when you saw deformed or silly people wandering about the garden or squatting in the grass. You wondered to yourself where were the little children you had heard her talking about. But you followed the pathway, because the arrow on the weather-beaten sign pointed "MATERNITÉ."

Your walk soon ended, however, for suddenly you came into a little world of babies. There they were, a dozen of them, corralled in a crooked pen in the sunshine—fat, happy babies! As you looked you saw others, smaller ones, kicking and cooing in their baskets nearby. It was a gala day for these tiny, nameless people, for the blessed sun was shining and they could be out of doors. Each tiny urchin crept or crawled his happy radius as though no fairer expense there were on earth than the space of his big, grey blanket.

Inside the "Maternité" you ascended a flight of well-worn stairs and came to a ward of "new" babies and their hardy, peasant mothers. They looked contented, but you noticed the rude equipment for their comfort. You wondered how those grey girls, who moved about beneath white veils, could be resigned to work in such crude ways.

Then you met the Directress of this little "Maternité." She was a sturdy Huguenot, embodying the loyalty and tireless enthusiasm necessary to carry on the work. You felt the warmth and earnestness of her spirit and you knew that her workers had caught it, too. You cried within yourself: "Oh! for some one with money, some group of people to build a new and fairer Maison, a cleaner, sweeter shelter, for these brave workers to protect poor, ignorant mothers!"

Your cry has been answered! Come with me and peep inside the wall of our new Maison Maternelle! We have watched and waited and worked; we have swept and scrubbed and painted; and now we have our dear, new house. Not a public poorhouse, but a clean, white dwelling. Not an old garden-plot and stumble-stones, but greensward, blossoms and shade-trees. Not six, bare buildings, but two fair homes together. Do you recognize it—our "nouvelle Maison?"

The same white veils are worn, but not now so much for protection. The walls are decorated with stencil-work and pictures—in the Children's Ward a complete border of them around the room. The woodwork is painted, and there are neat, white draperies. Instead of red-hot or stone-cold stoves we have gas and steam heat. Instead of having flies and ants we have screens and tight floors to keep them out. Instead of the bare stone floor of the children's Pouponnier, there is a separate play-room for the "kiddies." Instead of the rough, cold barracks that housed the nurses in former days, we have a "Staff House" with a dining-room, a place we call "home." The Night Nurse is a bit more lonesome now, perhaps, than formerly, for no more do mice gather about her feet in the wee, small hours, nor do bats intrude to fan the patients with their wings. Even the cats seem to wail less pitifully, and the owls are ashamed to hoot at our new Maison. Every day we are trying to make you feel repaid, dear co-workers, in giving this gift to France.

Much is due to our Directress. For five tedious years she has been a loyal friend and helper to us all. Throughout all the changes and vicissitudes, this staunch, steady, undaunted leader has never swerved from her steady purpose, to serve and to keep her workers united in serving.

We know we are but a part of the great work for the relief of suffering in Europe. Russia needs our hearts and hands. Everywhere there is need for money. But remember that in the county town Châlons, one hundred and ten miles east of Paris, in the valley of the Marne, there are inscribed over the doorway of a certain house of blessing these significant lines:—

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL OF THE MISSION DES AMIS

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

J. ROWNTREE GILLET, of England, expects to reach America next month. His plans contemplate extensive service here, covering six or more months. He has a special gift with young people and is assured a warm welcome.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.—In accordance with previous plans, at noon on Seventh Month 19th, about forty people met at the White House in Washington; the object of the visit was to present to President Harding a huge roll, some three feet in diameter, containing the names approximately of 1,000,000 persons asking for the release of the eighty-six political (war time) prisoners. Addresses to the President were made by a Columbia University man, also by representatives (one each) as follows: Federation of Labor, Socialists, War Veterans, Federated Churches, Friends.

The President was sympathetic, stating that his natural inclination would be to release promptly the distinctly war time prisoners, those who had not openly advocated violence or disloyalty; he pointed to a pile of papers on his desk, cases which he had under consideration, and he had given orders to the Department concerned to hasten work on other cases.

The President informed that within sixty days, Executive clemency will have become effective, but it will not embrace the total number of the men still held in prison.

W. B. H.

ULSTER QUARTERLY MEETING, held at Richhill, Ireland, on the twelfth of Sixth Month, was largely attended, and there were present three of the appointed delegates from Dublin Yearly Meeting, to the Five Years' Meeting in Richmond, Indiana, in Ninth Month next.

The fact that these three Friends were also members of the Committee of Ulster Provincial School at Lisburn, led the Quarterly Meeting to warmly endorse a proposition which was made, viz.: that our Friends whilst out in the United States, should not fail to bring before our American Friends the straits which we are in at present for some further substantial help, in the way of endowment for the School.

Feeling that we have still the need of a good Quaker education and training for our children, several local Friends have offered sums varying from £1 to £50 per annum for the next five years, so as to enable the School to be carried on. But beyond all this, it is absolutely necessary that some more permanent help be obtained, if this old-established school is to continue its usefulness to our Society as in the past.

W. H. TURTLE.

We have already called attention to two books of especial interest to Friends which were published last month. Both of these will be briefly reviewed in an early issue of THE FRIEND.

A London daily refers to them as follows:—

TWO IMPORTANT BOOKS.—The past month has seen the publication in England of two very important volumes which are the outcome of the experiences of Friends during the war. First is the history of the C. O. Movement in England, with a survey of the American Movement in an Appendix, which John W. Graham of Manchester has written under the title of "Conscription and Conscience." The other volume is the authoritative picture of life in prison to be found in the volume "English Prisons To-day," by Stephen Hobbhouse and A. Fenner Brockway. Both of these can be secured through Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street.

In connection with the announcement that at the next Pan-American Conference Meeting, the Chilean President is to propose disarmament throughout South America, the foremost London "Sunday paper" The Observer, of Sixth Month 18th, gave a large reproduction (about nine by seven inches in size) of the statue "The Christ of the Andes," which, as Friends will remember, was erected on a long disputed section of the boundary between Chile and the Argentine as a pledge of perpetual peace between the two countries. The prominence accorded to this subject has a welcome significance, none the less because, we believe, the reproduction was originally made from a photograph in the possession of the Peace Committee of London Yearly Meeting.

H. M. P.

In the course of a delightful and characteristic article entitled "Rural Faith: The Peasant in Church," by Maurice Hewlett, which appeared in the London Times of Sixth Month 22, Maurice Hewlett quoted from the experience of Marmaduke Stevenson, and acknowledges his indebtedness to the new volume, "Christian Life, Faith and Thought in the Society of Friends," the revised Part I of the Book of Discipline. In a personal letter regarding the book, he refers to it as "your beautiful little book of pious testimony."

In a recent magazine article, the writer speaks of a class of fifty-four First-day school children between the ages of six and seven where a vote was taken on the books which said children loved most. The favorites mentioned were: Hole's "Life of Jesus," Bird's "Jesus, the Carpenter," and "Joseph the Dreamer," and Violet Hodgkin's "Quaker Saints" and "Legend of St. Christopher."

Last month, Movie Director Hays sent an ultimatum to the picture industry to clean up the films and keep them clean. This order affects the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, which represents seventy or eighty per cent. of the business in this country. This ultimatum, so press despatches said, was to be pasted upon the bulletin boards of all Los Angeles studios, calling upon actors, directors, etc., to assist in eliminating objectionable features. The head of each particular company sent a letter with this order. Every picture of the allied companies is to be filtered through the internal censorship of the head office. The public is asked to report objectionable films.

In a recent issue of THE FRIEND under the title "A Study of the Movies," we had a clear and honest statement of what this task would embrace.

"THE MENTAL ABILITY OF THE QUAKERS" is the title of an interesting article in the current number of Science Progress. The writer, a native of India, gives, amongst other things, a list of Fellows of the Royal Society who are Quakers or of Quaker descent from 1663 to 1915, particulars of successful Quaker businesses and examples of Quaker initiative in works of public utility. He also draws attention to the evidence of mental ability in the philanthropic movements of Friends of the nineteenth century. How much importance dare be attached to his findings we are quite ready to question. He argues that "between the years 1851 and 1900 a man had about forty-six times more chances of being elected F. R. S. if he was a Quaker, or of Quaker descent, than was the case if he belonged to the general population!"

THE Alumnae Association of Bryn Mawr has raised a fund of $25,000 for establishing a prize to be awarded to an American woman who has achieved eminence in some line of work. This is a tribute to the retiring President of the College, and will be awarded every five years or oftener. The jury to award the prize will consist of six persons, M. Carey Thomas, the retiring President, two Bryn Mawr Alumnae and three eminent persons not connected with the college. This year Amy Lowell, of Boston, poet, Cecilia Beaux, of New York, artist, and Carrie Chapman Catt, representing women in politics, have been asked to become members of the jury to award the M. Carey Thomas Prize, consisting of $5,000.

In a recent number of THE FRIEND the statement was made that J. Henry Scattergood was probably the first Friend appointed a Manager of Hampton Institute. We learn that Anthony M. Kimler held the position for many years, resigning on account of the infirmities of age.

PROTESTANT churches in America are planning to give to the Protestant churches in France and Belgium $175,000 during the coming year, chiefly for reconstruction work and for the extension of missionary endeavor in the former German colonies.

THERE has just come from the press a complete alphabetical index of the Bulletins of the Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia.

The ten volumes thus indexed are a veritable treasure of Quaker history; much of the matter never reached the reading public until the Bulletin published it. The index contains between five and six thousand entries and is itself a book of over ninety pages.

Much of the work was done by Amy L. Post of the Haverford College Library. Amelia Mott Gummere and Elizabeth B. Jones assisted in proof-reading.

AN important publication referring to the Peace Letter issued by Philadelphia Friends last spring and now receiving a wide circulation says:

The Religious Society of Friends is issuing an appeal to "Fellow Christians and Sister Churches of All Lands" urging the utter condemnation of the whole system of war unequivocally and without compromise:

"What greater message of cheer and reconstruction could be brought to mankind to-day than the assurance that all who bear the name of Christ in every land have solemnly resolved to have no part in war or in preparation for war, but henceforth to work unitedly for peace by peaceful means alone?"

This remarkable document is destined to have wide publicity and to arouse searchings of heart among Christians all over the face of the earth. It is in effect a new Magna Charta, a demand that Christians shall never again be required to kill each other.

THE following will awaken favorable comment on the part of an ever-increasing number of converts to Esperanto.

It is claimed that many of the educational authorities in Birmingham, England, are in favor of Esperanto and that they signed a memorial to be presented to the League of Nations asking for the subject to be placed on the curriculum of schools throughout the world. There are groups of boys and girls at Ackworth School learning Esperanto and other groups learning Ido, and there is a healthy rivalry between the two groups. Friends have sent a minute on the subject to the League of Nations.

THE Young Quaker is a genuine addition to Friendly periodicals. It has increased its circulation 136 per cent. during the past three months. Among other worth-while papers in the issue for Sixth Month, is one on the simplicity of living. While from the nature of the case it appears in its argument to conditions which obtain in England rather than here, the paper might benefit many a youthful American couple contemplating marriage. We commend it to their attention and quote only the following:—

"To those 'contemplating the engagement of marriage'" expresses the concern of Gwen and Corder Catchpool in the Young Quaker for Sixth Month. Their desire is that young Friends should enter into a great experiment by "building up" as quickly as possible in the midst of the old contending classes a new class that is no class." They acknowledge that this is no easy matter, but say that it must be reached by way of "first Quaker principles." The first step is to fix the style of living. "The guide in this matter is the no-class principle, which will require the home to be neither too pretentious nor too mean; neither too luxurious nor bare to the point of discomfort." The problem of domestic servants, they say, is at the centre of the whole complex. "We must face it resolutely and without compromise. We can never hope to defy the barriers of class distinction if we install the class system on our very hearths."

DR. ELIHU GRANT on a public occasion recently said that mission work touches lightly those for whom it is done, but is the salvation of those who do it. It is therefore in service for others that we can best appreciate God.

WILL WE STAND THE TEST?

An experience, a book and a question—these are the bases of this article. Let me begin with the question. Ever since its birth, Christianity has been engaged in a struggle. At its origin, and in every period since, it has found itself living in a world of strangely mingled good and evil, a world of human beings with wonderful capacities for goodness and love on the one hand, and with awful possibilities of ignorance and wrong on the other. In this struggle between these contending forces, Christianity cannot be an inert bystander. It is, by its very nature, an active participant; it hazards its faith and throws in its lot with the forces of righteousness, and to the Christian it is the supreme force making for the victory of good. Its own existence is at stake. Shall Christianity transform paganism, or will paganism transform Christianity, is the question which Christians have always had to face. And the Society of Friends, together with all other churches to-day, have to look down the future and ask themselves: Have we within us the power to transform our world, or is the world making us conform to its life? The experience to which I referred may illustrate this.

I am just back from a visit to the Broad Top section of the coal-fields in Huntingdon and Bedford Counties, Pennsylvania, whither I went on behalf of the American Friends' Service Committee to investigate the need for child feeding. It is a beautiful country of wooded hills, where deer, birds and other wild creatures are said to abound, and where streams flow down to the green valley of the Juniata. Yet human life there has just now a somewhat grim quality. A few years ago the coal mines and little mining communities in this region were scenes of humming prosperity, but now, for some eighteen months, from a time long antedating the coal strike, industrial depression has rested on the neighborhood. The mines are no longer alive with workmen, the tipples do not drop their loads of coal into the waiting cars, and the railroad tracks do not know the grinding wheels of heavily laden trains. To the miners who live there this means that for these eighteen months there has been practically no work, and very little in the way of earnings for the support of their families. Eighteen months is long enough to use up considerable reserve and to exhaust credit. Many a family, in consequence, is eating little these days. I do not wish to give a wrong impression. There is no famine. Doctors say there is little sickness now, and most of the children, living out of doors as they can at present, look reasonably healthy and happy. But numbers of these families, we learned, have for some time had little to eat but bread and molasses. Milk they cannot afford in most cases, even for the very young children. This is not Russia or Germany, or any country stricken by international war, but a spot in what is, perhaps, the most prosperous nation of the world. Nor are these conditions primarily the result of industrial controversy; yet industrial controversy is there and men are at odds with one another. Whatever one may feel regarding the merits of the opposing sides, there is here an example of the situation which is everywhere facing Christians. Christianity has not won its victory in respect to Broad Top. It has not transformed social life and perfected happiness and harmony, it has not conquered the forces of ignorance and selfishness in our civilization which produce Broad Top and many another maladjustment of life.

In his recent book, "The Reconstruction of Religion," Charles A. Ellwood, Professor of Sociology in the University of Missouri, takes the view that one of the chief needs of religion to-day is to perceive "the essential paganism and barbarity of our present civilization." Pleasure and power are still largely made the ends of life by individuals, by groups and by nations. At the present time Professor Ellwood thinks that we are passing through a religious revolution in which there is grave danger of moral and religious retrogression toward paganism, and in which we are facing the alternative of giving the world a more positive and more vital Christianity, or having it adopt radical irreligion. He says: "Now this recrudescence of barbarism shows conclusively enough that our civilization can no longer remain half pagan and half Christian. It must soon become one or the other. We have come to the parting of the ways. Unless the world becomes speedily Christian, it is bound to become speedily pagan. We cannot tolerate pagan standards in business, in politics, in education, in art, literature and science without coming to repudiate the Christian ideal of life altogether. . . . If it be said that our civilization has always been half pagan and half Christian and that it will doubtless continue to be so, it must be said in reply that the events of the last few years and our present situation show that it cannot remain so. "Nothing can prevent mankind," says a thoughtful writer, "from sinking beneath the tremendous temptations due to modern wealth and power save the creation of a strong religious life which shall lead us to consecrate our control over nature to the process of bringing in the Kingdom of God."

"There is need, therefore, at the present moment of a stalwart religion, a Christianity which shall bend its energies to making our whole civilization conform to the Christian ideal of life."

As a member of the Society of Friends, I find myself asking: How shall we fare in the test of the present and the future? Are we a body of Christians who will make a vital contribution toward the transformation of our communities into commonwealths of Christ? The religion which can meet this test cannot be sluggish, self-satisfied and contented with its world. It must be energized by its sympathies with men's needs and aspirations, by its vision of a new world, and by its sense of a Divine call. Are we entering into this sympathy, are we seeing this vision, are we feeling the call? A religion which can meet this test cannot be one which simply takes its direction from the current, it must have power to hold its own in a sea of contending forces. It will need the firmest kind of grip upon the moral and spiritual realities which must be the basis of the new world. Are our convictions growing stronger, or are we being enervated by prosperity and social position? The religion which can meet this test must know the meaning of religion for the complicated civilization of to-day. Are we taking pains to gain this knowledge? And have we the qualities to win men to a new way of life? This cannot be accomplished by force or by mechanics. It must come through reaching the minds and consciences and hearts of men. Are we growing richer in the forces to which men respond, in faith in their capacities, and in a love which is more powerful than arguments? Will we stand the test?

CALLING AT MANILA.

WM. C. ALLEN.

It has been seven years since I last was in Manila. I then was very busy with addresses and meetings. This time (1922) we were there over one night en route to Hong Kong. Every one on the ship prophesied very hot weather because late spring there is the most trying part of the year. As a matter of fact it was much like good, stiff summer weather in eastern America. The difference largely consisted in getting our emotions worked up to the belief that we were likely to suffer in Manila, whilst in America most of us take a certain number of hot days in each year as a matter of course and are fortunate if we keep too busy to think about them.

Yet it was blistering enough on the big sun-heated steel ship to make us decide to go to a hotel for the night. Getting off on that vessel was a problem. After spending a million or so for her and her equipment the money must have failed when the port-gangway had been built. We were compelled to go down a narrow steep descent, with cleats to keep us from slipping, thirty or forty feet onto the edge of the dock, and there was no railing—only an unsteady rope to cling to.

Manila looks about as it used to, excepting with respect to certain civic improvements. A few big buildings are in course of erection. The Escolta, that half-mile long narrow street, the heart of business, is so crowded with motor cars that blocks are frequent. The Intramuros, or old walled city, with its massive buildings and quaint Spanish residences, is as full of charm as ever. The American régime has not touched its centuries-old lights and shadows. The Pasig River has more little steamboats and fewer sampans floating on its turbid waters. Taft Avenue, in the newer quarter, is now lined with pretty foliage and modern houses—trees and flowers grow here unceasingly every month of the year. Americans are good colonizers, as I can testify after sundry visits to our colonies. Manila has no smells. I saw but one fly and no mosquitoes there on this trip. Our officials do not just talk about keeping our hot countries clean—they keep them clean.

Shopping consumed some of our limited time in Manila. Did we seek souvenirs? No, we were after necessities. The shops cater to Filipinos and Americans. You can get practically everything you would need in the United States. Sundae, delightfully constructed of milk from the real or tin cow, and soda drinks just like home, allure the Americans into dim corners of drug stores where they sip cooling refreshment beneath electric fans. My wife knows exactly where to go in Manila. Then I tried to see some men around town, but all were away. I do not forget to tell about the rooms in our hotel where the windows occupied almost all of one side of each apartment and where there was no glass. The outlook was rich in greenery, ferns and palms, old walls and barred windows, deep recesses and blinding sunlight. I would not like the bars across the glassless windows of the houses of our Spanish-founded colonies—Manila included—were it not for their ofttimes exquisite beauty. They are straight, or curve outwardly in graceful fashion, whilst behind them are caught glances of pretty pots of plants and simple furniture. Indeed, the architectural effects of Japan, China or the Philippines are infinitely more elegant than are our western types with their stiff lines and massive features. Why do not some of our architects go to the Far-East to secure designs that would be adaptable to the exteriors of our western buildings? They and ourselves would be the gainers by such an international development of their noble profession.

The poorer people of the Philippines live in houses made of nipa, a coarse straw. The living-rooms are elevated on posts four feet or more above the ground. The scenes beneath are not always attractive if sometimes interesting. Street cars and excellent roads give a casual visitor varied methods of observing the different phases of life in and around the quaint old city.

Like the busy little bee I improved a few shining hours in endeavoring to ascertain the thought of all sorts of people regarding Philippine independence. I talked to natives on the tram cars, to civilians, soldiers, a newspaper man and others. The situation seems to be about as it was a few years ago. When I asked an intelligent English-speaking Filipino he would very likely tell me that "all" want independence. A native business man somewhat dependent on the expenditures of the United States army will declare that the American occupation is a good thing. Army officers with whom I conversed honestly believed that the Filipinos could not govern themselves if given the opportunity to do so. An American private seemed to feel that the country cost the people of the United States more than it gave them, and that the few Americans who made money out of our holding the country were already rich enough. White civilians have declared to me that native politicians stir up a demand for release from American control, hoping thereby to enhance their own emoluments and power. So it goes. My own conviction is that the good old Declaration of Independence of 1776 and its reference to "the consent of the governed" may be forgotten in this conflict of opinions and that our retaining the Islands as an impregnable fortress is considered by certain Powers as a menace to them which some day they may seek to remove. If such is the case we may well apprehend that holding the Philippines is subtly endangering our own ideals as to human liberty and may become a source of weakness and danger, not of strength and security, to America.

I conclude writing this simple story as the coast of Manila recedes from view. Just in front of me there stands by the ship rail a young woman holding a baby in her arms. The baby is most sensibly covered with only one thin abbreviated garment. The woman is dressed in a sky-blue coat outside of black trousers over purple socks encased in green slippers. And this reminds me that we are now bound for China.

THAT which we know and love we cannot but communicate; and that which we know and do not love, we soon cease to know.—DR. T. ARNOLD.

"IN ALL THINGS I CAN DO AS I LIKE, BUT THEY DO NOT ALL BUILD UP CHARACTER."

Just recently I met a man who is desirous of becoming a Friend. He feels that he doesn't know enough about Friends to apply for membership, and he told me he hesitated also because of one thing—one thing that he considered in some ways very small, and yet in some ways very big.

He said, "I hesitate to apply for the prize (membership in the Society of Friends) because I smoke."

Can you imagine my feelings when I had to confess that we have many smokers among us!

I told him it was not one of our principles, but that, as a body, we were very much opposed to it.

In our "Advices" we find Friends are advised to "avoid and discourage the use of tobacco." But unfortunately, a growing number of Friends do not avoid the use of tobacco, and very few appear to be taking any active effort to discourage its use.

This man says he knows all the arguments on both sides, but still the habit has such a firm hold that he feels he can't give it up. When he was helping at a boys' club he said he wouldn't think of allowing the boys to smoke, and he would discourage any boy from ever beginning, but they as well as I wouldn't need to be told he was a smoker.

"Thou must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach."

He realized it was a waste of money and gave me these figures. He said he spent probably 25 cents a day for tobacco (for a pipe) or, to be on the safe side, he suggested $1.50 a week. He is now thirty-five years old. Granting that he may live to be sixty years old he will have spent $3,722.75 (allowing five per cent, on the money he might have saved each year) on a habit that he says himself is not good for one's health and that he feels makes a person exceedingly selfish. If he lived to be seventy-five years old he would have spent $9,422.43.

He said a friend of his who smoked cigars probably spent just about twice as much, and even this is below the amount spent by others, I am told.

While he knew it might seem like a little thing yet he realized that if anyone said, "Well, if it is such a little thing, why don't you give it up?" that he would find then it was a very big thing.

It would be ridiculous to write a long article for THE FRIEND on the harmful effects of smoking, but are there any smokers who would be willing to give it up when they realize that it is keeping others from joining? It seems like a challenge to the smokers.

In Kent's "Shorter Bible" he translates Paul's advice to the Corinthians as, "Therefore if what I eat proves a hindrance to my brother, sooner than injure him I will never eat meat again as long as I live. In all things I can do as I like, but they are not all good for me. In all things I can do as I like, but they do not all build up character. Each of us must seek not merely his own good, but that of his neighbor."

I heard a university professor telling his class of students that Friends had the highest ideals and more nearly lived up to them than any other set of people he knew.

I wonder if people haven't an idea we are better than we really are?

I realize that it is a delicate subject to touch because some of our wealthiest members smoke, and some of those in our "best families," but shall we follow the ministers who dare not preach as they might because of the wealthy pew holders? If anyone objects to this article let him read John xv: 18: "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you."

SWARTHMORE HALL TO-DAY.

During the past two years the visitors to Swarthmore Hall, the home of Margaret Fell, have numbered 225 (1920) and 240 (1921), so Emma C. Abraham told me when she was performing her labor of love of showing me over the hall, some months ago, before returning to her Liverpool home for the winter months.

You must visit Swarthmore in the warmer months of the year, for during the winter it is closed. At any rate, your interest will be multiplied many fold if you have as your cicerone Margaret Fell's enthusiastic descendant who, far from being troubled by visitors, feels, I believe, almost aggrieved if they go to Swarthmore when she cannot lay bare to them her wealth of love and knowledge concerning all that makes Swarthmore noteworthy.

Although, as it will be remembered, it was as long ago as 1912 that the prospect of this Quaker stronghold again coming into the Society's possession first dawned, it was not until 1910 that Emma Clarke Abraham (not herself a Friend, as her grandfather "married out," but closely in touch with the Society) was able to enter into full occupation which will last her life time and that of her nephew, before the hall and estate finally become the Society's property, if it then wishes to purchase it. The last five years, however, have seen a revolution—not a destructive one, but a constructive one, as regards the interior of the premises.

While a renovation to something of their original form is still lacking in the case of the herb gardens and the orchard where Judge Fell walked with Priest Lampitt the day after his memorable return, the exterior has now resumed practically its original appearance.

An ugly modern barn has gone, and so too has the nineteenth century porch which, perhaps, helped to relieve the flatness of the front, now, however, again in pleasing proportion by the re-piercing of two blocked windows. A balcony on the east side from which George Fox preached to the curious crowds from Ulverston who covered the ground between the house and the little stream (the steepness of whose banks has been somewhat exaggerated in Walter West's otherwise pleasing picture) has been re-erected. To rebuild some of the demolished servants' wing is unfortunately impossible.

Inside, however, one steps from the twentieth into the seventeenth century, first into the flagged hall with its unique staircase in the background, and to the right, straight into the hall of so many hallowed memories. As it looked with the morning sunlight slanting in at its fine bay window, must the room have appeared when Fox and his companions, with Margaret Fell and her children and servants gathered there for their first First-day gathering, when the first stage of foreboding having passed, Judge Fell said, "You may meet here if you will," before he rode off attended only by his clerk and groom to Ulverston Church. And here the visitor sits in the corner, leading to the parlor, where he remembers Judge Fell, good man, sat in his own little parlor at the side with the door ajar, listening and I think, too, truly worshipping.

The original panelling has disappeared, but it has been replaced by fine new woodwork, surmounted, just below the ceiling line, with half a dozen wyverns carved like the frieze which they surmount; these quaint heraldic dragons have been copied exactly from two of the original ornaments belonging to the late owner of the hall. The heavy ceiling beams are whitened all over, the traces of moulding which they still bear proving that this was their original condition, and the modern fire-place has given place to the original deepset grate, discovered behind the brickwork.

Up two steps to the parlor and we were in the little apartment already referred to, where not only Judge Fell sat and listened, but where too, in later years, it is almost certain George Fox completed his dictation to Thomas Lower of the "Journal" begun in Worcester Gaol. The heavy solid tin inkstand resembling pewter ware, is probably the one then used, but the furniture, though in keeping with the atmosphere of the room, is mostly of a somewhat later date. The room, too, is a little smaller, part of one side having been thrown into a giant pantry, evidently an even more important chamber to Mistress Sarah Foster Abraham (great-great-grandmother of the present occupant), a housewife of expansive culinary ambitions, some of whose recipes containing much talk of such items as "sixteen eggs" and "one pound of butter" in a rice pudding, I read as I sat on the parlor window seat, from the paper yellowed with age upon which they had originally been set down.

Up the shallow kitchen stairs we go with their curious cage-like centre, looking as if it had been constructed to take a lift to the upper story, to the bed-rooms. Ancient floors are practically intact, and the original panelling in two rooms. Chief, however, of the upper rooms is Judge Fell's study, a spacious room, with curious double doorway entrance, to keep off draughts, with the latch that must have been raised by many saintly and famous fingers, in one corner. Here, too, is the great carved Fell family four-poster, deprived, alas, of its superstructure by some later users, perhaps as much because they were iconoclasts as lovers of fresh air. Still can be seen the holes for the ropes which supported its massive mattress, and some of the design upon its head is repeated in the large raised fire-place where the judge and his companions must have sat and warmed their toes over the walnuts and wine. Here, too, we can imagine George Fox over the pipe of tobacco "bought for father" as recorded by Sarah Fell in her fascinating "Accounts Book" recently published.

Up another flight and the great attic is reached—store-room perhaps and undoubtedly the cold weather playground of the merry Fell family in their childhood. How the rafters must have rung in those days, but it would take more than the most mischievous of children to move those massive bulks from what has been their resting place for well over 300 years.

The Society owes a deep debt of gratitude to the present owner, not only for her very considerable financial expenditure, which has restored and preserved Swarthmore, but far more for the loving personal interest—a worship would hardly be too strong a term—she has bestowed upon it. Her conversations people it again with the Judge and his children, with Margaret Fell and with George Fox, with Daniel Abraham, husband of Rachel Fell, and their family, till, in 1759, it passed into the hands of heedless owners, who cared not for the sacred associations it holds for us.

A better day has dawned for Swarthmore Hall, and this renaissance, both of interest in our Society's early history and of the desire to give widely again to the world the message of those whose home was at Swarthmore, is of good augury.

NOT NOW.

"Not now," dear heart, but some time thou shalt know

Why it was best to suffer day by day,
Why bear the cross; why burdens heavier grow;
And darkness seems to spread across the way.

Some time, dear heart, though still it be "not now,"

Thy cross, so heavy, shall be laid aside,
The darkness vanish, and upon thy brow
No more the mark of grief's relentless tide;
Instead, a radiance on thy face shall shine,
Born of the love that casteth out all fear,
And peace, that perfect peace, shall then be thine,
E'en though it be, dear heart, "not now," nor here.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE, COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

In the early part of 1851, I completed the purchase of our pleasant summer home at Newport, R. I. The house was then supposed to be nearly a century old. My dear wife and I had much pleasure in fitting it up in a simple, inexpensive way, and we have ever felt it to be cause of grateful thanksgiving to our Heavenly Father that He has permitted us, with the children and the grandchildren, to have so much unalloyed enjoyment at that healthful and beautiful place, endeared by so many sweet recollections. It is true that now in my old age, "the changes that are sure to some" have cast a shade of sadness over those pleasing memories. Dear friends who were wont to welcome us, have gone one by one to their heavenly home, the endeared and precious companion of my life has been taken from my side, and to me their loss is irreparable on earth. Still, however, there is much of rich blessing left, and I ought not to repine, for I know full well "We've no abiding city here." I can still enjoy the comfort and pleasure the dear children have in the mansion on the "Bay Side."

In 1851, our beloved and honored father, Thomas Wistar, died full of years, being nearly eighty-eight. He was a highly valued Elder in the church, and his upright walk and sound Christian faith made him a most excellent example to his numerous descendants. I watched his closing hours, esteeming it a privilege to wait upon him and render any service in my power. His end was very quiet and peaceful. The year following the old home on Market Street was broken up, my sister-in-law Elizabeth W. Wistar removing to the house built for her on Filbert Street, No. 1319. The property has been since rented for business purposes, but as often as I pass it, the memories of the happy hours passed there come vividly before me. How many wise and good have I met within those walls. How many devoted servants of the Lord Jesus. But this world was not the place of their rest. The earthly tabernacle was to be dissolved, and they have gone to "an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." May it be my blessed and happy lot through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus my precious Saviour to meet them there, even if it be through great tribulation, having my robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb.

It was about this time that our friend Cordelia Bayes, a minister from England, came to Philadelphia and visited the families of our Monthly Meeting, to many of which I accompanied her, having satisfaction in thus helping the Lord's servants. In 1853, our beloved friends, William and Josiah Forster, John Candler and William Holmes, came over to deliver to the President and the Governors of the different States of the Union, the address of the Yearly Meeting of London on the evils of slavery. They faithfully performed the onerous and delicate duty, being with very few exceptions, received civilly by the Southern officials. It was while engaged in this work that our beloved William Forster was taken sick at a lonely tavern in Tennessee on the Holston River, not far distant from Knoxville. There in much peace he departed from this life in assured hope of an everlasting life of happiness and rest in the presence of his dear Lord whom he had so long and so faithfully served. His remains were interred at Friendsville in the graveyard of our religious Society. He had, but a few days before, attended the meeting there, and viewed with interest the graveyard, making some inquiries about their manner of interment. Of his last sermon preached on this occasion, one who was present writes, "In his vivid description of the life of the dedicated Christian it seemed as if he might have been involuntarily drawing a picture of himself—first, beautifully setting forth the fruits of earthly dedication, the blessed results arising from a full surrender of the whole man, body, soul and spirit to the tendering, sanctifying power of Divine grace, in the very morning of the day, before the heart is seared and hardened by the cares of the world, or the love of other things, tracing the course of such from one degree of religious attainment to another, gradually mellowing under the bright beams of the sun of righteousness, till finally, the ripe fruit is brought to perfection. In describing the winding up of the earthly course of the perfect man in Christ Jesus, and the crown of glory which awaited him, it seemed as if he had almost opened heaven before us, and a little glimpse was given of those blessed realities, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man, but which God hath laid up in store for all those who love and serve Him."

In the last chapter of the memories of Wm. Forster, edited by B. Seebom, there is a most interesting description of his last illness and of his interment at Friendsville.

The remaining members of the deputation after completing their visits to the Governors of the States, returned to Philadelphia, from whence they forwarded by mail copies of the address to most of the legislators of the Southern States. This closed their Christian labor and they soon after embarked for England.

In 1855 my beloved and honored father, Israel Cope, departed from this life aged nearly eighty-five years. To his wise parental care I am sensible I owe much. He was firm in his discipline and ever a good example. Being of a retiring disposition he did not participate much in public affairs, but sought to be practically useful to his fellow-men in an unobtrusive way. He was very hospitable and enjoyed entertaining his friends liberally. Being fond of reading he was well informed respecting various countries. He loved rural pursuits and took great interest in going with me to visit the farms which were under our care as long as he was able. In the course of his long life he had met with severe afflictions. The death of my own dear mother, and of several dear children were keenly felt. Large pecuniary losses came upon him and were borne with resignation. My dear step-mother who had long been his true and loving companion, and the judicious, tender friend and counsellor of his children, was also removed by death a few years before his decease, but, a day or two before his peaceful close, he said his sorrows were no more remembered. All tribulation was over, and we reverently believe he was through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus admitted into one of those mansions in his heavenly Father's house. About a year after, my beloved sister Lydia was also removed by death from our family circle. She was one who felt tenderly for the sorrows and afflictions of others, and did what she could to relieve them. Her loving, cheerful character made her very attractive both at home and abroad, but we doubt not, through her Saviour's redeeming love, the change was a blessed one for her.

In 1856, our dear friends, Priscilla Green and Mary Nicholson, ministers of our religious Society from England, arrived in Philadelphia, and by arrangement previously made, became inmates of our household. We felt this to be a precious privilege, to entertain devoted disciples of the Lord Jesus, who both by nature and grace were lovely in their lives. Unity with them brought as it were the refreshing dews of Heaven upon our spirits, and the remembrance of this, even after the lapse of twenty years, is yet as the greenness that is known by the side of the still waters. I accompanied them at various times in some of their religious visits, and we had also many precious seasons of waiting upon the Lord in the family circle. They were both of them women of much spiritual discernment, and gifted in ministry, being admirably fitted to sustain each other in the gospel of labor committed to them. Mary Nicholson by her sweet, winning, affable manner opening the way for her more reserved and retiring friend. They continued in this country about two years, often cheering us by their returns to Filbert Street. While they were with us our dear daughter Mary was married to James Whitall, who by this connection was not far separated from us.

In 1858, my dear wife and I in company with Richard Richardson and wife, set out to visit the land in Iowa which had been purchased to carry out the concern of Josiah White to establish a manual labor school for poor children. On our way we visited friends in Cincinnati and in Richmond, Indiana. We crossed the Mississippi at Burlington, Iowa, and went through Mount Pleasant to Salem, near which the land was located. It was on the wide prairie without much improvement, and there seemed but little prospect of any useful result, the funds having been very badly invested. Our journey was an agreeable and informing one, with new experiences of life which, however, did not tend to dissatisfy us with our eastern homes. We returned to Philadelphia by way of Chicago, Cleveland, Niagara Falls, &c.

My dear Sarah having long been desirous to visit our friends in England, and the way appearing clear, we concluded in the spring of 1860 to cross the Atlantic. The passage was engaged in the Persia, a noble side-wheel steamer from New York. We left on the _____ of Fourth Month; the voyage proved a propitious one, and at Liverpool we were met by our beloved friend Benjamin Seebom, who after a day or two's rest took us to his home at Bradford. There we spent a delightful week, his dear wife and daughter devoting themselves to make our stay enjoyable. We accomplished in our five months' visit all we had in prospect. On our return voyage we were accompanied by our dear friend Eliza Barclay and her nephew, John Henry Backhouse, the grandson of Joseph John Gurney, who tarried with us during part of their visit to America.

BOOK REVIEW.

"ENGLISH PRISONS TO-DAY."

*The Report of the Prison System Enquiry Committee.**

This Committee was formed early in 1919, and has pursued its investigations for three years. The Chairman is Sir Sydney Olivier, and the membership included representatives of various schools of political thought. It has been edited and largely written by Stephen Hobhouse and A. Fenner Brockway, both of whom served long terms of imprisonment during the war.

The result of their labors appears in a bulky octavo of 728 pages, containing thirty-eight chapters and four appendices. It is published by Longmans, Green & Company, London and New York.

Notwithstanding the high character and reputation of the members of this Committee, the Home Office refused to furnish any official information, and also forbade the members of the staff of every prison from giving evidence. But before this order reached the various Prison Boards, replies had been obtained from fifty prison officials. Reports were received from twenty-two visiting Magistrates and from thirty-four Agents of Prisoners' Aid Societies. Some 290 statements came from ex-convicts of varying types.

The Report especially mentions the bad effects of separate confinement in cells, and adduces overwhelming evidence in support thereof. A visiting Minister: "The first month of separate confinement has no reforming value. It seems to me wanton cruelty, or else very bad psychology. It nearly drives some mad, others are made bitter with indignation, and it destroys personality with a third class, crushing them to the earth."

A Priest: "The preliminary period of separate confinement is of no value and is cruel. They are shut up just when they need company."

Agent of an Aid Society: "Separate confinement very often affects the mentality in a powerful way."

A Warder: "The moral and physical dangers of the month's separate confinement are far and away more serious than any compensating advantage."

Few prisoners attempt to obey the silence rule. Those who do so suffer grave mental consequences.

An ex-prisoner: "If it were possible to enforce the rule, ninety per cent. of the prisoners would lose their reason within a few months. I know one prisoner who felt that he ought conscientiously to observe the rules; he tried to refrain from all speech and communication with his fellows, and at the end of three months his mind was so affected that he had to be removed to a home for the mentally defective. There was a young man at Portland who was punished for talking, and, promising never to do so again, kept his word. The result was that he became like an idiot, and could be seen working his face in a horrible manner as he stood at his work." These extreme cases are rare, since the vast majority of prisoners make no attempt to maintain silence.

An Official: "I have little doubt that this absurd and unnatural rule is responsible for many of the cases of mental deficiency which constitute a certain proportion of our prison population."

The silence rule is not the only vice in the system. Self-respect is systematically destroyed and self-expression prevented in every phase of prison existence.

Perhaps the most remarkable facts elicited by this investigation are those relating to insanity and suicide in prisons. The ratio of insanity in prisons is 86.6 per 10,000, which is tenfold the ratio among the ordinary population. That imprisonment in the English jails is largely the cause of this insanity is indicated by the fact that the insanity rate increases with the length of the sentences served.

Elaborate precautions are taken to prevent suicide. But with all the precautions the suicide rate in prison is three times greater than outside.

The statistics for 1920-21 show that 54 per cent. of the male prisoners and 73 per cent. of the female prisoners have been previously sentenced at least five times. One chapter cites 28 statements of ex-convicts as to the effects of imprisonment. "There's nothing to beat a jail sentence for utterly debasing whatever was left in a man of what was good." "This life reduces one to the level of a wild beast, and every bit of one's better nature is literally torn out. . . . If you come to see me, look out for something between a man and a beast, uncouth and uncivilized."

The political prisoners or conscientious objectors were asked to name any benefits arising from their experience in prisons. Two hundred and eighteen were consulted, and 134 mentioned some advantages, although, as a rule, condemning the general system. Among these benefits were:—

1. Opportunities for reading and meditation.
2. Spiritual benefits from prayer and religious reflection.
3. Lessons in patience and sympathy.
4. Valuable experience at first hand which may aid in bringing about penal reform.

In the concluding chapter it is urged that our penal theories must be revised. Punishment must no longer be the object. "Guilt, and the measure of it, is a question for a higher and more competent judge than human beings are ever likely to provide, nor is deterrence a reliable motive."

Not the least important cures for crime are the same as the remedies for poverty, for lack of proper education and the like, and are therefore political rather than specifically criminological.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TRAINING THE PALATE.—"Have you been sorry that you learned to eat all kinds of food?" asked a neighbor of Evelyn Lewis, who had been required to learn to eat all ordinary foods before she might make a long-desired visit to her Eastern relatives.

"Never once," admitted Evelyn, "though for awhile I feared I never should accomplish it. You know, it took me a whole year. When there were only rhubarb and buttermilk left to conquer, I felt as if I were quite a heroine; and finally when I could eat a piece of rhubarb pie or drink a glass of buttermilk without making a wry face, I felt deserving of a medal for overcoming a wayward palate."

"You were always so fussy about your food, I often wondered at your mother's patience with you," said the neighbor.

"And I wondered at her seeming cruelty when she told me that when I could sit down to a meal and eat whatever was set before me, I might go on a year's visit to our Eastern relatives. She said she did not wish my grandmother and aunts to be annoyed by my finicky tastes, because of which they would blame her for not training me properly."

"It was well for me that I had educated my taste, for at the very first meal five of the dishes served were ones I would have disdained to eat a year before. My grandmother's feelings would have been dreadfully hurt if I had refused them. As it was, I gained the reputation of being so easy to entertain because I liked everything."

"Many a time since that visit I have been thankful that I could eat any food, for often I might otherwise have gone hungry. I have learned to bless my mother's wisdom in requiring what seemed at the time a terrible hardship. Moreover the moral effect was good, for I am not now prone to lose heart at a difficulty as I was, and my health is far more stable."—Christian Endeavor World.

WEEDING THE ONION BED.

The days were long and the sun shone hot
Upon Farmer Goodsen's garden plot,
Where corn and cabbages, beets and peas,
Melons and cucumbers, those and these,
Grew and spread in the sun and light,
Wrestling upward and downward with might,
While in and among them, flourishing still,
As only weeds can, weeds grew with a will.

"Weeds grow apace," the old farmer said,
Leisurely viewing each garden bed;
"Well—the plow for the corn, for the cabbage the hoe—
But then in some places, I ought to know,
There's nothing so certain the weeds to destroy
As the fingers and thumbs of a trusty boy."
So, raising his voice, he shouted, "Ned!
Here, sonny, come weed out this onion bed!"

The day was hot, and the beds were dry,
As garden beds are in late July;
And Ned was reading his Fairy Book,
In the cool, sweet shade by the orchard brook,
While wondering whether he'd come with grace,
Or with frown and pout on his bright young face,
I looked and lo! there was plucky Ned Tugging away in the onion bed.

oft and again as the day wore by,
Till the sun went down in the western sky,
I glanced toward the garden, and always there
I caught the gleam of his gold-brown hair,
As under the hat his curly head
Bent low o'er the weeds in the onion bed.

Ah, years have journeyed and gone since then,
And Ned is a man in the world of men,
With heart and hand and a steadfast will,
He is pulling the weeds of evil still,
A shining record and noble fame
Belong to-day to his honored name.
Yet nowise grander he seems to be
Than long ago he appeared to me
When promptly bending his curly head, Patiently weeding the onion bed.

—Wide Awake.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

KIRBY PAGE, author of "The Sword or the Cross," lectured at the Woolman School at Swarthmore on the twenty-second of Seventh Month. Although the meeting dealt mainly with problems of the Social Order, some of Kirby Page's remarks are applicable to problems of international order. He emphasizes in particular the inevitability of conflict where activity is predominantly directed toward selfish ends.

TWENTY-SEVEN THOUSAND young men are to receive a month of military training in Citizens' Military Training Camps this summer, as provided for in the Defense Act of 1920. About fifty thousand made application, but the Army Appropriation Act did not provide an appropriation adequate for so great a number. About ten thousand received similar training last summer.

FREDERICK J. LIBBY is preparing in booklet form for the use of Bible Classes and study groups the course of lectures on preparation for peace work presented by him at the Earlham Conference.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA has voted to favor the observance of Armistice Day, or the First-day nearest to it, as a day of special consideration of the responsibilities and duties of nations in international relations, suggesting that in observing the day, care be taken to emphasize the spiritual aspects and needs of international life, and the importance of constructive peace programs, to the end that church members generally may be kept informed of the world peace movement, and may be inspired to do their individual part in promoting right international relations.

THE promotion of peaceful understanding between France and Germany was the object of a meeting recently held in the chamber of the German Reichstag by representatives of the French League for the Rights of Man and the Federation of German Peace Societies. Herr Loebe, the president of the Reichstag, opened the meeting, which was addressed by prominent representatives of both nations. Professor Albert Einstein was one of the speakers.

OF the 13,878,671 letters received at Washington expressing opinions about the Disarmament Conference, more than ten million, according to the Federal Council Bulletin, were pleading for Divine guidance for the Conference.

W. L. MCKENZIE-KING, Premier of Canada, has suggested to Secretary Hughes that the Rush-Bagot Agreement, limiting armaments on the Great Lakes, be recast in the form of a modern treaty, as it has done good service and is obsolete in language. It was ratified in 1818, and provides that the United States and Great Britain may each maintain four vessels of war on the Great Lakes and Lake Champlain, provided that each vessel does not exceed one hundred tons burden, and carries no armament heavier than one eighteen-pounder gun. It says nothing about land armament, but its spirit has been extended to include the whole boundary between the United States and Canada.

VETERANS of the "Rainbow Division" have petitioned the House of Representatives to remove from the sub-committee on army appropriations Representatives Anthony, of Kansas, Sisson, of Mississippi, and Stafford, of Wisconsin, who resisted strenuously some items of the Army Appropriations Act. The veterans request that men sympathetic with the carrying out of the provisions of the Defense Act of 1920 be substituted for these men.

THE TACNA-ARICA AGREEMENT.—Permanent peace in South America was brought one step nearer when on the twenty-first of Seventh Month, in the Hall of the Americas

Pan-American Building in Washington, delegates from Chile and Peru signed an agreement whereby the President of the United States is to arbitrate the claims of the two countries to the province of Tacna, on the Pacific Coast between Chile and Peru.

The province came into the possession of Chile after the War of 1879-1883. By the provisions of the Treaty of Ancon, which terminated that war, Chile was to have the territory for ten years, and after that time its final disposition was to be determined by a plebiscite. In 1894, internal conditions in Peru made a plebiscite impossible, and since then no agreement has been reached as to the conditions of the plebiscite; and meanwhile Chile has been in possession, maintaining a large army in the district. So for nearly forty years, the "problem of the Pacific," as the question was until recently called, has been a potential source of danger.

Early this spring, President Harding offered his services as arbiter to the Chilean and Peruvian Governments, which were then re-opening the discussion, Chile having taken the initiative, but having acceded to Peru's suggestion that the question be arbitrated, the definite Chilean proposal for a settlement having proven unacceptable to Peru. The negotiations were long and stormy, and several times seemed hopelessly deadlocked, but under the tactful guidance of Secretary Hughes, the difficulties were smoothed away, and the arbitration protocol agreed to. The agreement provides that the President of the United States shall determine whether or not a plebiscite shall be held; if it is held, the conditions governing it; if no plebiscite is held, Peru and Chile shall negotiate directly, and if their negotiations fail to reach an agreement, they shall submit the question once more to the President of the United States.

"Among our current deficiencies, it is not fanciful to denominate the lack of the peace mind as our cardinal loss. We observe the effects of its absence in all directions. Our industrial conflicts are embittered and our social arrangements endangered by an indisposition toward peace shown by employers and employed. . . . In international concerns, this defect is seen at its worst. Not only is there disagreement as to policies and purposes, but the temper displayed by Governments in their dealings with each other is such as to preclude the anticipation of an early settlement of the world's affairs."—HOLFORD KNIGHT, in the Fortnightly Review (English).

IN connection with the above paragraph, it is interesting to note that the sheriff of Carbondale, Pennsylvania, found the first step toward the prevention of disorder in connection with the strikes, according to the daily papers, was to disarm some of the private guards employed by the companies. Disarmament should begin at home.

"In all the anti-war propaganda, material waste and physical suffering have received the major emphasis. These considerations will never end war. The conviction that war is sin alone will bring the issue squarely before the conscience, and give wings to its latent idealism. If the war-makers should hold the faintest suspicion that the pulpits of Christendom would do their own Christian thinking about war, and exercise the right of choice whether they would bless or condemn it, our governments would be more deliberate about setting the stage for another war."—WILLIAM AUSTIN SMITH, Editor of The Churchman, in the Federal Council Bulletin.

THE history of literature, of science, of art, of industrial achievements all testify to the truth that success is only the last term of what looked like a series of failures.—JOHN MORLEY.

WHAT DID YOU DO?

During the war many a man was spurred on to enlist by the statement that in the future his own children might ask him: "Father, what did you do during the war?" In some way this same question ought to be brought home to every adult Friend in the United States. At a time when thousands of people are turning to the Society of Friends with questions concerning the way of life, the Service Committee finds itself with a great many applications from people who are not Friends and comparatively few applications from Friends themselves for service abroad. The Committee has been looking for a physician for its work in Russia for a year. Jewish, Russian, Catholic, and doctors without church affiliations have volunteered. There are Friends who would have volunteered if it were not for age limitations and health requirements, but up to the present time no suitable physician has offered his services from the Society of Friends, even though we have offered a small salary in addition to maintenance. A great many people are eager to join in our work in Poland and Austria, but comparatively few Friends are volunteering for this service now that the war is over and it is not the popular thing to do.

It is impossible to carry on our work unless we have a sufficient number of Friends, or those who are grounded in the principles of Friends, to give the right kind of direction to the work. We are glad to have the co-operation and fellowship of so many other people, but we do need more of those who have been born with a sense of responsibility for their fellow-man and who are actuated by the desire to serve Jesus Christ by doing such work. This is not a time to make a plea for personnel, but a time for individual heart-searching as to how the question can be answered when put to us. What did you do to make the message of Jesus a living reality to the hungry and the helpless in their time of need?

SHE HATH DONE WHAT SHE COULD.

(A Little Girl's Contribution for Russian Relief.)

DEAR MISS HAINES:—

I have tried to earn a little money for the Russians by selling some of the plants that I raised in my garden. I just earned this four dollars and twenty-five cents and I hope it will do some Russian good. I am eleven years old and I hope to be able to give you a large sum of money soon.

I don't think you know me, but I hope we'll soon meet.

Your devoted worker, ———

ARE WE WORTHY?

The following letter is a challenge to Friends:—

DEAR FRIENDS:—

I am sending you herewith a check for $500. You may use it either for Russian relief or for your work in West Virginia, or divide it between the two, as you feel that the need is greatest and the funds most difficult to secure. I am in deep sympathy with your work in both fields.

It is that spirit of fellowship and good-will of which you write and which enters so constantly into your work and which you strive to bring into the relations of those whom you endeavor to serve that makes me feel such satisfaction in being able to join with you in this service to our unfortunate fellow beings. I have no use for mere "alms-giving." There should be no need for alms if mankind were just and unselfish, and we owe it to those whom society wrecks by its own ambition and wickedness and stupidity, to alleviate their sufferings as we can. I can think of nothing more splendid than to be one of your workers, carrying that spirit of love and sympathy, along with material aid and refreshment, into the work of relief. Since that is not possible for me, I must find my pleasure in helping those who do the real work.

Cordially yours,

"FORTY ACRES AND A MULE."

To the Polish peasant no less than to the American freed slave, land and stock represent all this world's blessings to which one can aspire. More fortunate than the Negro, the peasant already owns the acres and the Friends' Mission is trying to supply the mule.

Throughout the years when the peasants of Eastern Poland were pushed back by the armies and swept into Russia, they were sustained by the memory of the home-land and the hope of return to their own fields and the simple, laborious life that meant happiness to them. After the war they began to return. They had but fled from one tragedy to encounter another. There was no place to live, there were neither horses nor cows, there were no implements nor seeds. They returned enfeebled, with empty hands, to begin life anew.

It is no easy matter to cultivate the wilderness and to obliterate the traces of seven years of war. Acres of fertile fields are now overgrown with weeds and grass. The woods have encroached upon the meadows, covering them with a growth of young birch trees sometimes fifteen feet high. Barbed wire entanglements still cover miles of territory, and everywhere the earth is broken by trenches. It was a feat for the refugees to discover in this scene of desolation the plots of ground to which they could claim ownership. Sometimes they were recognizable by the fruit trees standing by the scattered heap of bricks, once the oven, which was all that remained of the house. Sometimes there was nothing—not even a square yard of cultivatable ground—to show where house and garden had been. Disappointing as they found their homecoming, at least they were refugees no longer, and they set to work to put their land in condition.

It was a heart-breaking task, lightened only by the help received from the Mission. It was necessary to supply food, implements, material for house building, seeds and aid in tilling the soil. Assistance in getting the land under cultivation was the most important form of relief. In the spring of 1921 tractor plowing was undertaken. Small tracts were plowed for the neediest peasants, and afterwards larger tracts for those who agreed to plant them to grain in order to increase the bread supply. Because of the costs and delays in tractor plowing, this method was superseded by horse plowing. An observer describes the difficulty of this work. The peasant leads a two-horse plow, his wife following behind, turning over with her hands the sods too heavy for the plow to turn. Every five or six yards the man has to stop and help her. A second plowing is necessary before the seed can be sown. Only the strongest peasants can get much land in condition unaided. This spring the Mission bought the horses from the Government for about $7.00 apiece. It was money well spent. The use of a seven-dollar horse, a German trench spade, and a few seeds puts a family on its feet by the end of the first harvest.

Most of the horses were organized in plowing columns which are plowing a piece of land for as many returning peasants as possible. At the present rate, these columns can plow enough land to start 2,000 families each month with at least four acres of broken ground. All the spring the columns worked at terrific pressure to prepare the ground for planting, which went on as late as there was any hope that the seed would grow. Crop reports are favorable and everything indicates that the peasants with their Mission sickles and scythes will reap a good harvest. As soon as the crops are gathered, fall plowing will be begun. Then the horses will be sold to the neediest peasants and the proceeds from the sale will be used for permanent local improvements.

So rapid has been the improvement in the districts where the Friends are working that the Ministry of Repatriation has been studying their system and recommending its adoption in other districts. Oscar Moon, assistant head of the Mission, who was present at a conference of all the County Starostas, reports that they showed great interest in the work of the Friends. He says: "The only breath of criticism against the Friends was that they had gotten control of horses which belonged to the Government and which should have been available for the use of local officials. The Commissar replied that if the Polish people had been as wide awake to the needs of their country as the Quakers they would have had the use of the horses. The Quakers saw the need, made application to the War Ministry, and got the horses. Confidence was expressed that they would secure the maximum results from their use." Whether they can secure the maximum results depends on the help received from America. The plan of plowing four acres for 2,000 families every month during the three autumn months with all the incidental relief calls for $40,000. The shortage of money is so great that the Mission has had to discontinue giving a week's ration of food to each newly-arrived refugee family. Without our help the return to normal life is indefinitely delayed. The acres are there, but what avails ownership without food and seed and plows and horses?

Only those who have lived among the peasants know what our aid means to them. Oscar Moon thus describes their attitude. "Their appreciation is pathetic. Most of them attempt to kiss the hand in token of gratitude, but why not? Have not the Quakers given them an acre of plowing, and does not that one acre spell the difference between life and death to them? Why should they not look upon these people as saviors? So they kiss the hands that have helped them."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A MESSAGE from Elihu Grant of Haverford College, covering the spirit of the Richmond Conference to convene next month:

Remember always that we are the Religious Society of Friends, that our religion is the religion of Jesus Christ and that our friendliness is born of His Spirit.

The Five Years' Meeting does not come together in the interests of theology, but of religion, and theology is not religion. It does not convene in the interests of politics, but of friendliness and love. It does not exist for business mainly, but in the name and for the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. These three, theology, politics, business, may be good but they are not the best. The religion and spirit of Christian brethren is best and we are called to exhibit these in the convincing demonstration of the Spirit and of Power. The world does not need our contributions, this year, of business, politics, nor perhaps of theology, but throughout the five-year period before us it needs desperately the spirit and grace of Jesus Christ.

LETTER FROM GERMANY TO A PHILADELPHIA FRIEND.
GUBEN (Brandenburg).
Seventh Month 12, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

Adolph Baumann sent me thy address, because I asked him for tracts on the deeper Christian truths. I became a Quaker some weeks ago. I have loved the Quakers for years, Fox, Penn, Barclay, etc., the old Quakers, the plain old Quakers. I like very much "No Cross, No Crown." But I cannot buy it on account of the German rate of exchange. I would much like something on the deeper truths of Christianity. I have read "Echo and Voice" (taken from THE FRIEND, Philadelphia) in German. Are there more writings of this kind? I am a member of the international Society of Friends, but I long to learn much more. Are there still Quakers in the way of Fox, in speech and apparel? All their life filled with the passion to live a real Christian life like the first Quakers? Please send me books, tracts or old Journals, of the same kind as "Echo and Voice." I should like to hand them to my friends here. I have religious meetings in my lodgings and we read Quaker books. I am a teacher and have two sons who attend school. For myself, I like English just as well, but for the Friends here they must be in German. Was "Echo and Voice" written first in German, or was it translated? When thou comes to Germany, I hope thou wilt come to Guben, that thou may be able to teach me much more about the "Inner Light," and how to live a deeper Christian life. Please help me to live a more deep, inner life.

Thankfully,

H. — N. —

FOLLOWING the example of Westtown School, which two or three years ago "set up" a Monthly Meeting at the School, it appears that a similar step has been taken by Oak Grove Seminary at Vassalboro, Maine.

THE blue-backed quarterly, Friends' Fellowship Papers, has found a most welcome reception in the homes of some American Friends. The issue just received announces that, unless the unforeseen should happen, the Eleventh Month issue (that is the next but one) will be the last. Various circumstances have conspired in leading up to this position, and without a sufficient subscribing clientele and in the absence of a subsidy it is impossible to continue.

The number before us is unique in this that the respective Clerks of the Vienna and the Berlin Monthly Meetings each contributes an article, Ernst Lorenz (Berlin) giving an impression of London Yearly Meeting. "As a living experience never to be forgotten," he carries away the memory "that there, above all meanings and opinions, is standing the living spirit of unity, of oneness."

It is reported that in Poland the Society of Friends has recently been registered as a religious body for the benefit of the one Polish Friend.

In the course of an article on "The Supernatural under Domestication," in the Seventh Month Hibbert Journal, the writer says: "There is a story of an American who purchased a sculptured angel of an undertaker in the hope that, with a little manipulation, it might serve as a statue of William Penn. Several adepts were called in, and tried in turn their chisels. But the chippings only proved the metamorphosis impracticable, and finally the angel was broken up for road metal. Let him that readeth understand." He suggests the "moral" as follows:—

"The modern man who says he has no use for religion is perfectly right. He hasn't. In his sense of the word no one ever had. The people who are wrong, who are holding us up and wasting our time, are the people who are trying to chip away religion to the cut of the New Worldliness. The more they try, the less angelic does the figure become, without in the least resembling the image set up upon the plain of Babylon. The Churches would be well advised to give up the new stunt and return to the new birth. Up to the present they cannot be said to have made much headway with 'social reconstruction.' And the reason, as the newspapers put it, 'is not far to seek': man is not socially constructed; if reconstructed at all, he is spiritually. Like the poet—and I do him the honor of saying that a poet he is, every inch of him—he is born, not made. It is just possible that he may be born again. It is entirely impossible that he should be manufactured."

It is probably the case that no English Friend traveling with a minute has made a longer stay with us within the memory of any now living than has our beloved friend E. Maria Bishop. She was helpful wherever she went, her rare gift of fitting in comfortably with the family conditions as she found them endeared her to all to whom she came. Her report to her home "Meeting for Sufferings" will interest our readers and we give it in part as sent us by a correspondent:—

E. Maria Bishop said that the last two years had been a wonderful time of experiencing God's guidance. She had no very definite plan when she went out, but she went where the way opened and day by day the guidance came. She sometimes seemed to come to the right place just at the right time. It was very easy in America to slip into the household arrangements, as you are never treated as a stranger. Personal talks, when she entered into sympathy with those to whom she was speaking, were a feature of the service. Her concern had been for visiting in the Eastern States, and a large part of her time was spent amongst the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, where there were a large number of small meetings, in many of which the two branches existed side by side. She visited meetings in North Carolina, a group in Ohio, and attended the two Yearly Meetings of Baltimore, and after that went to Virginia. She visited various colleges and schools, including Oberlin College, with its four or five thousand students drawn from seventeen different nationalities, including Negroes; State College, Pennsylvania; Cornell University; Wellesley College; Westtown School, George School, Oakwood, and Woolman School. The old differences were dying down, especially amongst the younger generation of Friends. In Canada, where several meetings were also visited, new ones had been started in various places. In these Friends all met together without any difference. She felt there was cause for much thankfulness for the way in which Friends were being drawn together, and that the more visits that can be interchanged the better. We need to mix more on both sides of the Atlantic, and to help one another in every possible way. We need the buoyancy and keenness of American Friends, and we also have something to contribute. Much enthusiasm had been caused by the All Friends' Conference. Western Friends had been impressed by our meetings for worship, which had made many of them long for that kind of worship amongst themselves.

THE membership of London Yearly Meeting now stands at 20,047. Convincements for the year 381; 171 dissociations, resignations, etc. Births have been 119 and deaths 304. Removals into the Yearly Meeting 23, against 6 out. Recorded ministers 240. Number of members reported married 173, against 207 last year, 204 in 1919 and 150 in 1918.

THERE is a Danish monthly—Gads Danske Magazín. A recent issue contains an article by a prominent minister of the National Lutheran Church, which he entitles: "The Sacrament of Silence." He advocates the use of silent meetings and services in the churches, as a need of the present time. He speaks sympathetically of the Quaker way of worship, and of the work of Friends during and since the war. He also gives several quotations from the writings of Caroline Stephen. The writer's idea is not to abolish the sacraments of the Church and substitute silence instead; but he advocates absolute silence during "the holy supper."

IN a recent issue of THE FRIEND, we gave the names of the five delegates to the Bluffton Conference from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. We can now add the five who are appointed as delegates from the Five Years' Meeting. They are Wilbur K. Thomas, Paul J. Furnas, L. Hollingsworth Wood, W. Rufus Kersey and Charles E. Tebbetts. While official delegates are being chosen by the religious bodies participating, it is an open conference and it is strongly urged that many others attend.

AN interesting feature of one of the special meetings during the week of New England Yearly Meeting at Vassalboro, Maine, was the exhibition of a large map which showed the location of each meeting-house in the Yearly Meeting and which was so colored as to tell which houses were closed, which open, and which were in use a part of the year. One qualified for the task gave a careful survey of the whole field and explained where were the best opportunities for opening new work and reviving old meetings.

ANOTHER book for children by Rufus M. Jones—"Jesus and His Companions"—is soon to appear from the press of Macmillan & Co. The chapters of this book have already appeared in serial form in The Friend (London) and have been highly appreciated by both old and young. The series now embraces three:—"The Story of George Fox," "Paul the Hero," and the one just referred to.

We learn of a Quarterly Meeting where it has become the practice at the session next following the Yearly Meeting for various Friends to give short impressions of the Exercises of the Meeting.

THE power of the church lies not in the gathering of crowds round a compelling leader, but in the spiritual force of the corporate body—a body composed of disciplined, devoted members, bent on the pilgrimage from self to God. Until we learn this lesson, and seek that circumcision of the spirit which brings every religious as well as what we call secular impulse into the captivity of Christ, our conferences and movements will leave us more powerless, because more disillusioned, than they found us. As individuals and as Churches we are sent into the world, not to express our own views and conceptions of what the Christian life should be, but to manifest Christ—to live in the power and under the rule of the incarnation.—E. HERMAN in "Creative Prayer."

IS SINNING OBSOLETE?

Time was when we heard a great deal about sin. Nowadays, in polite circles, the word is almost never mentioned. One might suppose that it had "gone out"—like beaver hats or haircloth sofas. Much that used to be called "wicked" we explain away in other terms. It is not only that standards of behaviour have changed, but enough progress has been made in psychology, both of children and of adults, for us to realize that many things which were formerly attributed to "human depravity" are perfectly natural reactions to certain conditions, physical or temperamental. We are all of us strange bundles of characteristics, gathered up from a long line of ancestors.

We may then be doing Johnny or Mabel grave injustice, if we attribute to "sheer perversity" acts that are really to be traced to eyes, adenoids or malnutrition. Our extremists carry this thought out to the danger point, for they would excuse everything, from nail-biting to highway robbery, with their glib talk of "neuroses," "complexes," "hormones" and "chromosomes."

But, in our hearts, we are well aware that there is such a thing as sin. Acting contrary to the best we know, sitting idly by when there is a man's work to be done, wilfully disregarding the heavenly vision: this is to be sinful in the Divine sight, or in our own. Susanna Wesley's definition, written in a letter to her sons when they were leaving home for college, holds just as true to-day as ever it did. She says, you will remember, that "Whatever weakens your reason, impairs the tenderness of your conscience, obscures your sense of God, or takes off the relish of spiritual things; in short, whatever increases the authority of your body over your mind, that thing is sin to you, however innocent it may be in itself."

Paul, while he was "yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter" against the Church, could hardly be accused of sinning. He says that he thought all the while he was doing God service, and surely God overlooks much mistaken effort that is sincerely put forth in His name, and doubtless somehow overrules it for good. But if Paul, after his vision on the way to Damascus, had continued the work he was engaged in, persecuting the Lord's disciples, surely he would have been sinning grievously. Of, if he had stopped the active persecution, but had declined to heed the call of his Master to go forth "a chosen vessel," bearing His name "before the gentiles and kings and the children of Israel," he would have been sinning just as certainly.

Not much is said about it in the record, but it takes little imagination to picture how humbling an experience it must have been for this high-hearted, vigorous man to go over to the despised sect, siding openly with them. He cared for the approval of his friends and associates probably just as much as we do. Their ill-concealed scorn and derision must have cut his sensitive spirit, just as such contempt would cut us. How he must have shrunk from it! How often must the question have arisen in his mind, as he struggled with his problem: "Can I be sure that this is the right course, after all, or is it just possible that I am making a dreadful mistake?"

But we know how he answered it. Late in life he was able to say, humbly yet triumphantly, that he had not been "disobedient to the heavenly vision." He opened his heart, his life, everything that he had, to his Master, so that he could say that it was no longer he that lived, but Christ who was living in him. (Try to think out what those familiar words mean.)

He was able to say: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith!" That same Power can do as much for us, and will, if we are full of faith and faithful. We need to be often reminded that faithfulness in little things is essential. We can search the Scriptures a long while before we find a sentence reading: "Well done, good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over the big things, the little ones don't count!"

No. If we are unfaithful in the little, we need never hope to be made ruler over more, that is, to be given greater tasks or more far-reaching responsibilities.

It is to the window marked "TICKETS REDEEMED" that we go to receive compensation for a strip of pasteboard that might have done service, but didn't. Thank God, that not only is Jesus Christ a saviour from the sins we have wilfully committed, but a redeemer from the waste of things left undone, of the work we might have accomplished, but did not.

But let us not delude ourselves with the thought that something magical takes place when we "accept Christ." We are sometimes led to believe that this is the case. But that is not God's way with us. He does not wave a wand, changing us over magically into perfect human beings. What He does do, is to give us the opportunity of becoming what He wants us to be, and enough of His own strength to surmount every obstacle. Consider that sentence in the second paragraph of the Fourth Gospel: "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name."

He does not make us His children, in this higher sense. He gives us power to become His sons and daughters, if we really want to be. Then we are really worth something to Him, and He can use us in His work. The choice is always ours.

THE VISIT OF WILLIAM C. AND ELIZABETH C. B. ALLEN TO TOKIO.

[The following was delayed in transit, but even at this date is of sufficient interest to warrant its issuance.—Eds.]

We are always glad to welcome visiting Friends, especially those who come with vital concerns and desires to meet with the Japanese Friends and share their problems. With such a living concern William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen arrived by the Shinyo Maru at Yokohama early on First-day morning, Fourth Month 30th. They reported a quiet voyage and were ready in body and mind for the special meeting for worship which had been called for half-past three on that afternoon, at the home of Gilbert and Minnie P. Bowles.

According to a recent decision of the Monthly Meeting, the regular First-day evening meeting, while the new meeting-house is building, is to be held once a month in the Girls' School; and on the other First-days more informal gatherings in the homes of various Friends will take its place. The afternoon meeting at the Bowleses' home was the first of these home gatherings. A goodly company were present, of whom a large number were young people, and all of the folding chairs were brought out for service, as they often are on similar occasions. In the period of worship the presence and guidance of the Holy Spirit was recognized by all. In the message of William C. Allen, he said that there can be no substitute for the inner work of Christ. Perhaps in vital emphasis upon this essential work of the Holy Spirit, Friends can make their most important contribution to the unity and fellowship of all who bear the name of Christ. At the close of the meeting a circle of young men gathered around William Allen in one room, and a group of women around Elizabeth Allen in the adjoining room. It was felt by all to be a helpful season not only of worship and instruction, but of Christian fellowship for the members of the Hijirizaka Friends' Meeting.

On the next afternoon William C. Allen was welcomed at a special meeting of the Japanese Christian workers of Tokio with a few missionaries, at the City Y. M. C. A. Although the meeting was called by the Tokio Christian Workers' Association, the officers of the Japan Council of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, and officers of the Japan Church Federation shared in welcoming William C. Allen, who brought a message from the California State Church Federation to the Christian people of Japan. William C. Allen spoke of some of his experiences in international peace service in foreign lands, emphasizing the reaction against war on the part of many people growing out of their disappointment at the achievements of the Great War. He also gave an encouraging account of the influence of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America in connection with the Washington Conference and in further work for international peace and justice. Pastor Watanabe, on behalf of the National Church Federation of Japan, spoke words of response and asked William Allen to carry to other countries an assurance that there is developing in Japan a generation of younger men who long ardently for peace and international co-operation. The military element is still to be reckoned with, and some statesmen do not yield readily to this newer life which is already vitally influencing literature and current thought and is sure to shape the national policies for the future. A part of the session was given to informal discussion of conditions on the Pacific Coast. The meeting closed with a period of earnest prayer, the Chairman, a Congregational pastor, voicing the desire of all for Divine guidance for our Friend as he goes on his long voyage for peace.

At the daily worship hour at the Friends' Girls' School on the afternoon of the second, William C. Allen drew some lessons from having seen the girls at their athletic drills and marches, emphasizing the fact that as in marching so in life, direction determines destiny, and choices made at the parting of ways determine whether life is to reach the goal set as possible by a loving Heavenly Father for all His children.

Later on in the afternoon of the same day, the Friends' Foreign Fellowship welcomed William C. and Elizabeth C. B. Allen. In the opening period of worship a number took vocal part, and all felt, as was expressed in one prayer, stronger for the quiet hour spent together. William C. Allen's message was one of sympathy and encouragement. Elizabeth C. B. Allen gave a most interesting account of their visits to the scattered meetings and individual families of Friends in South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. Although Friends in Australasia are far away from Japan, we still feel that we have much in common with them, as was evidenced by the recent decision of the Japan Yearly Meeting to send a letter to their General Meeting.

On the evening of the 2nd, William C. Allen was present by special invitation at a dinner of the Committee on American-Japanese Relations. Among those present were Viscount Shibusawa, Chairman; Viscount Kaneko, Member of the Privy Council, President of the Japan-America Society; Baron Sakatani, Ex-Minister of Finance and Ex-Mayor of Tokio; Admiral Baron Uriu; Dr. J. Soyeda, Ex-President of the Imperial Government Railway Board; Professor Hattori of Waseda University, who is also General Secretary of the Tokio Chamber of Commerce. Viscount Shibusawa spoke appreciatively of the achievements of the Washington Conference, but recognized regretfully that the Conference had not been able to deal with the problem of the Japanese in California and in the Hawaiian Islands. Both Viscount Shibusawa and Baron Sakatani expressed feelingly their belief that the coming of William C. Allen on an errand of peace was evidence that God was remembering the efforts of this Japanese Committee which is still troubled because no fundamental solution has yet been found for the problems of the Japanese immigrants who have been permitted to enter America. William C. Allen spoke of his connection with Friends in Philadelphia and with what William Penn and the early Friends had stood for in the application of Christian love to the problems of the state. He explained some of the difficulties which Christians in America and especially in California have in working out in practical policies what they know to be right. He also brought a word of encouragement from the present spirit and activities of Christians in America and the possibilities of their achieving larger things through their organization of local and national sentiment, in favor of peace and justice.

To-day we have just bade farewell to William C. and Elizabeth Allen as they start again from Yokohama on the Shinyo Maru on their long voyage. We shall often pray for them and be grateful that they gladly respond to the call of Christ for this difficult mission of being messengers between the various groups of Friends scattered throughout the world, and of carrying the message of peace on earth and good-will to men to Christians of all fellowships. To many men in responsible positions they bring a new sense of the possibility of linking the power of God to the difficult tasks of life.

THE RELIGIOUS LIFE OF WESTTOWN SCHOOL.

The following is an extract from the report of George L. Jones, Principal of Westtown School, to the Committee at its meeting Fifth Month 16th. It is printed in THE FRIEND at the suggestion of a well-concerned member of the Committee.

J. HENRY BARTLETT,
Chairman.

"Whether the religious life of the school is such as actually to grip the lives of our boys and girls, I frequently find myself debating. From a superficial observation and judgment, it would seem that the school does have a positive religious atmosphere. Our meetings for worship are usually satisfactory, and during our periods of silence before meals, and at Bible reading, there appears to be in general a reverential spirit. I have, however, wondered to what extent the pupils bring their Christian belief to bear on their daily life and conduct. They feel, of course, a restraining influence against certain things because of family traditions, social customs, school regulations and policies. Do they feel the same restraint because they are Christians? I presume the situation is no different this year than any year, nor is this particular group of boys and girls as compared with similar groups elsewhere. I am anxious, however, that our religious life should be so positive and compelling as to assist them through the care-free period of youth into lives of thoughtfulness and Christian unselfishness.

"We are modifying somewhat the plan of our First-day evening collections. For some time we have been wondering whether the religious life of our boys and girls was not, too large an extent, that coming to them from without, with too little opportunity for initiative and expression on their own part, and for the development of the sense of personal responsibility.

"Also, we have wondered whether, on the girls' side especially, First-day was not really too full of religious activities, helpful though they all are,—Scripture classes in the morning, the meeting for worship, the Northfield groups in the evening and the First-day evening collection. We are, therefore, combining somewhat the evening collection and the Northfield groups (and similar groups on the boys' side), certain of the meetings being formal collections addressed by someone invited from outside, and others being meetings arranged by the boys and girls themselves, thus giving them the responsibility for the religious value of the gatherings. Such an arrangement must, of course, be carefully handled; we cannot afford to lose the strength and help which come from the messages of the formal collections; the student meetings must not be allowed to drift aimlessly and without purpose; but if a group can be found each year with a genuine religious concern, we believe that there will be much good in the change."

MARY GRIFFIN, of Nine Partners, New York, became an approved minister in her twentieth year. When about twenty-five years of age she paid a satisfactory visit to some of the meetings in Nine Partners and Stanford Quarters, and in her one hundredth year she visited the families of Nine Partners Meeting and had several public meetings, in which she was greatly favored. Her natural faculties were reduced to a state of second childhood, while the spiritual grew brighter and brighter. At one of the meetings, a Baptist preacher was present, who afterwards called at her lodgings to converse with her on the subject of inspiration, in which he did not believe. Being shown into the room, he found her sitting upon the floor, amused with playthings. He immediately withdrew, saying all his inquiries were answered, as she was herself a memorable proof of Divine inspiration.

"SOME FRUITS OF SOLITUDE."

To give another a worth-while book is a compliment to the giver and to the recipient alike. It argues in each an appreciation of the finer things of life. This is especially true if the particular copy has certain associations which make it unique.

Robert Louis Stevenson, while in San Francisco in 1879, was very ill, sick at heart and discouraged. He had with him constantly, William Penn's "Some Fruits of Solitude." He found in its pages inspiration, solace and comfort during this time of trouble and uncertainty.

Some while later he gave this particular copy to a friend of his, and in the letter of transmittal wrote, "If ever in all my 'human conduct' I have done a better thing to any fellow creature than handing to you this sweet, dignified and wholesome book, I know I shall hear of it at the last day." In a later letter to the same friend, he writes, "I hope . . . you will know what an invaluable present I have made you. . . . There is no man living—no, nor recently dead—that could put, with so loving a spirit, so much honest, kind wisdom into words." Quite a tribute that from so distinguished an author, such a master stylist, a man so widely read.

It has perhaps never been questioned but that William Penn wrote the "Fruits of Solitude," yet there seems to be no external evidence that he was the author. Even in the seventh edition, published in 1718, no author is mentioned on the title page. The style and content of the book, however, are so like a maxim discovered in 1875 on a half sheet of plain paper and signed "Wm. Penn," that it seems as if this was also to have been included in the collection, but was overlooked. The maxim reads as follows:—

"He is a wise and good man, too, that knows his original end; and answers it by a life that is adequate and corresponds therewith. There is no creature so fallen below this as man; and that will augment his trouble in the day of account,—for he is an accountable creature. I pray God his Maker, to awaken him to a just consideration thereof, that he may find forgiveness of God, his Maker and Judge."
—WM. PENN."

It is perhaps gratuitous to select from the Maxims those that are the more striking, when so many are informed with truth, and wisdom. One of them, much quoted, is well worth setting down. "If thou thinkest twice before thou speakest once, thou wilt speak twice the better for it."

William Penn sums up Friends' ideas as to the Ministry when he writes that "A Minister of the Gospel ought to be one of Christ's making, if he would pass for one of Christ's ministers. Of old time they were made ministers by the Holy Ghost; and the more that is an ingredient now, the fitter they are for that work. As the ministers of Christ are made by Him and are like Him, so they beget people into the same likeness."

His ideas on marriage are much to the point. "Never marry but for love, but see that thou lovest what is lovely." And again, "But in marriage do thou be wise; prefer the person before money, virtue before beauty, the mind before the body; then hast thou a wife, a friend, a companion, a second self; one that bears an equal share with thee in all thy toils and troubles."

There is much wisdom and fairness in his advice to "Believe nothing against another but upon good authority, nor report what may hurt another unless it be a greater hurt to another to conceal it."

In the Introduction to the Reader, in the edition of 1718, we find the volume recommended in the following terms. "First, that the purchase is small, and the time but little, that is requisite to read it. Next, though some men should not find it relished high enough for their finer wits, or warmer palates, it will not perhaps be useless to those of lower flights, and who are less engaged in public heats!" This is indeed true, for the "Fruits of Solitude" is a book which will be "in all times and places, a peaceful and sweet companion."

CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

MY SOLITUDE.

An altar I would build to solitude,
The wide-spread silence and sublime repose
The restless eager heart so seldom knows;
Measureless stillness, restful quietude,
The perfect mystery and subtle thrill
Of life alone, all nature hushed and still.

I shall not build it on the desert shore
Where, with vain thunders, the wild sea raves
In awful turmoil, piling heaving waves,
That break and foam with loud resounding roar,
In those deep chords, whose echoes never cease,
My listening ear can catch no note of peace.

Nor in half-lighted forest, cool and deep,
Where flickering leaves weave magic webs of shade,
And plaintive melodies by winds are made
As o'er the solemn pines they softly creep.
In those elusive tones my restless mood
Finds not the peace of perfect quietude.

Far on the prairie, tranquil, hushed and calm,
Where golden light all softly radiant lies
On fields of grain stretching to meet the skies,
Touched by a deep, compelling, magic charm
There is unbroken, restful quietude,
My altar I will raise to solitude.

—G. R. S.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

In 1861, John Hodgkin came on a religious visit to Friends in America, especially in the Eastern States and Canada. He made his home with us for a short time, and I accompanied him in his journey in Canada and part of the Western States. It was truly a privilege to be thus brought into companionship with one so gifted both in intellectual and spiritual graces. We met with many interesting and goodly people in our travels and were most kindly entertained. Some of the Friends in the British dominion lived in very primitive style, the female part of the family spinning and weaving material for garments, the wool having been sheared from their own sheep. John Hodgkin was much pleased to see the process by which the juice of the maple was obtained from which their sugar was made. Our stay in Montreal and Toronto was made very agreeable through the kindness of some of the residents with whom we became acquainted. At Toronto I was especially pleased with the admirable Normal School, and with the completeness of their arrangements for promoting the efficiency of the public school instruction in Canada. We attended nearly all of the meetings belonging to the Yearly Meeting, and public meetings were held in Montreal and Toronto. Returning to the States we stopped for a day or two at Niagara Falls, which John Hodgkin was very desirous to see. The weather was fine and we both enjoyed the magnificent scene. We passed through Buffalo and Cleveland, holding meetings at each place to the comfort of the few Friends residing there. Then proceeded to Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, at which place Jeremiah Hacker joined us, and I was released and returned to Philadelphia. The year 1861 will long be remembered as the period in which the great rebellion of the Southern States broke out, involving our country in the horrors of civil war. The determination to perpetuate slavery was the inciting cause, but the dreadful struggle terminated in its destruction. The condition of the poor colored people who were liberated by the successes of the armies of the Northern and Western States soon claimed the notice of Friends and measures were taken for their relief. In 1863, my dear wife and I went down to Fortress Monroe, Yorktown and Norfolk, which places were then occupied by the United States armies. We found many of the Freedmen who had sought refuge in the Union lines. They came of course entirely destitute. Measures were promptly taken to provide for their physical needs in the first place chiefly through the instrumentality of the American Missionary Society, who also established schools for their mental and moral improvement, several of which we visited. The report of our visit made to a Committee of Friends in Philadelphia was one of the first measures towards the formation of the Friends' Freedmen Aid Association, which has since continued to be so efficient in elevating the condition of the colored people of Virginia and North Carolina.

When we returned home my dear wife actively engaged in forming the Women's Aid Committee, and through their instrumentality large quantities of clothing and useful articles were sent.

In 1865, shortly after the final collapse of the rebellion and the surrender of the Confederate armies, my dear Sarah and I went down to North Carolina to attend the Yearly Meeting. It was a deeply interesting occasion. We found our Friends there nearly all clothed in grey homespun, as all the ordinary sources of material for clothing had been for nearly five years cut off. This gave both Men's and Women's meetings a singular grey appearance outwardly, but spiritually there was great rejoicing that peace and harmony once more cover the land. It was truly a memorable time, and sincere thanks and praise arose from many grateful hearts for the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father so signally extended.

It was while we were at North Carolina Yearly Meeting in 1865 that Francis T. King invited the Friends of the different Yearly Meetings who were there to a consultation respecting establishing schools in the Quarterly Meetings of North Carolina to be sustained by contributions from Friends of other Yearly Meetings. In this I was much interested and took an active part in raising funds in Philadelphia, which were liberally furnished. On a subsequent visit to North Carolina in 1867 I had the great satisfaction of witnessing the striking advancement made by many of the younger class who had been at these schools. Their countenances beamed with intelligence, and the deportment of the young women especially was so improved that they scarcely seemed like the same beings I had met before.

A year or two afterwards my dear Sarah and I accompanied Rebecca Allinson and Samuel Bettle in a visit to Canada Yearly Meeting, which proved a very interesting occasion. I renewed my acquaintance with some valuable Friends I met in 1861 at their respective meetings. The Yearly Meeting was held at Pickering near the shore of Lake Ontario. On our return we again visited Niagara Falls, enjoying the grandeur of the scene.

Our next journey was in 1869 to Friendsville in East Tennessee in company with Rebecca Allinson and Elizabeth H. Farnum. Arriving there we were kindly entertained by Friends and attended the Quarterly Meeting held in the old meeting-house in which dear William Forster preached his last sermon, and in front of which is the quiet resting place of his mortal body, a spot which will long continue to be memorable. A plain stone with a simple record marks the grave of this eminent servant of the Lord Jesus. Years afterward it was visited by his son William Edward Forster, the eminent statesman of England, who was satisfied that the grave should remain in its simplicity, as his last labor of Gospel love there finished will be an enduring monument to his memory.

We visited a number of the Friends in their humble homes, and several of those who had been recently received into membership. Afterwards we went to Marysville and enjoyed being with the good Friends who were laboring there to spread the truth among the people. At Knoxville a large public meeting was held and the ministry of our Friends was well received. We were kindly invited by one of the citizens to visit him at his home, where we were cordially entertained. On our way home we stopped at New Market, Tenn., and attended Lost Creek Meeting. From there we had a rough ride of twelve miles over a hilly, rocky road to French Broad, to visit a small company of newly converted people, who came to meet us in one of the poor homes of the country. The weather was cold and wet, and we gathered round the kitchen fire, rude benches having been arranged. The people appeared to be sincere, but their opportunities for improvement had been small. Several seemed seriously impressed and desirous to be spiritually instructed. We returned to Lost Creek the next morning, and soon afterward proceeded to New Hope, where we were welcomed by kind friends. We attended their meeting and the First-day school in which older and younger participated. It was conducted in a very intelligent way and we were much interested. From this place we returned to Philadelphia.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THURSDAY"—By T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH.

During the summer and fall a few years ago I camped alone in the Maine woods not far from the Canadian border. My object was, not to seek solitude for its own sake, but to make observations on the habits of the smaller animals of the northern wilderness. My headquarters tent was pitched on a pretty little lake a few miles from K. & W. Co.'s lumber camp. When I went on extended excursions I carried a silk forester's tent and lived chiefly on raisins. I got my other supplies from the lumber camp, which I visited about every three weeks.

The fall months glided by, but I was in no hurry to leave the woods, for, to me, a balsam bed is better than a brass one and venison is more toothsome than roast beef. I was often lonely; it is true; but the presence of other persons would have defeated the object of my stay in the forest, and after I discovered that there was a beaver colony near my camp my need of company grew less and less.

I passed hour after hour near the beaver dam. There I lay unsuspected, watching the half-grown youngsters play and the old ones cutting the food supply for the winter. Sometimes a scout would swim about the pond, sniffing for danger.

It was an open fall, so I resolved to stay in the woods until winter drove me out. There had been night frosts for several weeks and occasional light snows, which soon disappeared, but real winter loitered in the background.

It was after the snowfalls that I experienced the keenest of all my pleasures—tracking. No city newspaper ever contained half so many personal announcements as I read in the news sheet spread about my door. There I learned of visits by night from many varieties of neighbors.

On one of those snow journals I was pleased and a little startled to learn that I had been inspected during the night apparently by a wolf; but reason argued that that was impossible. North of the St. Lawrence I knew that wolves could still be found; but I was more than sixty miles south of the river. Of course where wolf guess will not fit, dog guess must do. The tracks were too large for a fox, but right for a dog about the size of a collie. Moreover, no thoroughly wild animal would have drunk from my water pail or lain by my fire, as I found, on closer inspection, my visitor had done. I did not see what a dog was doing here, fully twenty miles from anywhere. The morning sun had melted the thin snow covering and prevented me from tracking the animal. I felt fairly sure, however, that if it were a dog, it would return that evening.

I was very lonely that day, for thinking of the dog reminded me of Irish, my little terrier at home. Before going to bed I put out a venison bone that I had been saving for soup, so that he should feel welcome and perhaps visit me often.

About midnight I awoke and knew instinctively that something was near me. Without moving I distinguished a dark shadow near the smouldering logs. A flicker of light showed that it was unmistakably a dog, busy on the deer's leg.

"Quiet, now; quiet, boy!" I whispered softly.

He jumped up but did not run. Presently he started gnawing again, and, not wishing to annoy him by getting up, I drowsed off once more. When about three o'clock I got up to replenish my fire he was gone.

That little comedy went on for three nights, and I was beginning to fear that I should never make his acquaintance; but one afternoon when I returned to camp earlier than usual I found him curled on my blankets asleep. Like the other wood folk he had decided that I was harmless and that he might as well enjoy himself. He did not wag his tail or bark or show any emotion when I arrived and merely stepped to one side when I tossed him some venison. He cautiously accepted the gift and with it in his mouth trotted off into the woods to cache it until he should want it. We had accepted each other.

I was as much puzzled to unravel his lineage as to account for his presence. He was smaller than a collie but larger than a terrier. I think he must have had setter blood in him, and yet his hair was wiry rather than silky. Brown, shading into a bedraggled tawny shade, describes his color. He was strongly built, with delicate, overhanging ears and a tail that had obviously been bitten off, perhaps in some woodland struggle. His coat was very rough from the thickets. When I could get a look into his eyes, which was seldom, their marvelous liquid brown spoke untranslatably. The elusive spirit of the woods swam in their depths. They hinted aloofness and the unchanging wild.

As the bright, belated summer days went by the dog and I passed through the distinct stages of acquaintance, friendship and intimacy. I called him Thursday because he had come to me on that day just as Crusoe's man had come to him on Friday. It was not a good name, and I often wished that I had given him one that was descriptive of his various powers; but, once given, it stuck.

Soon he began to put on personality. Like other people who live too much to themselves, he was a little selfish; he liked the hollow of my bed and not the cold edge. But he was a great comfort to me, and better than all was his absolute fitness to accompany me on my observation rounds. He had so long been dependent on the woods for his living that his habits of motionless watchfulness or noiseless advance were as highly developed as those of the wild creatures in their still haunts. Irish, my own dog, had never been able to check his desire to chase red squirrels, and so I always had to leave him at home when I took a camping trip.

Thursday's particular pleasure was to hunt with me. One deer lasted me a great while, but I had other hunts that both of us enjoyed a great deal. At other times he would lie quietly beside me when I sat for hours watching my beavers. Within a week it seemed to me that we had known each other for years. He never barked, he never attacked porcupines—an essential reticence in a Maine dog.

Curiously enough, although he soon learned his name and also came to me whenever I called him, my simplest commands seemed beyond his comprehension. He was not indifferent; a dozen incidents revealed a clever brain. But the easiest request that Irish would have guessed and obeyed in a moment puzzled Thursday. He plainly wished to obey, and his inability to understand me worried him.

ADVENTURING FOR THE PEACE OF CHINA.

JOSEPH E. PLATT

[It is not often that we have experiences like the following first hand. We are glad to give them place.—Eds.]

CHAPTER I.

Sixth Month 7, 1922.—The struggle on. China rent in factions. Business and trade and other interests marking time. Uneasiness and fear in the minds of those who think. What is it all about? What will happen if all these soldiers get out of hand? Life and property one night of disorder and a trail of wreck. Two big armies were lining up for a hard struggle drawing nearer and nearer until only about five miles apart. There was a tense and trying situation throughout the province, and yet no real issue in the fight. There were some leaders on both sides realizing the terrible cost of continued fighting and looking for a way out. Someone from the outside seemed needed to step in and try to help. Such was the situation that called us.

Here the friendships brought about by the work of these years presented the opportunity and the responsibility. After midnight two nights ago we were aroused by pounding at the gate. Chinese friends had come to see whether I would help. After a conference it was decided also to ask Dr. Young. He was accordingly called out of bed at 1.30 for a hurried consultation. Whatever was done must be done quickly before more lives were lost. Plans were laid for the coming day. Chang Tso Lin's son, a man with whom a real friendship has been formed, is the strongest general of the Manchurian forces, and to him we presented our appeal as soon as possible the following morning. A special train was waiting to take him to the front two hundred miles away. We would go along and bring before him and his associates the matter of a truce in which arbitration might begin. He was willing and the train waited two hours while we tied up a few loose ends before leaving. On the way down a good opportunity was presented to lay before him fully our view of the situation.

At midnight that night we arrived at the little town at the front, dark and silent. All lights were out for fear of further air-raids. In the hushed streets, carts—some empty, some loaded with ammunition—were plodding along. We were invited to come at 1.30 that night to a conference of the generals. A good opportunity was given to present our object and we were encouraged to proceed across the lines the following morning to lay the matter before the leaders of the other side.

The difficulty was to get across, as the tracks were reported broken. It was only after some considerable difficulty that we succeeded in getting assembled an engine, car and operators. After passing two stations from which the staff had temporarily retired we came upon the advancing army. As our engine was decked out with Chinese, British and railway flags we had no trouble in getting through. An officer came out to meet us and wanted to know who in the world we were and what we wanted and whether we spoke Chinese. After a satisfactory examination he took us back to see the chief officer of the expedition. He was at dinner, and while we waited for that important function to finish we were interviewed by about three sets of officers who seemed to be pumping us and then reporting to his honor. Finally we saw him and had a very good opportunity to present our mission, meeting with encouraging response. It was remarkable how two ordinary citizens could have such opportunities, but they were made possible by the fact that we were foreigners here in Christian work and had friends among the leaders. The Chief officer interrupted me in one of my remarks, saying:

"You know Mr. Clack, the Y. M. C. A. Secretary in our city? He is a friend of mine." (This was the very man we had been writing to, asking his co-operation in the other army!)

Another said:

"I am also a Christian and can appreciate your motives in coming."

Unfortunately his reason for being there was that he was the best gunner they could secure to operate some of their big guns.

They promised to comply with certain requests that we carried from the other side and in turn we carried back their stipulations. This message we had to carry to Chang Tse Lin and his son; therefore we are now speeding to Moukden on a special with right-of-way, hoping and praying that our mission may result in the saving of some life, but more that it may help to point out a "better way" to meet these national difficulties and may be a little step toward the Kingdom of God in China. We realize with a great thankfulness how slow months and years of friendship-building open sudden doors now and then of tremendous opportunity. We are driven to our knees with a sense of our need, only asking that more and more we may be instruments for God's use and directed in line with His will.

CHAPTER 2.

Sixth Month 15, 1922.—A series of things have happened since that night on the train returning from our first trip to the front. We arrived in Moukden early in the morning, made our report, and were urged to return at once with young General Chang. His aim was to continue to work for peace and he asked for our further support. It is a very delicate situation with two hot-blooded armies in some places hardly more than a mile apart; some officers bent on attacking, and opinion divided at headquarters. Back we came after a hurried run home to see the brave little wife and get a bite of breakfast.

On arrival at Shan Hai Kuan, the little town at the front, we found that there had been some desultory fighting during the day. Most of the night we spent in trying to get into communication with the other army to arrange a meeting between the two sides. This was achieved about 5 A. M. An engine and a car were to be allowed across between eight and ten. With some delay in making arrangements we started out with some Manchurian officers. We had by this time only one hour's grace and the assurance that we should find the tracks torn up. A hand-car followed us for this emergency. The other side had evidently given us up as a ruse and had started firing a little. Our officers were naturally doubtful about the wisdom of proceeding. It was therefore decided that only the Doctor and I should go over and that the officers should wait at the front lines. As rumored, the track was torn up, so the hand-car was put into action. Five faithful coolies pumped it and away we sailed with a Chinese flag sailing aloft! There was no trouble in getting through the lines and there was no small reception of curious people awaiting the arrival of the quaint peace commission. Soon we were chatting over a cup of tea with the Chief-of-Staff of the General. Of course he had many complaints of breach of faith. Finally it was decided that we should return and escort the Manchurian Chief-of-Staff back to meet him. When these two men were drinking tea some hours later in the same little back room of a Chinese store in Chin Wang Tao we felt that the gap had been bridged and that it was time for us to step out of the game.

Accordingly we returned to Moukden that night. But here as elsewhere "there is many a slip," and because of misunderstandings and mutual suspicions the negotiations the next morning broke down and two days of very hard fighting ensued. What could be done now? It looked as though it was all off. Behind the scenes, however, things were working, and the Peace Ball was getting up speed. Having become convinced that the people and the best of the leaders were sincerely desirous of a peaceful settlement we felt constrained to persist. We spent the day of the twelfth agitating at the home base in Moukden and had conferences with Chang Tso Lin, the Civil Governor, and leaders of the Provincial Assembly. That evening telegrams were sent officially to the headquarters of the opposing army suggesting methods for an immediate armistice and to the new President of China requesting his mediation in the more fundamental adjustments involved. We consented to return with General Chang and that night at midnight we set forth on our third trip to the front.

ANÆMIC CHRISTIANS.

A great preacher has been protesting that there are too many anemic Christians. His reference, of course, is not to things physical, but rather to the spiritual life. He insists that just as there are people physically anemic and therefore sickly, depressed and lethargic, so in the church there are vast numbers whose spiritual life is at so low an ebb that they are neither happy nor useful.

"I can give you a recipe for misery," said Henry Drummond, "it is this: be a half-hearted Christian." No doubt he was right. The people who really enjoy religion are those who commit themselves wholly to it. Anemic Christians are not happy because, while they have not enough religion to enjoy it, yet they have too much conviction to enjoy the pleasures of sin. W. L. Watkinson says that it is generally from such people that most complaints are heard. They bewail the poverty of the pulpit. They complain that the church is cold and unfriendly. They harp about the good old times they once enjoyed. They live in what someone has called the "northeast side of religion," and to them everything seems wrong.

From a physical standpoint our safety lies in having a vigorous constitution. The best way to throw off disease is by the energy of health. When a sickly man gets a chill he is in constant terror lest it develop into pneumonia. A healthy person scarcely knows he has a cold; he throws it off with comparative ease. We do not agree with those people whom we have heard declare that a Christian may get beyond the reach of temptation, but we do believe that it is possible for Christians to possess so vigorous a spiritual life that the very glow of it makes temptations feeble. They fortify themselves against disease and death by the possession of a spiritual life which is full and free and joyous.—Onward (Toronto, Can.).

AN HISTORIC YEARLY MEETING-HOUSE TO FALL UNDER BLOWS OF WRECKING CREW.

One of the oldest landmarks in Richmond, Ind., the old Yearly Meeting-house, is in the process of being demolished.

The following is an interesting write-up of the old building, with a few modifications:

There are many stories regarding the old church. Quaker history says that it was planned in 1822 and the original specifications called for a structure 60 by 100 feet, with side walls 25 feet high. The committee in charge of the work was composed of Samuel Charles, Thomas Roberts and Charles Moffitt. These men served until the house was completed in 1829.

As far as can be ascertained the cost of the structure was $6,100, of which $666.38 was given by Ohio Yearly Meeting. Practically all the balance was contributed by the five Quarterly Meetings which constituted Indiana Yearly Meeting at its formation in 1821. These meetings were Miami, West Branch, Fairfield, Whitewater and Blue River. New Garden, Westfield and Center Quarterly Meetings, which were established before the completion of the buildings, also gave some money toward the cost.

The land on which the house was built was a tract of a little more than nine acres and was bought for a total cost of $856.70. Most of the work of construction was done in 1823, and it is thought that the building was used for Yearly Meeting as early as 1825, although the actual completion of the work was not until 1829.

The old meeting-house was used for the sessions of Indiana Yearly Meeting until 1878 when the East Main Street meeting-house came into use. Many noted Friends from this country and from England attended the quiet meetings within the old brick walls, and in numerous instances the visitors, moved by the Spirit to speak the Gospel after the manner of early Friends, told in their quiet way the dictates of their hearts and consciences.

Among the interesting features of the early years was the attendance of Henry Clay at the First-day morning services on Tenth Month 2, 1842. On First Month 24, 1862, the funeral services of Elijah Coffin, clerk of the men's meeting from 1827 to 1857, were held in the old meeting-house. This faithful old Friend was the first person to be buried in Earlhram cemetery.

Aside from its associations the historic structure is interesting in other ways. Since it was built before the time of sawed lumber, the huge timbers were hewed out by hand. In the interior of the building there are nine timbers, used as trusses, which were obtained from single logs. That in itself is not unusual until the size of the great trusses are considered. They are each 60 feet long and 16 inches square.

At the time of the construction these timbers were gotten a few miles north of Richmond near the New Garden settlement. They were brought to the site of the meeting-house by many ox teams, and it was necessary to cut a road through the virgin timber to make the feat possible. It required six months to complete the work of moving the gigantic beams.

With the exception of the nails in the modern shingle roof, which has been added in more recent years, there is scarcely a metal nail in the entire building. Wooden pins and pegs were used to fasten the timbers together and the joints, in most instances, are as strong now as they were when the old Quakers drove the pins into place.

But now the end is in sight. The stately structure, which has served as a warehouse in recent years, is once more to resound to the blows of hammers and sledges. But in this case the work is not constructive. So passes a stately Friend.

A BOOK REVIEW.

"THE LIFE OF CHARLES M. ALEXANDER," BY HIS WIFE, HELEN CADBURY ALEXANDER.

One of the most charming and inspiring biographies of recent years is that of Charles M. Alexander, of Tennessee, U. S. A., and Birmingham, England. Though it is a large volume, it is so wonderfully illustrated with photographs and written in such an interesting style that one is carried right through from cover to cover with increasing interest. The romance of his courtship with Helen Cadbury, a Friend, of Birmingham, England, and their happy married life is most winsomely told; and in such a way as to inspire others for a similar happy union of Christ-controlled comradeship.

Nearly every one who has ever known Charles M. Alexander all bears testimony that he was one of the most lovable and winsome personalities. He had a rare gift of natural overflowing joy and enthusiasm that was ever contagious to those about him.

Gifted with a keen appreciation of music, he felt called to the special work of making Gospel Song a power for evangelism. Charles M. Alexander came from one of the humble farmsteads of Tennessee and was educated at Maryville College. While a young man he recognized God's call to a life of Christian work and he completely yielded his whole personality, life and talents to the Master. As Fleming Revell, his intimate friend and publisher wrote of him: "The one object of his life appeared to be the winning of others to the service of his Master and I never knew anyone more uniformly possessed of this master-passion in private life as well as in public, as Charles M. Alexander."

In company with R. A. Torrey, he circled the globe twice; in 1902-3 and again in 1907, visiting Australia and New Zealand, and bringing the power of Spirit-led Gospel Song to the men and women of the Antipodes. Later on in 1909 and 1912-13 he again visited Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, China and Korea with Wilbur Chapman, and also at different times conducted "Missions" in many cities of the United States, Canada, England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland.

When the United States entered the World War, the plans for Missions in this country had to be abandoned; but a new field of service was opened to him. The Pocket Testament League which had been started in a very small way by Helen Cadbury while in High School, had become a great movement throughout the world for bringing the message of God's redeeming love into the lives of thousands and even among the soldiers in the camps of England. Now a similar work opened up in the United States and Charles Alexander and his wife visited many of the Army and Navy Cantonments of our country, taking the Testaments and the message of Gospel songs into the dreary humdrum and often the debasing atmosphere of soldier life. Though we may not approve the method of warfare, we can at least admire the spirit of the American boy who went into battle singing and carrying the portion of his mother's Bible which was given him for soul food, and comfort and guidance in his hours of trial and loneliness.

At the close of the war, Charles Alexander assisted in starting the great industrial work of the Philadelphia Business Men's Council of the Pocket Testament League, which has since spread its work to other cities.

One of the chief charms of this biography is the intimate revelation of the happy married life of Helen Cadbury and Charles M. Alexander. They were married in 1904 in the old Friends' Meeting-house in Bull Street, Birmingham. Many times they had to be separated by many miles and some times oceans, but their letters reveal that beautiful unity of purpose which was so fittingly inscribed in the wedding-ring, "Each for the other and both for God."

A letter written by Helen C. Alexander at her Birmingham home to her husband then engaged in mission work in Edinburgh, Scotland, is quoted: "This afternoon I took a walk around the dear old garden. The snowdrops are coming up in the grass and I picked a few for 'Auld Lang Syne.' As I stood there in the quiet, I thanked God for all that the ten years have brought us—precious joys and sacred sorrows, wealth of love and friendship, and above all unique opportunities of winning souls to Christ, of circulating His Word and of carrying joy and comfort and encouragement to thousands of hearts in many parts of the world through Gospel hymns and songs. Beloved, my heart is too full to utter my thanks to God for thee and for all He has given me through thee, but He knows how I thank Him upon every remembrance of thee. It was about four o'clock as I stood by the snowdrops so I prayed especially for the men's and women's meetings in Edinburgh, and knew that my prayer was being heard for a great outpouring of decision for Christ."

The following story illustrates the spontaneous enthusiasm of Charles Alexander. One night in the Brooklyn Naval Y. M. C. A., he had paused to tell the sailors the story of a mother's letter and a Pocket Testament. When finished a big sturdy-looking sailor stood up and lifting his hand to attract Alexander's attention, called out, "I know that story is true, because I am that sailor." Alexander's face beamed with surprised delight, "Good for you, old man," he said, "Come right up here by me and give your testimony." Greeting him with outstretched hand Alexander pulled him to the front of the platform and with an arm thrown over his shoulders, the sailor told his story. One day the sailors were filing by the post-office window; as he looked at the letter the lady gave him, he handed it back to her, saying, "Lady, I haven't the heart to open that letter, it's from my old mother, and I've just got a telegram in my pocket to say she is dead." The lady, a member of the Pocket Testament League, had a few testaments handy under the P. O. counter ready for just such an opportunity. She opened one to the fourteenth chapter of St. John and handing it to the sailor, she said, "I have no time to talk with you just now, while so many are coming for their mail, but you take this over to that quiet corner and read it, I think it will help you to open that letter. I will be praying and you can come back later to me and have a talk." Half an hour later he returned, "Say, lady," he said, "That chapter you gave me to read was my old mother's favorite chapter, she often used to read it to me. It did help me to open my letter and while I was reading it, I made up my mind that my mother's God should be my God, too." The sailor's testimony and his shining face were a sermon which led many others to accept Christ.

The world needs more such consecrated souls as Charles M. Alexander, and when he was suddenly "called home" Tenth Month 13, 1920, the world lost a rare spirit of magnetic and spiritual power. But "He being dead, yet speaketh." His life is still an inspiration.

W. H. RICHIE.

ELI H. HARVEY.

FAITHFUL IN THE LITTLE

was the message often delivered by our dear friend, Eli H. Harvey, who was called to his mansion, as we verily believe, at the ripe age of eighty-four years, lacking five days. His simplicity, humility, earnestness and devotion to his Master were prominent characteristics through fifty years of ministry.

In his home town, Mooresville, Ind., his quiet walk and example for good have left the savor of life with lasting impression.

Through his gentle decline of several months, love and tenderness, often accompanied with tears, were his expressions of thankfulness more than in words and the holy atmosphere of his room was a benediction. The Truth, as he believed it, was clearly portrayed at his funeral to a large company. "Faithful!" His watchword will still be heard.

STRONGER THAN GOVERNMENT.

The place was Russia, and there was a Ford at the border waiting for our conveyer; we must obtain visés from both governments before he could leave to take charge of the car.

First we visited the Russian Consul and obtained the Russian visé to go to S—— and return, and he did more than that, he wrote a request to the P—— Consul asking that he visé our papers for the trip.

We next proceeded to the P—— Consul and there the clerk told us that the office was not open for official business, but just then the Consul appeared, and he recognized C—— as a former compagnon de voyage.

He wished to know of what service he could be to the Quakers. We explained about the Ford and showed him the Russian Government's request for a visé; to our great surprise he said that he could not visé the request of the Russian Government, but that if we should make the same request on our own letter-head, he would be glad to give us the required visé, although the office was officially closed. And he added, that because he knew of the Quakers and their non-association with politics, their ideals and aims, that it would be a privilege to visé our request. Everything seemed to be settled and we hurried back to the office to type our request.

We then returned to the office of the Russian Consul, showed him our request and asked him to visé. No! We had no right to make such a request, we had usurped the authority of a government and he would not recognize it. An explanation was made that the P—— Consul had wished us to do it in this way and that he was ready to visé such a request and wouldn't he (the Russian Consul) do the same. He thought a little, asked us a few questions concerning our work and the Ford in question. Then he told us that the Russian Government appreciated our work for the famine sufferers and that he would help us all that he could. He viséd our request and then gave us a note to the local Cheka so that it would not present any obstacles to our plan.

Here was positive proof the government appreciated our work, for a representative of this Bolshevik government was helping us in our unofficial method of obtaining a visé. He was co-operating with these foreigners to his fullest extent.

Then we went to see the P—— Consul, asked him if he would not be willing to visé the Russian request, he replied, "Of course he would, he would do anything to assist the Quakers in their work."

The power of the government was of no avail in this incident, only a knowledge of the Quakers and their ideals obtained the necessary visés.

Love is the greatest force in the world today—love can lift the barriers between the states—love can make peace where only enmity and hatred dwelt before—through love men and women exist today—love is God and the world state will be HUMANITY.

"He that loveth not abideth in death." "Whoso hath this world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him? My little children, let us not love in word, neither with the tongue; but in deed and truth." (1st Ep. St. John, iii-14, xx-17-18.)

We are not Quakers because of what our grandparents accomplished, we are Quakers only through what we do today. And I ask you, what are you doing to make this world a better place because you once lived?

UNDERNOURISHED CHILDREN IN MINING REGIONS.

The work of feeding the undernourished and underdeveloped children in mining regions in West Virginia and Pennsylvania is progressing slowly but satisfactorily. About $6000 has been received especially earmarked for this purpose, and the units have been authorized to feed up to a total of 500 children a month for three months if the strike lasts that long. There are four workers in West Virginia and five in Pennsylvania. At the present time they are feeding in each section about 150 children and are opening up new stations as rapidly as possible.

No statistics are yet available which indicate the real condition among these children. The medical examinations show that over one-third of the children are in a condition that calls for supplementary food and a good proportion of this number are in very bad physical condition.

Before the work was undertaken a letter was sent to all the mine owners and operators explaining that our object was to feed the neediest of the children and to do what we could to bring a message of good-will to both sides. Responses from the mine operators have been very friendly. In fact, considerable sums of money have already been received from such sources. A few of the operators have protested, but all the opposition has been in a kindly spirit. It is encouraging that the work is being so well received.

THE SUMMER CONFERENCE AT SOROCHINSKOYE.

Beulah Hurley begins a letter: "On Sixth Month 17th our second regular monthly conference of field workers met here in Sorochinskoje." That prosaic phrase with its connotations of orderly, normal life makes one inclined to believe that the newspapers are right—that the crisis in Russia is past. However, the next sentence dispels that comfortable belief: "Papers in England and America are saying that the famine is now being met. That is true here only of children." The Conference Report substantiates Murray Kenworthy's in all respects. The sections dealing with the future of the work are of especial interest.

"Crop prospects are not so good as they sounded a month ago when the sowing was still going on. Seed that is well planted is growing wonderfully, but a great deal failed to come up. This is due to lack of strength of men and horses in properly preparing the ground, also to the fact that much seed was too old or too poor. The worms and the birds are both playing havoc with the crops in some sections. They, too, think the famine is broken. Some seed was also eaten because the recipients had nothing else to eat. Altogether, we feel that a program of feeding will be necessary until the next harvest, 1923.

"The industries of valenki making, spinning, weaving, and knitting of wool and flax are to be live issues of our winter work. Some embroidery will be carried on, also, though our first concern is for these most essential industries in providing for winter needs. We are planning first of all to look after these things for hospitals and children's homes before providing for the general population. Valenki (felt boots) are, of course, the universal footwear, and to meet this demand we hope to secure wool. We expect to secure some locally by feeding workmen to cut hay from the common outside the town, this hay to be exchanged through the Co-operative for the short wool needed. Long wool from America and other foreign countries would be invaluable, but might arrive too late for the winter need.

"We expect to begin the plowing for fall planting next week (Sixth Month 26th) on a tract of land ten or fifteen miles from Sorochinskoje. By plowing all of the available land in this district we could provide food enough for the districts without horses, but for the sake of having these districts seed, care for, and harvest their own products it will be far better if we can plow in their own districts. The united voice of the Conference is raised in strong appeal for all possible money to put into tractors and horses. Under our plan both animals and machines should be contracted for by the villages buying tractors or the individual peasants buying horses—payment to be completed out of crops raised within the next year or possibly covering a longer period up to five years if suitable arrangements can be made.

"The schools are absolutely without equipment—books, pencils, paper, everything being needed. We do not feel, however, that our business here has reached a stage where we can deflect any money available for food and clothing and health campaign into educational channels, much as these needs appeal to us personally. We are, therefore, making no recommendation on this score, though several members of our Unit are writing to people who may be specially roused to help along these lines."

THE WITHDRAWAL OF THE FRIENDS FROM SERBIA.

It is with regret that we report the withdrawal of the Friends from Serbia after three years of service. In Fourth Month, 1922, Dr. Charles L. Outland turned the picturesque hospital at Petch over to the Serbian authorities. It was felt that the need for emergency relief was over and that the responsibility for future work should be carried by the Serbian government. The service rendered has tended to bring Montenegrians, Serbians, Albanians and Turks closer together, and though we have not done much towards solving the Balkan problem we have been able in one city to bring all factions together in a bit of humanitarian work. Dr. Outland concludes a full and interesting report as follows:—

"Serbia is getting on its feet as evidenced by changes noted in just one year. For example: the railroad system is greatly improved. It requires about five hours now to cover the same distance that one year ago required all day. Now there are comfortable first and second class coaches as compared with the third and fourth class ones in use a year ago. Serbia being an agricultural country must progress and advance steadily to the front. The money is down, but at the present better than it was last year when it reached the low level of one hundred dinars to the dollar; in normal times we reckon five dinars to the dollar.

"Serbia is a most interesting country, with many excellent laws which only need carrying out. To watch the future development of Jugo-Slavia will be indeed interesting. One wonders whether the union will exist. Though of the same race in most instances they are quite different in many respects, and one can appreciate how the progressive parts of Jugo-Slavia may resent being ruled by a less progressive country, such as Serbia has been in the past. Their King, however, is respected by all and we can only hope that by the aid of Parliament he may be able to bring peace and prosperity out of war and chaos. Given ten years without war we would see a much different country from the present."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ELIHU GRANT in a message to the Delegates to the Five Years' Meeting Conference next month, says:—

"Away back there when we were younger Christians someone taught us humility, self-denial, preferring one another above ourselves, the Way of the Cross, the mind of Christ. And we have essayed to teach others such things. Do we believe in them really, profoundly? Are we living by faith or bunk? Have we a mightier persuasion than the disciples of force? And may our Society, as well as certain individuals, have religion? If so then let us consecrate ourselves as a religious family to the one supreme necessity of the world, the Way of Jesus Christ. We make a small denomination but we are a big family. There are other groups that can do all the other things better than we can do them. If there is any place on the footstool for us it is that of spiritual physicians who shall heal by persuasion because we embody that which we profess and hope. May goodness last until there is nothing else."

THE American Friends' Service Committee will for two months supply four hundred children of striking miners along Cabin Creek, Kanawka County, West Virginia, with the regular A. R. A. "supplementary ration of cocoa, milk, sugar, beans and rice." The expenses of distribution will be paid with its own funds. Friends believe, says the Survey, that in such cases there may often be special opportunities for the demonstration of their ideal that "Christian service can transform class hatred, race prejudice, commercial antagonism and nationalistic ambition into brotherhood and good-will."

"THE general situation in China is more hopeful than at any time during the past five years," Dr. Hodgkin asserted, "and under Li Yuen Hung, the new President, there is real hope of uniting all parties."

PART I of the new London Book of Discipline continues to be greatly in demand. No sooner is one consignment of books received than they are all gone and another has to be ordered. Every Friend everywhere, as we have said before, should read it and he will want to own it. It has found a very acceptable entrance into other than Friends' homes.

The new Part I of the Book of Discipline—"Christian Life, Faith and Thought"—is evoking a good deal of interest in circles other than Quaker ones. A well-known minister, not a Friend, emphasized the importance of its appearance in "confirmation of the truth of the view of religion without a formulated creed." He described the book's contents and quoted passages, remarking that "it is a confession of faith in freedom and in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

The following is taken from The Church Peace Union and refers to the letter originally drafted by Wm. I. Hull and adopted by the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings.

Christian churches of all denominations and all countries will be asked to join the Quakers in a definite organization for peace which will demand the complete rejection of war and all preparations for war for any purpose and against any people. The movement has been started by the religious Society of Friends embracing Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland through the world-wide circulation of an appeal adopted at their recent Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia. This appeal has been commended to the attention of the churches by the Church Peace Union of New York and is now being mailed from the headquarters of that organization to 20,000 clergymen in all parts of the United States. It has already been endorsed by the Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends in London, and the originators expect the co-operation of all other local societies of Quakers. Its general circulation among Christian churches marks an epoch in the history of the Quaker sect, because never before have the Friends made an organized public effort to gain the adherence of other denominations to the recognized fundamental principle of their creed. The Friends' appeal to the churches of Christendom says, in part: "Christianity seems to us to face a grave crisis and a Divine duty. In this aftermath of history's most terrible war, we see two paths before us. One leads inevitably to another war by renewed preparedness of the most efficient military, economic, educational and religious means of waging it. The other begins with a complete rejection of war, and of all preparations for it, for any purpose and against any people; it demands definite organization for peace."

THE two Yearly Meetings in Canada occurred the same week this year, alluding to this fact a correspondent writes:—

Telegrams of greeting were exchanged with California Yearly Meeting and the Yearly Meeting at Norwich, Ontario, both of which were in session at the same time. The message further states:—"The London General Epistle was read and a comprehensive summary of those from the other Yearly Meetings. For the first time an epistle was received from a Yearly Meeting of Friends in Germany. Replies were sent to all these and a letter sent also to Japan Yearly Meeting, whose epistle failed to reach us this year. Interesting letters were read from our Missionaries Gurney and Elizabeth Binford, mailed from Honolulu, on their way to Japan for another term of service, after a year and a half furlough."

THE Annual Meeting of Danish Friends was held on the 10th ult. in Copenhagen, followed by a Conference the next day. We hope in the near future to give in some detail an account of the two occasions.

The chief topic at the Conference was "Fundamentals of Quakerism," followed later by "Friends' Principles and Present-day Problems," and in the evening there were short addresses on "The International Work of Friends."

The program was devoted exclusively to Friendly interests, but the discussion was in no sense narrow. Among visitors in attendance there were three English Friends, Winifred Camp representing Young Friends. One or more from Philadelphia were expected, but our informant did not allude to their attendance. There was at least one German Friend present as a representative from the group in Berlin.

CARL HEATH, writing from Devonshire House, London, informs us that during the summer English and American Friends will be visiting at the following places in Europe: Vienna, Salzburg, Innsbruck, Geneva, Paris, Châlons, Bilthoven, Lunteren, Copenhagen, Hamburg, Berlin, Dresden, Leipzig, Munich, Stuttgart, Frankfurt, Darmstadt, Cologne and other places. He offers the following suggestive hints:—

All these Friends, by carrying with them on their travels something much more than the tourist spirit, are rendering a very real service to the cause of international good-will. We want those Friends who are willing to let their visits in other countries become part of a chain of service and inter-visitation. We want Quaker centres in the different countries, and the wide circle of friends of all nations connected with these, to know of the visits of British and Irish and American Friends and to come into touch.

NEW ENGLAND YEARLY MEETING at its recent session appointed the following as delegates to the forthcoming session of the Five Years' Meeting: Rufus M. Jones, Wilbur K. Thomas, Walter S. Meader, Tom A. Sykes, Clara W. Mumford, Mary S. Paige, Harvey Jones, Lindley M. Binford, Moses Bailey; as alternates: Seth K. Gifford, O. Herschel Folger, Charles W. Mesner, Arthur Jones, Willis H. White.

FAITH is tested and proved trustworthy by action. Such a change from unbelief to faith—and to trust in hope and fear, is Divine. And, in truth, faith is discovered by us, to be the first movement toward salvation; after which fear, and hope, and repentance, advancing in company with temperance and patience lead us to love and knowledge. Rightly therefore, the Apostle Barnabas says, "From the portion I have received I have done my diligence to send by little and little to you; that along with your faith you may also have perfect knowledge." Fear and patience are then helpers of your faith; and our allies are long-suffering and temperance.

The forementioned virtues being then the elements of knowledge, the result is that faith is more elementary, being as necessary to the complete Christian as respiration to him that lives in this world is to life. And as without the four elements it is not possible to live, so neither can knowledge be attained without faith. Faith is then the support of truth.—CLEMMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

MUSIC IN MEETING.

The past two weeks two incidents have come into my experience which by contrast have made me thoughtful in regard to what some, who may read the following, have always held as fundamental to their religious life.

A Friends' weekly, among news items, speaks of the good music which had drawn a larger attendance of members and visitors than had been the former custom, this better music having been secured by the introduction of trained voices in place of the more or less haphazard congregational singing.

The other incident is associated with a First-day morning Friends' meeting in a town where a large summer school of music teachers was in session. Six or more of the teachers, it may be partly out of curiosity, were present. The meeting proved to be, as we are given to express it, "a favored occasion," though in no degree to be marked off as different from those held there both before and since. One Friend spoke at considerable length, three others briefly, and just before the close a vocal prayer was offered, all seeming to reach the spirit of life in the congregation.

The teachers carried but a few minutes after the close, but it was long enough for the oldest of the group and possibly the leader, to express herself on this wise: "I never until today attended a Friends' meeting, never before took part in congregational worship that was without human leadership and never attended where music was not a conspicuous part of the service. I am devoted to my profession and believe in music as a science and a fine art, but I have seen and felt this morning, what I have read of and have not credited, that it is not essential for the nearest approach to spiritual worship. You have been trained to a custom, which with many of you has been an inheritance as well. The congregations the world over would be sadly wrecked were music to cease to-morrow to be a factor in the services."

Some one will think at this juncture that a golden opportunity was lost by not following up these remarks on the Friends' attitude toward worship. It was not followed up, but it has led to serious reflection and to some little search as to the foundation for our differences in this particular from other methods of worship.

There is a passage in George Fox often quoted—"I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit and Grace, by which all might know their salvation. . . . and I was to bring them off from the world's teachers, made by man. . . . [After naming several specific instances of wrong living and unholy practices he further says:] I was to bring them off from all the world's fellowships, and prayings and singings, which stood in forms without power. . . . Also, I was moved to cry against all sorts of music, and against the mountebanks playing tricks on their stages, etc."

It would be well for one willing to pursue the subject further to read the whole passage from the Journal, it will place the topic before us in a just relationship with others which George Fox had under review.

If the early Friends stood for one thing more than another in their practice of life [I do not have in mind their doctrine or belief] it was their absolute sincerity. Insincerity they scorned. It is nowhere better portrayed than in Whittier's "Quaker of the Olden Time." It animated them in their daily dealings among themselves and with others, they knew no double standard, the false weight and the unfair judgment met their abhorrence. It was on this basis more than on any other that they objected so outspokenly to singing and music.

It was hardly the singing per se that they testified against, but the open opportunity it offered, even more, it seemed to court for insincere utterances, at a time too when one should be most serious.

A review of the index to the Cambridge edition of George Fox's Journal will give all his references to singing. Among them we shall find the following. Of a meeting in Ireland he says, "The power of the Lord was so great that Friends broke out into singing. Many together in an audible voice, making melody in their hearts." No criticism or unfavorable comment follows such a declaration as this; how could there be such?

Barclay puts the position held by the seventeenth century

Friends in a nutshell in the following passage. In this, however, he is in statement not far in advance of Savonarola—himself an enlightened reformer, but none the less a Romanist. Augustine, too, centuries earlier, was of much the same mind and their declarations placed side by side with those of Barclay would read almost as coming from the same book.

Robert Barclay wrote: "As to the singing of psalms, we confess this to be a part of God's worship, and very sweet and refreshing, where it proceeds from a true sense of God's love in the heart, which bids souls to breathe forth either a sweet harmony or suitable words, whether formerly used and recorded in Scripture, such as the psalms of David, or the hymns of Zacariah, Simeon, etc. . . . But as to the formal way of singing, besides the abuses incident to formal prayer and preaching, it has this more peculiar, that often horrid lies are said in the sight of God. For all manner of people take upon them to personate experiences and conditions which are not only false to them, but also to some of more sobriety, who utter them forth."

In addition to their sincerity in word and deed these same men and women were remarkable for their firm belief in and reliance on the power of God in their most serious acts of life as also in matters of everyday occurrence. They had, what we who call ourselves by their name fail so largely to possess, a clear insight into the difference there must be between that which is of man and that which is of God, and when they carried this into their congregational worship, it gave that a character which reflected the principles just enumerated.

We have two pictures of the Friends' meetings of the seventeenth century; they are far from being identical, they are in fact not alike, but they are both true to fact.

The first is the meeting, comparatively limited in size and made up largely of those who had adopted Friends' views, these often in those days were held with reverent silence a conspicuous feature of the meeting; the other type, known at the time as "threshing meetings," were often largely attended by the curious and indifferent it may be, but also by many honest seekers. It was at these, in those early days, that many were turned from a way of sin to a way of right living and through these they became for the first time conscious of the restoring love of their Heavenly Father and of the Grace that comes through His Son, their Saviour.

Singing in these meetings was the exception and not the rule, but that it did occur at times we have already stated. It never took the form of premeditated concert singing, nor did it ever come from one who had trained himself for the service. It was artless in that it knew no art, and from its very nature it was only infrequent.

The Friends had had a like experience as that recorded by Augustine of himself who wrote: "When the tune has moved me more than the subject, I feel guilty and wish that I had not heard music."

It was a seventeenth century Friend, himself but a youth in years, but a seer in religious experience, who said: "When singing in the spirit and with the understanding ceased [referring to the primitive Christian church], then people began to introduce the form of singing David's experiences, in rhyme and meter; and thus in the apostasy, the form grew as a substitute for that which the saints had enjoyed in power; shadows were set up instead of the substance, and death instead of life."

To one who has accustomed himself to the strains of sacred music, hallowed by recollections that are the dearest possessions he can have, it is easily conceived that music may play an important part in his devotions, but it is inconceivable that music or any other outward thing can take the place of that inward communion of spirit which our Lord declared to the woman at Jacob's well was the very essence of worship.

It seems to some that the great lesson the Friends' meeting has to offer to their thoughtful fellow Christians of to-day is that which the music teacher claimed she had learned at the Friends' meeting a few weeks since and already referred to.

In an address recently delivered before an Episcopal synod the following language was used:—

"Away in the Eastern Hemisphere the peoples have learnt long ago the necessity of silence and contemplation for the building up of character. The young of India are trained in the school of meditation. That great-souled poet and philosopher, Rabindranath Tagore, has much to teach us and many passages to give us—out of the silence. But it is a hopeful sign that in our day in the West a pioneer of education has included silence in the daily programme. If you go into a Montessori school and spend a day with the babies you will find that in the midst of the abundant and wholesome activity which that system provides there is the silent period. The room is darkened and the little ones are left alone in silence. After a while, the teacher's voice calls them one by one by name into the next room and out they come with fresh faces and shining eyes manifestly strengthened and refreshed by the silence."

CHRISTIANITY IN CHINA.

WM. C. ALLEN.

The present situation of the Christian Churches of China is of peculiar interest to the people of America. We must admit that the western civilization is being grafted upon, not supplanting, the ancient civilization of China with her four hundred and fifty millions of people.

Our ship called for a few hours at Shanghai whilst the great National Christian Conference of 1922 was being held in that city. This afforded an exceptional opportunity to deliver the message of good-will from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the California State Church Federation, addressed to the Church people of other lands, with which I had been entrusted. Over 100 delegates were present from all parts of the huge and temporarily disrupted republic. I sat in the great assembly room of the Town Hall for a short time whilst the conference was in session. It was apparently made up of native and foreign workers in about equal proportions. The discussions were conducted in the English and Chinese languages. Whilst observing the vigor and earnestness of the assemblage, I was profoundly impressed with the possibilities of Christianity as led by the men and women who were there studying and planning on behalf of Christ.

There are now approximately 350,000 communicants of Christian Churches in China, after missionary effort of over one hundred years. The progress has been slow. In Japan the work largely commenced at the top and filtered downwards. In China it began at the bottom and to some extent has progressed upwards. Especially of recent years has Christianity found lodgment among the better classes. The influence of the more highly educated or more wealthy people of China upon their countrymen should tend to facilitate enquiry into the religion of Jesus. And where honest enquiry exists converts are won.

But our peoples of European descent themselves place a serious handicap upon the Christianizing of China, whilst our churches so often pray that it may be realized. Foreign residents in China often forget their home restraints. You cannot blame uninformed Chinese for having false ideas regarding American life after they have witnessed the sometimes shameful presentation of it in American moving pictures. Young student converts too often become unsettled in their faith after meeting with the occasional agnosticism discovered in some of our American colleges and universities. Some of them want the "latest thing" and are tempted to believe that they find it in agnosticism. The history of the efforts of foreign powers to exploit China, backed by gunboats and machine guns, and the savage wars that have been fought between "Christian Nations" as the legitimate outgrowth of "Christian" commercial greed are fully understood by these people. Under such conditions our stories of the Saviour's love and teachings cannot be expected to always fall on attentive ears.

I am told that there now exist over 150 periodicals in China engaged in definite anti-Christian propaganda. The Churches have a great spiritual battle on their hands. Meanwhile they are able to challenge their foes with concrete facts that cannot be thrust aside. Among Chinese Christians there are five times as many attending school in every thousand as there are among non-Christians. More than half of the Christians can read the Bible. Only about 30 per cent. of Church expenses are paid for by foreigners. The larger portion of the support of the Christian hospitals comes from the Chinese. To non-believers every missionary compound, every Christian university or college, with their beauty and orderliness, their magnificent work and spirit when contrasted with the filth and superstition all around them, must prove an object lesson on behalf of Christianity that cannot be blinked or despised by those who know not Christ.

The Canton Christian College is a case in point. A few miles outside of that seething city of 1,500,000 population is the compound of 250 acres and the noble buildings made possible by contributions received from the Chinese and from America. The student body of over 800 is largely drawn from the well-to-do or rich families of China. The Christian spirit permeates everything, although much labor is applied to furthering the material interests of the people. Thus the scientific development of the silkworm industry is a valuable department of the college work. The institution is co-educational and stands for ideals of sex-relationship that are of surpassing importance to the social life of China. Of the more advanced classes a majority voluntarily make confession of Christ before they secure their degrees. The college policy is to obtain competent young men and women on the faculty whose lives are dedicated to Christ. I passed several days in this splendid interdenominational institution, and it was a privilege to address the young people on different occasions and observe the delightful atmosphere in which they lived.

It is claimed that thus far there has not appeared a single native Christian writer who has strongly appealed to his own people. Young Christians, after being highly-educated, do not enter the service of the Gospel to the extent desired, but too often yield to the lure of high salaries offered to them by big foreign concerns. Whilst the Y. M. C. A.'s and Y. W. C. A.'s, and the church colleges and universities are being unionized, there is a feeling that the Churches themselves must more fully eliminate denominational differences for the good of all. There were two outstanding demands at the Shanghai Conference. One was that a real Chinese Church is wanted—not just foreign-controlled Churches in China. The other was for a native leadership, and it was felt that the great task of the present is to acquire it. In conversation with American missionaries and church leaders in China, this year, all I met with supported these demands, and expressed their conviction that the time is ripe for the assumption of larger responsibility by native leaders.

Will China, with her enormous potentialities for good or evil, only absorb the material instincts and knowledge of the western nations? Will she cling to her ancient religions or accept Christ as her guiding star for the centuries to come?

Shall the so-called Christian countries continue to teach her military methods and ethics and eventually themselves reap the disastrous fruits of that teaching? The only solvent of the problems that will inevitably expand with the future contact of the white and yellow races will be found in a practical obedience to the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The American Churches have a tremendous stake in China, religiously, educationally and internationally. The call is loud that we stand for justice, mercy and peace if future conflict is to be avoided. It is of supreme importance that we carefully watch the unfolding of commercial and political events in the Far East and insist that we deal righteously with the reawakening old empire. We must with service, money and prayer remember these brethren in Christ.

HONGKONG, 1922.

WILLIAM C. AND ELIZABETH ALLEN'S VISIT TO CANTON.

As most Friends in Philadelphia know, William C. Allen and his wife recently started on a trip around the world to visit scattered Friends in foreign parts. After a stop in Japan, where they saw the work conducted by our missionaries there, they proceeded to Hong Kong, and came to Canton, arriving here on Sixth-day, Fifth Month 19th.

William C. Allen felt it on his mind to visit the Canton Christian College, where he had been some seven years ago, with William W. Cadbury, and when he came here the few Friends on the campus were very glad to see him and his wife.

The college schedule includes Chapel exercises every morning, and on Seventh-day morning William C. Allen addressed the College on the subject of personal forgiveness and the necessity of forgiveness and friendliness in business. On First-day morning there is a general service, to which some five hundred Chinese and foreigners regularly come, and we then enjoyed a splendid talk on Peace from the Christian viewpoint. William C. Allen made a very positive statement that all war is incompatible with the teachings of Christ, and considering the differing views of many of our staff, it was something of an uncertainty as to how such a message might be received; but after the morning service nothing but favorable comments were to be heard, and one or two of our younger teachers seemed to be much interested in this very practical matter in connection with a consistent Christianity.

First-day evening was the time that the few of us who are here working in Canton will remember with the greatest pleasure. At the home of Walter Howard and his wife, we had a little meeting made up of six Friends and seven other members of the faculty, several of whom had never been to a Friends' Meeting before. It was indeed a pleasure to four of us, who had not had the privilege of sitting in a Friends' meeting for months, to enjoy once again our own form of worship. Several vocal expressions were given on the general idea of trying to know the Truth and to make our lives conform to it.

On Second-day morning, William C. Allen again spoke at the Chapel exercises, and on Third-day evening he spoke through an interpreter to a group of some two hundred Chinese at the City Y. M. C. A.

On Fourth-day morning we were all very sorry to have to say farewell to our guest, but he and his wife felt that their work among us here had been completed and that they must go on to other places. At the present time there are only five Friends in Canton, so far as I know, but we are looking forward with pleasure to the return of William W. Cadbury and his family and to the coming of Charles Huston Haines, all of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. There is a great opportunity for service in this large heathen city. Its need for Christianity is apparent to any visitor who spends even one day here. The few of us Friends who are located here, trying to advance the Kingdom of our Master, with His servants of other denominations would be much encouraged if there were more young Friends who felt a call to work at the Christian College, or in any branch of Mission work in Canton, and if there are any Friends expecting to visit the Orient they should plan to encourage us by a visit to Canton Christian College.

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by MORRIS LINTON, President of the Friends' Temperance Association.

MORE THAN THIRTY ORGANIZATIONS in this country are working for the repeal of the Volstead Act or its amendment to permit the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer. But there seems little probability that the American people, reinforced by the enfranchised women, will be swayed in discouragement. Rather will the determination of past years be revived with increased effect.

Nominations for the various offices are being made now at the primaries and there are few signs as yet of any retrograde sentiment. The outlook will be much cleared soon.

Indiana, Pennsylvania and Iowa have upset the prophecies of the liquor men (and they indulge freely in prophecy). The head of the Federation of Labor is not able to coerce all the Unions to approve wine and beer. Chief Warren S. Stone of the Locomotive Union takes an open stand for the present dry law and commends its results. President Harding believes that in another generation "liquor will have disappeared not merely from our politics, but from our memories." Teachers see the improvement in the school children and are about unanimous for the great law. Banks and saving deposits speak eloquently of the family and political economy. Charity workers, the Salvation Army, hospitals, asylums policemen, are all relieved of a large part of their labor and expense.

Forty-six States have ratified the amendment. Perhaps Connecticut and Rhode Island will come in line after this fall's election. The amendments cannot be rescinded. Few States have no concurrent enforcement code. Rhode Island enacted the latest. Six States have voted on the wine and beer proposition, each one rejecting it with impressive majorities—Ohio, Oregon, Arizona, Washington, Colorado and Michigan. Pennsylvania is the only State that maintains the licensed saloon. Note this from the Public Ledger shortly after the late primaries:—

"The saloon-keeper enacted prohibition. He created the Volstead law. He is now nullifying the efforts of the temperance advocates—those who favor beer and light wine. Of this situation the dry politicians have been quick to take advantage. It is perhaps a political move, but one thoroughly justified by the muddy glove the saloon-keepers have thrown down.

"Pennsylvania by reason of the Brooks high license law was able to keep up a pretense of obeying both the State and Federal law, and if the saloon-keepers had been able to learn a lesson, moderate liquor selling might have continued for years. As it is its doom is sealed. . . . The saloon-keeper defies the law as the worst of his class did before prohibition days. They dare to defy public opinion in the old fashion, relying as of old on the division leader, who soon will prove impotent and turn on them as he has in New York and even in New Jersey. Fanaticism on both sides—on the saloon side fanaticism with cold cash behind it; on the other side, fanaticism with keen politics behind it. Saloon keeping has not a year and a half to run in this city—if it has any more—in the rest of Pennsylvania. When it fails, as fail it will, if the bar men keep up their present tactics, the passing of Pennsylvania will mean the end of the saloon."

Disrespect for law is apparent, as far as we can observe, mainly among the wet element and the foreigners. Court dockets are crowded, but with other than enforcement cases to swell the list. Richard Spillam in the business section of the Public Ledger gives us the following information:—

"In the Municipal Court of Philadelphia, 12,221 actions were filed in the last twelve months. The vast majority of these were based on alleged violations of contracts or failure to live up to agreements. In the Common Pleas Court there were 3000 business suits. The Municipal Court handles claims of $1500 or less. The Common Pleas the larger ones. Litigation of this character has increased greatly in the past few years owing to the very unsettled state of business. How great has been the increase is shown in the cases before the Municipal Court. From June, 1919, to May, 1920, they totaled 6181 suits, from June, 1920, to May, 1921, there were 9312, from June, 1921, to May, 1922, the total was 12,221."

Current History Magazine has given space to the prohibition question. Wayne B. Wheeler, National Counsellor for the Anti-Saloon League, had an article in the Fifth Month issue well worth reading. In the Sixth Month number Hamilton Fish, Treasurer of the Association Opposed to the Prohibition Amendment, gives his reasons why prohibition is wrong. Even he cannot do the impossible—that is, give one beneficent result that would follow lowering the present standard. In the Seventh Month issue two strong articles are published, showing wet inaccuracies and the success of enforcement, contradicting the statement that "the law cannot be enforced." It is notable that on the front cover of this bold language is used: "Starting decrease in drunkenness and insanity attributed to Prohibition." Hearst's International had a full page advertisement in many of the dailies, to call attention to the magazine, and the Prohibition article by Dr. Woods Hutchinson was one of the two major subjects advertised. This article is most optimistic. His opening sentence reads thus: "In the past two tempestuous years the numerous false wigs and masquerading costumes of the alcohol problem have been stripped off one after the other. Alcohol isn't and never was a food. It is not essential to health or needed as a medicine. It isn't necessary as a source of revenue. Its 'taboo' does not and will not paralyze business or ruin any class of fruit growers or farmers."

Read this paper and absorb its spirit of optimism.

This section of the United States is the disloyal centre, as Senator Pepper has discovered. He outlines this area as from Newport News to Boston, and for about six States west on the northern border. But elsewhere the sentiment is openly and overwhelmingly for the dry law.

"The very same sort of excesses that proved that 'Regulation' was a failure as a regulator—that limited prohibition was inadequate and drove the people to State and National Prohibition as a logical and inevitable next step—are already operating to drive even those who were not friends of prohibition in the first place to it, as to them, the lesser of two evils. When that state of mind is reached by a large conservative section of the public, when it is understood that the amendment cannot be repealed and that the sale of liquor sufficiently intoxicating to start an alcohol habit among those not now addicted to its use, is a violation of the amendment—and when it is realized that the only alternative under the Amendment is either law enforcement to the ultimate end of law observance, or else anarchy, most of the present difficulty, largely psychological, will disappear. That is, the very things cited by the wets as proof of the failure of prohibition are the things that will not only bring but compel its ultimate success."

To the writer's mind there is little to discourage in the noisy fray. Prophecies and threats are abundant and unreal, arguments are weak, facts are filtering through to the masses. Voting seems right, the wet area is limited, and the foreigner is the main offender.

Education in our schools—thanks to the W. C. T. U.—has played the most important part to make prohibition permanent, and will continue to convert the new and future citizens by truthful logic at the impressionable age.

In such work The Friends' Temperance Association is planning increased co-operation for the coming school year. To our retiring faithful, efficient worker, Clara C. H. Stillwell, we mingle regrets and the kindest wishes.

Enforcement work is odious for Friends or any Christian with love in his heart, and is impracticable for an association with so scattered a membership. But we individually can be, and are, zealous in the work in our local vicinities.

May we be prayerful, thankful, optimistic, earnest and "let God work."

A PRAYER.

Teach me, Father, how to go
Softly as the grasses grow.
Hush my soul to meet the shock
Of the wild world as a rock.
But my spirit, propped with power,
Make as simple as a flower.
Let the dry earth fill its cup,
Like a poppy looking up.
Let life lightly wear her crown,
Like the poppy looking down
When its heart is filled with dew
And its life begins anew.

Teach me, Father, how to be Kind and patient as a tree.
Joyfully the crickets croon
Under shady oak at noon.
Beetle, on his mission bent,
Tarrys in that cooling tent.
Let me, also, cheer a spot,
Hidden field or garden grot—
Place where passing souls can rest
On the way and be their best.

—EDWIN MARKHAM.

THE USEFULNESS OF OUR QUERIES.

[While the following refers to other than the Philadelphia Queries, the views expressed are pertinent to all Friends' Queries and to the principles underlying them.—EDS.]

In the present Book of Discipline the Queries are of two kinds: those that care for specific information and those that call for self-examination. The latter are to be answered to oneself and to God; they require for their answering a spiritual inventory on the part of the membership. The former are the more modern development of the Queries. They contemplate the keeping of records on the part of the subordinate meetings and ask for statistics. These queries might be replaced by a simple direction of the Yearly Meeting to the Quarterly Meetings to keep records, gather statistics and report the desired information annually.

But there is no substitute for the other class of Queries. They are an original and unique feature of our Society. Their character and use are responsible in a large degree for the well-rounded ideals, sanity of outlook, and sobriety of character, which have characterized Friends as a whole. Their chief usefulness seems to consist in three things.

First, they continually remind us of the practical phases of our interpretation of Christianity. We live in a world that puts the emphasis elsewhere or else ignores phases of Christianity altogether. Other denominations make much of creed, ritual and sacrament. We hear them discuss apostolic succession, episcopal ordination, modes of baptism, the rights of clergy and laity, orthodoxy and fundamentalism. Then our Queries recall us to the fruits by which true followers of Jesus are to be known and ask us whether we are bringing forth fruits suited to our profession. There is much in our environment which tends to draw us away from Christian practice or to make us forget the "weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy and faith." A people trying to live "in the midst of the world but not of it" need the constant reminders which the Queries give of the essential things the world does not stress.

In the second place, among ourselves we need constant reminders of the whole circle of Christian truth and life. Our preaching is apt to dwell on theoretic phases of the faith. Religious discussions are usually about new applications of the Gospel or disputed phases of truth, which are often of secondary importance. Duties that are generally acknowledged are rarely mentioned just because they are not disputed; but may easily be overlooked by the younger generation. Some truths may be overlooked because no one has a concern for them; and others may not be mentioned because some influential member is sensitive about them.

The Queries serve for us the purpose of a periodical review of the range of the practical expression of religion, somewhat as the Episcopal "Christian Year" or the succession of special Church-days (such as Easter, Mother's and Peace Day) in other Protestant denominations.

In the third place, the Queries provide for spiritual inventory for the members and the meeting as a whole. If it is important frequently to inspect our outward affairs, it is more valuable to take account of our inward state, note our tendencies, progress, and failures, and draw upon the Divine strength and wisdom for the better ordering of our ways. This is the result, when we gather together in worship, solemnly and sincerely listen to the Queries, and answer to ourselves and God whether we are fulfilling our duties and deporting ourselves properly as members of the household of God.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

In company with Rebecca W. Allinson, my dear wife and I went to the Half Year's Meeting in Virginia, held near Black River. We went by way of Norfolk and Franklin Depot. Our friend Sallie C. Harris had invited us to her father's house and we proceeded there. It was a simple home, but the Christian kindness of the family made our visit a very agreeable one. The holding of the Half Year's Meeting is an important event in the neighborhood. For many miles around the neighbors assemble to attend the meeting for worship. Upwards of a thousand persons generally came together. Many of them arrive in small carts drawn by a small bullock, others in the same kind of a vehicle drawn by a horse, and many walk a long distance. The colored people gather in large numbers. It was a novel scene. The crowd both in and out of the house appeared attentive to the ministerial services. We enjoyed our visit to Sallie C. Harris who labors most earnestly for the true welfare of her neighbors, including those in a circle of several miles around. We came home by way of Suffolk, Petersburg, Richmond, Fredericksburg, Washington and Baltimore.

In the early part of 1872 our dear friend William Robinson, a minister from England, came in the love of the Gospel to labor among Friends in Philadelphia and its vicinity. We expected him as our guest and welcomed him to our home. I accompanied him frequently in his visits to our city meetings where his ministry was clear and powerful. It was while he was with us that the health of my beloved wife began to fail. After several weeks of indisposition, she was suddenly about the first of Fourth Month taken with severe pain in the region of the heart. Soon after her lungs became affected. Her sufferings were great and no remedies appeared to alleviate them. After about two weeks severe and almost sleepless illness she was removed from the scene of earthly affliction to a blessed and eternal inheritance. We had been favored with an unusual share of happiness in our union of nearly forty-four years. Life to me was now changed, but I endeavored to bow in resignation to the Divine Will. As I have elsewhere made a record respecting my beloved Sarah, whose memory continues to be very precious, I will pass on. Our home in Filbert Street was soon broken up and I resided for some time with my daughter Margaret, and was during that period frequently an inmate with my sister Elizabeth W.

Wistar, who in her advanced age and feeble health was desirous I should be with her.

In the fall of 1873 I went in company with Dr. James E. Rhoads to visit the Schools for Freedmen in Virginia and North Carolina. We went by way of Richmond to Danville, Greensboro, Charlotte, Lincolnton, Salisbury, Raleigh, Salem, etc. We were much interested in the decided progress in mental and moral improvement which we witnessed among the colored people, and in the aptness of their children to learn. In the spring of 1874, I accompanied my brother-in-law Thomas Wistar and Dr. James E. Rhoads in a visit to the Indian tribes of the Far West. We crossed the Mississippi at St. Louis and by way of Kansas City went to Lawrence in Kansas. There we met with a large delegation of the Osages on their way to Washington. A council was held with them, but nothing of importance occurred. Their chief desire appeared to be to have some money to expend in selfish gratification, and their visit to the Capital and other cities was not productive of any good result. After making a few preparations for our journey in the rude stage over the wide prairies, and visiting pleasantly a few of the Friends at Lawrence we went on to Wichita the terminus of our railroad travel.

This border town was represented to be in a very low state as respects morality. Shocking scenes of crime had recently occurred. We were, however, interested to observe on the part of some a regard for the First-day of the week. Business generally was suspended. But it was stated to us that the expenses of the town government were paid by licenses and fines charged for drinking houses and other vile places. A sad comment on the degradation of many of the inhabitants. At the table of the hotel I noticed a man rather imposing and well dressed, who I supposed to be a judge or other dignified character. I enquired who he was, and was told he was a stranger, but was thought to be a "Capitalist." This was said in such a way as to induce me to ask what was meant by this term. I found it was considered a reproachful appellation and was applied to men who came to seek out persons in great need of money and to loan it at five per cent. a month, taking a mortgage on their land, which when the loan was due, and unpaid, was sued out, and the farm and its improvements went into the hands of the money lender to the ruin of the borrower.

Early on Second-day morning, the prairie stage we were to occupy for the remainder of our journey drove up to the hotel. It was an uncomfortable, straight-backed vehicle, but we made reasonable speed in it, arriving towards evening at the village called Caldwell, about 60 miles from Wichita. This was once an abode of ruffianism, but was much improved by the coming of a respectable Northern family which had taken charge of the public house and refused to sell liquor. The landlady had been a resident of Philadelphia and had known something of Friends. She informed us that it was her concern to be present when persons (mostly rude men) came in, in the evening, that it might be a check on improper conversation. This had a good effect. We had a Bible reading in the evening which was very satisfactory. We heard that one reckless character had been restrained from his customary profanity. Soon after leaving Caldwell early the next morning we entered the Indian territory. We found the land very poor, the grass short and brown, the wide prairie very monotonous. We saw many of the prairie dogs in their little mounds, timid and darting into their holes as we came near. Their only companions were small, grave owls, who home with them. We hoped to see some buffalo, but none came in sight. We dined at the stage ranch, a solitary adobe hut, where we were kindly received and had a good meal. Pursuing our journey night came on. Some of our company were able to sleep in their uneasy position, but I was not thus favored. About midnight we stopped at a log ranch, where we had to wait until the stage from the Cheyenne Agency came in. This was not for several hours and there were no accommodations for rest. In the ranch the inmates, hostlers and stage drivers, lay upon straw on the earthen floor and slept soundly, but I had a wearisome time until about 3 A. M. when the stage came. It was near this locality that the Indians a few months after attacked and killed some teamsters, which caused great commotion, and the military being sent for, many Indians were disarmed and taken prisoners. These were mostly among the wild bands, who declined coming to the agencies and consequently were not under the influence of Friends. It was evident that the good instruction and peaceable example they had received and witnessed at the Agencies had so far influenced the principal chiefs that they refused to unite with the rovers and war was averted. We arrived at the Cheyenne Agency to breakfast and were kindly received by John M. Miles and wife. The Cheyennes were encamped in their lodges nearby. We visited them, but the men were nearly all absent. Some of the women were engaged in dressing buffalo robes, and there were plenty of dirty children and dogs. The tribe had thus far refused to send children to school, and were not disposed to give up the chase. We went to the school in which the children, who were of the Arapahoe tribe, were improving nicely and had adopted civilized dress and habits. There was some excitement about a little girl, who was in danger of being carried off by a young warrior, he claiming that she had been pledged to him by her uncle. But her mother refused to acknowledge the claim, and the child had to be kept close in the house. It was an old custom of the wild tribes to pledge their girls in this way and they were compelled afterwards to follow their masters. This barbarous practice will soon disappear under the Christian influences now brought to bear upon the tribes. Since the outbreak above alluded to and the surrender and imprisonment of a number of the wild Cheyennes, the feeling of others is in favor of education and they have sent a number of their children to school, and a number of the men are more inclined to cultivate land for their subsistence. The prejudice against labor, before their defeat, was so strong among the Cheyennes, that two young men who had been persuaded to plant a corn field were ridiculed and scorned by their companions.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

FIFTY thousand people are reported to have attended the "No More War" mass-meeting in Berlin. Warnings against the militarism still more or less alive in Germany were received with approbation by the crowds.

THE "No More War" demonstration was prohibited by the authorities in Hungary. No reasons have been reported for this action.

OF the 132 billion gold marks Germany is to pay in indemnity, 80 billions are for pensions for Entente veterans, and for allowances for Entente expenditures in preparation for the War; leaving only 52 billions, less than half, for reparations and reconstruction.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL CARLETON, of the United States army, in addressing the Philadelphia Rotary Club recently, revived the ancient fallacy that diplomacy must be based on and supported by force. He also urged the maintenance of a large army, to curb the growth of radical opinion within the United States.

Officers of the army are encouraged thus to educate people to the needs of our military establishment wherever they have an opportunity.

A SUM equivalent to more than 2¼ per cent. of the gross personal incomes of all the inhabitants of the United States for the year 1919 is to be spent on the Army and Navy during the present fiscal year. This is entirely for future wars; the costs of previous wars, such as pensions and interest on the National Debt, are not included.

SECRETARY OF WAR WEEKS has been pointing out that the coal and railroad strikes prove the necessity of a powerful American army to control affairs within the country. A reporter recently asked him, if 4,000 National Guardsmen are able to maintain order in all the regions affected by the strike, how much more order would be maintained were a large army engaged in maintaining it. The Secretary's answer is reported to have been a funny story.

The Prince Regent of Japan has signed the treaties concluded at the Washington Conference, declaring as he did so that it is the intention of the Japanese nation to fulfill them "in letter and in spirit." His signature completes the ratification of the treaties by Japan.

THE INSTITUTE OF POLITICS.—The Institute of Politics opened at Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts, on Eighth Month 1st. Last year it was inaugurated as a summer school for the advanced study, under the leadership of experts, of the problems of international relations, and it is being continued in the same way this summer. Those eligible to attend are the members of the faculties of colleges and universities, and others who have had the preparation necessary to enable them to profit by the discussions. The topics that have claimed the attention of the Institute thus far this summer are problems related to the war debts of the European nations; and the problems of foreign news in the daily papers, its nature, how much there should be of it, and how to make it as useful as possible. The importance of accurate information, widely disseminated, as to events and opinions in other countries is being recognized; for public opinion, which is the ultimate authority, is absolutely dependent on accurate information.

VETERANS OF ALLIED ARMIES TO UNITE FOR PEACE.—Representatives of the American Legion, the British Empire Service League, and the Federation Interalliée des Anciens Combattants, meeting in New Orleans in the coming Tenth Month, in connection with the National Convention of the American Legion, will discuss the possibility of a world-wide organization of all the veterans of the armies of all the Allied nations in the World War. Field Marshal Earl Haig, the President of the British Empire Service League, says in the world-organization of the old soldiers of the Allies a powerful force for permanent peace, "to make right the master of might, to secure peace and good-will on earth." Belgium, France, Italy, Serbia, Roumania, Czecho-Slovakia, the United States and the British Empire and all its components are represented in the three organizations.

SECRETARY HUGHES ON PEACE EDUCATION.—The importance of educational work such as the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee is carrying on is emphasized in an article in the latest Advocate of Peace, entitled "The Conduct of Foreign Relations," by Secretary of State Hughes. He says, after discussing means of accurately informing the people, whose opinion is the final authority in diplomatic affairs:—

"It is rather my desire to emphasize the importance of peace as the object of diplomacy, and the necessity of intelligent opinion, not merely as to the desirability of peace as an abstract conception, but with respect to the conditions that are essential to the maintenance of peace. With these conditions, public opinion should be deeply concerned. Attention has been directed to formal institutions, to international agreements relating to the maintenance of peace. But the fundamental fact is that, however well devised, these will be of little worth in the absence of that state of international feeling which will promote amicable co-operation and permit the removal of the causes of discord.

"It is apparent that this attitude of the public mind, this instructed public opinion, cannot be had save as it is produced by the conscious endeavor and constant influence of men and women who have had the special advantages of higher education. It is the interaction of the influences of the university on the one hand and of the many schools of experience on the other, that produces that clear, practical and intelligent view of affairs that we call the dominant American opinion."

PEACE EDUCATION AT THE FAIRS.—The agricultural fairs held early each autumn offer a splendid opportunity for peace education. Last year a beginning was made at the Wilmington, West Chester, Byberry and Trenton Fairs, and plans are now being formed for more effective work at those fairs this fall. In each case the Peace Committee is co-operating with local groups by furnishing literature and other material.

At Wilmington, Friends of both branches have formed a joint committee under the chairmanship of Robert K. Tatnall. Last year a continuous exhibit of lantern slides in an attractively decorated booth, and the distribution of souvenir fans to the perspiring crowd enabled them to present their message to many people.

At Byberry last autumn, the tent in which Friends had their exhibit was the only place on the fair grounds in which people could sit still and rest, and became a popular centre on this account.

The West Chester branch of the Women's International League, under the leadership of Ann Sharpless and Sarah B. Leeds, have arranged to take space in one of the buildings at the West Chester Fair. They are planning to make use of literature and fans in spreading the idea that war can be abolished.

The recently organized Bucks County Council for the Reduction of Armaments, of which Wendell F. Oliver is Chairman, is conducting the campaign at the Trenton Fair. They carried on a very active "No More War" demonstration, enlisting the co-operation of the county and Trenton papers very effectively, and now have to live up to the reputation they have established. They are now arranging for space, expecting to have a small rest-room, to distribute literature and information, and will probably make use of souvenir fans or some similar means of presenting attractively the idea that we can end war.

"PROHIBIT the game—never mind amending the rules," is the suggestion of a correspondent to the American Legion monthly, in reference to restrictions on gas-ware.

PROFESSOR GEORG F. NICOLAI, who with Professor Einstein tried to circulate a manifesto in opposition to the Manifesto of the Ninety-three German Intellectuals early in the war, and who served a long term in prison for his pacifist views, has left the University of Berlin and accepted a professorship in the University of Argentina.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THURSDAY"—By T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH.

One morning I burned my hand on the coffeepot. "Sacre!" I said, with considerable vigor. To my great astonishment, Thursday forsook my bed, which he always cherished as long as possible in the mornings, and came toward me wagging his tail. It was the first time I had ever seen him wag it.

"Ma foi, Thursday! I said. "Parles-tu français?" He barked, put his feet on my knees and showed in every way how happy he was—like a father whose child has just said "Dada." He was congratulating me upon learning to talk.

It then dawned upon me that the sound of those French words had awakened remembrance in him, which plainly showed that he must have once belonged to one of the French-Canadian families. That simple deduction helped Thursday and me to understand each other a great deal better. If Thursday were about to walk over an otter track, my "Soin, Thursday," together with a wave of my hand, was effectual enough, whereas previously my remarks had been merely wasted breath.

Indian Summer lingered; the days were hazy and the nights were cold. I knew that winter would be the harsher for the delay, but I put off my return, for it was a joy to sun yourself with the beaver by day and to sleep sound and long like the bear by night. Thursday, too, was utterly content. He evidently had tired of the wild life that had led him into the bush. Like me in luxury he was agreeable but rather useless. The easy life appealed to him, and I did not begrudge him the food of mine that he consumed. That was lucky, for the tables were so soon to be turned.

Even the most confirmed loafer tires of inaction at last. So I planned a farewell excursion, a four days' trip to the top of a distant ridge, where I suspected that moose would yard when the snow came. Accordingly I left my tent in order and started with my forester's tent on my back and light rations for four days.

Thursday accompanied me with a long look of protest, which plainly said, "If this is absolutely necessary, I suppose I must." Before we had gone many hundred yards I realized that I had not brought my snowshoes, and a lively mental debate followed. Lazy streak says, "Oh, what's the use, anyway?" Caution replies, "Anything may happen in four days in December." At last to silence the two of them I turned back to add those light but cumbersome articles to my pack.

We walked all day through the silent woods and made early camp near a beautiful clump of balsams. The days were short now. That night the stars came out with unusual brilliance, presaging the end of the mild weather. I cut much wood, for I intended to use the spot as a return camp after I had visited the ridge.

I awoke before dawn to feel the peculiar hush of the great woods when a snowstorm is beginning. I heard the delicate whisper of frozen flakes drifting through the trees—surely one of the faintest sounds in nature and only audible when the ear is sharpened by the dark. Peacefully I went again to sleep, feeling Thursday warm at my feet.

It must have snowed industriously, or else I had slept very late.—I never carry a watch in the woods—for when I next opened my eyes many inches of snow were piling in the open and under the pines; spruces and balsams were bowing down in winter humbleness. The light snow made walking hard and snowshoeing none too pleasant, and so I decided to keep my tent as headquarters and to enjoy the storm on a short walk. Thursday was thoroughly of the wilderness. He seemed to reflect the varying moods of nature, and like myself a great storm filled him with electrical excitement and joy.

There followed a day after my own heart. In exposed places a cold breeze blinded us, threw whole sheets of white flame into our faces. Ten yards was a vista, every group of evergreens huddled like a sculpture of Rodin's. Within a few minutes I was lost, but with Thursday and my compass I knew I had infallible guides.

It was to laugh, as Thursday would have said, to see him drifting along behind me; he looked like a snow bank, from the front of which protruded a red tongue. When the shortening day, made even shorter by the thick weather, warned me to take shelter all I said was, "Thursday, en avant," and in twenty minutes he had led me to the door of the tent, which I almost stumbled upon before I saw it.

I shall never forget the cosiness of that evening—supper by candlelight, a companion who understood and outside the low roar of the storm voices from the ridges. In satisfaction Thursday and I fell asleep.

THE SITUATION IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

It is hard to be optimistic about the recovery of Central Europe. All observers except the wilfully blind report rising prices, rapid depreciation of the currency, evidences of an impending crash and little that is indicative of a wholesome reconstruction movement. The price that people pay for war is shown in the lower standard of living, the unsound finances and the unstable governments. There is little variation in the story, whether it is told by one who has long been in close touch with Europe or by a newcomer from western lands.

Dr. Hilda Clark, Head of the Vienna Mission since its establishment, saw that city in the terrible "turnip" year of 1919-20. Yet she writes last month: "As regards the general situation and the outlook for the winter, I think we can no longer have any confidence as to an ultimate recovery. The amount of credit given has been far too small to give Vienna a chance to show what she could do. But in a state of affairs in which no one appears to understand completely what is happening, I think it would be cowardly to throw up the sponge and say that nothing more should be done to relieve the misery here which may possibly be as great next winter as in Russia."

"I think that in accounting for the present gloomy outlook one must remember that not only have totally inadequate credits been granted, but the collapse of the German mark is certainly damaging the Austrian economic position; and while Germany will no doubt recover in the end, Austria, with her lack of internal resources, cannot weather the storm if it lasts too long."

"I do not wish to disguise the fact that the Austrian Government has no doubt made mistakes in financial and economic policy, and that certain economies have not been made which would certainly have helped matters; but I do not think that any one could contend that Vienna could have recovered her position by her own efforts without some more aid than she has already had."

"While the land settlement program will not of itself save Vienna, even if it should obtain the full support that it needs, it is steadily placing a large number of the pick of her inhabitants beyond the reach of the worst consequences of the downfall of the city, and we believe that you can rightly appeal to people to support it as the best way of saving a section of the population."

The latest cables report that conditions are rapidly growing worse with the continued fall of the krone. The rise of prices has been catastrophic. People are appealing to the Mission in increasing numbers for emergency help.

The atmosphere of Germany was not one of prosperity and security to Ethel Caroline Cooper, a South Australian worker who has just joined the Polish Unit. On Seventh Month 4th she writes: "The worker who sets out to inquire into the conditions which prevail in starving Europe has not to travel many hours from London to the East to be conscious that she has moved into another state of affairs than that which prevails in our still relatively stable and ordered English world. Long before reaching Berlin one is enveloped in an atmosphere of haste, of unrest and of strenuous effort that has something of fear behind it."

"The train is crowded, principally with business men, whose talk has but two themes melting into one—the political situation brought about by the murder of Rathenau, and the economic one, connected with the collapse of the German exchange."

"If only work could save us!" sighs a man sitting opposite me; "but how can one work more than this? I scarcely enter my own house or see my wife and children. The other day I got home early in the morning, and when my little daughter saw me she exclaimed 'What are you doing here, father?' Is anything wrong?"

"And a string of stories follows from the other passengers, amusing, cynical, or despairing. One stays in my memory:—

"What is the use of saving or even of working? A few years ago a wealthy merchant divided his fortune between his two sons—the elder stayed at home and worked for his father—the younger, a wastrel, spent a quarter of a million marks on wine and gave himself up to wild living. Last week his money and his wine had come to an end, nothing remained but the empty bottles. But bottles are now things of value! He sold the empty bottles two days ago for half a million marks, and yesterday his elder brother was run over by a profiteer's motor! It is the story of the modern prodigal son!"

She found encouragement, however, in the energetic way in which the German organizations are coping with such problems as child-welfare and the support of the students. During her three days in Berlin she visited several institutions, among them homes for tubercular children and restaurants for the poorest of the university students. She felt that the movement to aid this group of young, intelligent, ambitious people trying to gain an education and support themselves in these difficult times, was particularly worthy of support. Fifty dollars in American money covers the entire cost of a year at most German universities.

After Berlin came Warsaw and greater evidences of disorganization and uncertainty as to the future. The city even more than other capitals became densely overcrowded with refugees who poured in during the war. The efforts of the government in their behalf are thus described:—

"Imagine a large shed with two broad shelves built round the inside, each shelf divided by a rail into compartments perhaps eight feet wide—one clambers by a narrow step-ladder to the upper shelf. In each compartment lives a family—men, women and children huddled together with the bundles that form their last possessions.

"The Polish lady, who acted as our guide and interpreter, waved her hand to an upper shelf. 'You see, each family has its little home!' she said. It was scarcely the moment for arguing about definitions, and one let the word pass.

"We wandered through the various buildings, the de-lousing room, baths, hair-clipping room, fumigating oven for clothes, through another block, arranged with slightly more privacy for those who can afford to pay something, and in spite of the utter misery and sordidness one realizes that Poland is doing much, not only to help herself, but to act as a bulwark against the tide of disease with which war and famine would otherwise overwhelm Western Europe.

"But what is to be done with these people? Where are homes and employment to be found for them? For, faster than other shelter can be arranged, incoming trains are bringing in fresh thousands, and at the present moment the Polish government is too poor to grant more than 6000 marks (less than six shillings) to each of the hospitals that have been erected."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING was held in due course on Eighth Month 8, 1922. The meeting of Ministers and Elders met the preceding day and confirmed the nominations as Elders from Muncy Meeting, of Henry E. Kirk and Clemuel R. Henrie.

The meeting for worship preceded the regular business session and was felt to be one of favor and uplifting, there being weighty exhortation and instruction from several Friends. The temptations of our Lord as recorded in some of the Gospels were referred to and the importance emphasized that we should in all our relations of life be so at one with the Father that our every action should be in accord with His Divine Will. Among the Ministers present from other Quarterly Meetings were Zebedee Haines, Alfred Lowry and Max I. Reich.

In pursuance of the action taken in Fifth Month, business was attended to in a regular joint session for the first time, there being from this time but one Quarterly Meeting. Heretofore joint sessions have been held usually, but some matters of business have been considered in separate sessions of men and women Friends. In addition to the consideration given to the first four Queries, there was some routine business. Attention was called to the meetings held at Eagles Mere, Pocono Manor and Pocono Lake Preserve, Pa., and at Back Log Camp, New York State. The meeting decided with entire unanimity that whilst it might be desirable if a proper method could be discovered to have some way by which birthright members should definitely declare their adherence to our recognized principles, yet that birthright membership in our Society is a matter of very vital importance and that it is not advisable to depart from the present practice regarding it. A Committee was appointed to draft a minute on this subject.

BOOK STORE NOTES.—The book which has of late had the greatest sale is Part 1 of the London Yearly Meeting Book of Discipline; the last lot of fifty lasted just about a week; a larger supply is ordered; this is a book which cannot be too strongly recommended. The Memorial of Samuel Emlen has been available for some time past; it portrays the life of one of our Lord's devoted workers. The 1922 Year Book of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has been in such light demand that its annual up-to-date issuance is doubtful.

ONE is not surprised to learn that at Lansdowne Meeting, Seventh Month 23rd, the London Epistle was read and commented on, it seems a natural thing to happen, the same having become the practice in numerous meetings of Friends both here and in England. But that the Epistle should be read Sixth Month 25th to an appreciative audience on the shores of Lake Geneva, in Switzerland, is cause for special gratification and prompts us to quote from a letter recently to hand:—

"In the garden of the Fellowship School," writes a correspondent, "with the music of the wind in the trees, the songs of the birds, and some stray drops of a thunder shower falling upon the summer leaves, the eternal hills around us, and the scented thyme at our feet, we listened to the message, first in the original English and then in Pierre Cérésolle's beautiful translation. We were folk of many nations and conditions,—German, French, Swiss, English, Russian, Ukrainian; pupils of 11, Friends nearing 80; a university student, a railway official, an artisan, a doctor, a Seventh-day Adventist; but we were one in a warm response to our great Swiss pacifist and to Dr. Rosslyn Earp as they further interpreted to us the way of life and its practical implications. Tea in the library and the half hour's walk to the station in the fresh rain-scented air brought to a happy close a day of added strength to the bond between the School and the Meeting which the generosity of the Council for International Service has helped to establish, and for which the members of the Fellowship School are deeply grateful."

IN the first six months of 1922 there were 30 lynchings. This is 6 less than the number, 36, for the first six months of 1921, and 18 more than the number, 12, for the first six months of 1920. Of the 30 persons put to death, 19 or 63 per cent., were in two States, Mississippi (7) and Texas (12). Of those lynched, 2 were whites and 28 were Negroes. Eleven of those put to death were charged with the crime of rape and nineteen were charged with other offenses. Five of those put to death were burned at the stake and 3 were first put to death and then their bodies were burned.

THIRTY or more Friends in attendance at Columbia College Summer School, N. Y., have been holding a Friends' Meeting each Fifth-day evening. The Conference part of the first session was addressed by Francis Maxfield on "Quakerism and Education." This was followed by a meeting for worship.

“Unto Jesus,” and not to the apparent success of our efforts. Apparent success is not always the measure of real success; and besides God has not enjoined success upon us, but only labor. He will ask an account of our labor, but not of our success. Why then should we be too much concerned about it? We must sow the seed; God will gather the fruit; if not to-day, it will be to-morrow; if not for us, it will be for others. Even if success were granted us, it would always be dangerous to look complacently upon it; on the one hand we are tempted to claim to ourselves some of the glory; on the other hand we are prone to slacken our zeal when we cease to see good results arising from it; that is the very time when we ought to put forth double energy.”

THE CALL OF THE CROSS.

The great message which all nations must hear is pre-eminently “the word of the cross.” That was the preaching that founded the church. It is still “a stumbling block” to self-righteousness, and “foolishness” to culture. But that is no reason why we should keep it in the background. We must, with the Apostle Paul, preach Christ crucified, because “in them who are called” He is still the power and the wisdom of God, stronger and wiser than men.

The Christian church needs to be brought back to the cross and to the truth for which the cross stands. There will be no revival of vital godliness until the cross has become once more central to Christian thought and ethics. Give us back the cross, let us listen again, in this strange day of many voices, to its call, and the windows of heaven will be reopened, and our Lord will no longer be “as a stranger in the land, as a mighty man astonished, that cannot save.”

It is a three-fold call that sounds from the cross. It is a call to repentance; a call to come out of an evil life. It is a call out of an empty life to a life of discipleship. It is a call out of an easy life to a life of sacrificial service.

(1) When we look at the cross we see the obedience of One who would rather die than sin. All His life sin had haunted Him with its solicitations. We are told that “He suffered, being tempted.” But sin could not get His consent for one moment. He resisted it unto blood. It was in human nature that this great moral miracle was wrought. Whatever difficulties some might have with “the miraculous element in the gospels,” they cannot get away from the greatest miracle of all. Christ Himself, what He was, is even more wonderful than what He did. He was sinless in a sinning world.

The cross was the final victory of Jesus over sin. We speak of “the tragedy of Calvary.” But the tragedy was not on the cross. It was below it, in those guilty of it. In Him it was triumph, not tragedy. It was the great act of reparation to God in a world which sin had seduced and blighted. And we may identify ourselves with that oblation, for it was offered in Man and for Man when He died upon the cross, and find in it a door of escape out of the dominion of sin.

(2) Our Lord deliberately chose to go to the cross. It was not thrust upon Him. He came “not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many.” No one took His life from Him, He laid it down in willing surrender. To chose this way appeared to wreck His mission. In reality it has assured its success. Was it not the vision of the cross which enabled Him to refuse the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them on the mount of temptation? And on the mount of transfiguration Moses and Elias talked with Him, not of His teaching or His miracles, but of “the decease which He should accomplish in Jerusalem.” They did not share Simon Peter’s: “Be it far from Thee, Lord!”

Our Lord staked all on the cross. But for the cross His life would have been a failure. He said: “Except a grain of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone. But if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.” And there is no other way for His disciples. His fellow-laborers in the rebuilding of the world must be fellow-sharers of His cross. Only such lives have permanent value, though others might say: “To what purpose is this waste?”

(3) It takes the mighty power of God to go the way of the cross. Jesus offered Himself to God “through the Eternal Spirit.” And the self-same power comes upon His disciples to enable them to offer their wills, their affections, their bodies, as living sacrifices. There is a close connection between the outpoured life of Calvary and the inpoured life of Pentecost. The cross sends us forward to the “power from on high.” And the power of Pentecost sends us back to the cross. If the cross stands alone in solitary dignity as the way back to God, it must not be left to stand alone as the sign and symbol of the life that counts. Baptized into Christ, we are baptized into His death. Thus we become the members of His mystical body, His very hands and feet. Such have forever left behind a life of self-pleasing and self-seeking. They have heard the call of the cross to live another life. By their means Christ repeats His ministry of love. Crucified with Christ they live no longer, but Christ liveth in them and through them.

THE GROWING CONSCIENCE AGAINST WAR.

"To a soldier who has seen war there is nothing on earth as equal peace and good-will among nations."

GEN. ROBERT LEE BULLARD.

SIXTH MONTH 5, 1922.

Thoughtful Americans have been taking time of late to reconsider the entire problem presented by the events of recent years, and to question whether, in case the tragedy of the war were to be faced again, the decision of the United States to take a hand in the struggle would be the same as before. This does not necessarily involve the opinion that a mistake was made in our decision. We are perhaps not far enough along in the process of reflection to be impressed with that sentiment. But it is increasingly clear that war is a great and terrible wrong, that it has no place in the program of civilization, that even its by-products, over which war-time orators talked so eloquently, are either illusory or vicious. We may not be ready yet to say that we did the wrong thing in going in on the side of what we thought was democracy, decency and the rights of men. But in the light of the unnameable horrors of the struggle we know now that there is something monstrously wrong about that method of arriving at just ends, and in the amazing confusion of issues that followed the war we are not quite sure that the great objectives were gained.

The churches did their part in the war. If there were misgivings and hesitations, they were largely repressed in the eager desire to aid the government in the adventure in behalf of righteousness and liberty. Some there were who on grounds of personal conviction or because of religious views refused to share in the enterprise. For such people we had little regard, and we made them feel our disapproval by scornful speech, and ultimately by harsher measures. Some of them are still under ban, as offenders against the dignity and safety of the national cause. At the time we thought that this was probably the proper attitude to take. Now with an increasing sense of disquiet we know that we are not sure. We are somewhat troubled with the possibility that the men and women who wholly disbelieved in fighting, and were brave enough to say it consistently in the face of a war-mad community, may have been right, heroically right. We are not quite sure.

And we are humbled and shamed by the reflection that if the church had been united and efficient, it could have made war unnecessary. Those long, tragic years in which Europe, Christian Europe, was heading consciously and with determination toward a military readjustment of its issues, gave ample time for the mandates of peace to be made clear. In all that time Christian men and women contented themselves with little denominational conventions and conferences over amiable but for the most part inconsequential matters; and the deliberate purpose of politicians and militarists to break the peace at the first opportunity was either taken with scant seriousness, or was regarded as a part of the expected and necessary program of the world. It was the pitiful weakness of the church, in almost every one of its hundred denominations, that it was regarded as an unfortunate but unavoidable episode in the present state of international jealousies. It failed utterly and pathetically to understand that war is a crime and must henceforth be dealt with as such.

It is this fact which brings to the church today the humbling sense of shame as it contemplates these past terrible years. It has not put itself on record as believing that war was an outlaw against civilization, and that any nation that began a war should be regarded as a criminal. Believing that Germany was responsible for initiating the great tragedy we said many things about that fact. We said that the military group in Germany was foolish to jeopardize the commercial and educational leadership of the nation by plunging into the conflict. We said that the war was an act of insolent effrontery against the long-cherished peace of the nations. We charged a long list of crimes to German soldiers in the course of the war. The one thing we did not do was to maintain that war itself is a crime, and that Germany and all the rest of us were guilty in letting it begin. Now we know.

But this lesson we have learned in the severe school of war itself. No one ever brought it to us except the Great Teacher of Nazareth, whom we were not quite ready to take seriously on that theme, as we are not yet ready to take him seriously upon so many others. But on this issue that is where he stands and has always stood. When we come to think it through we know that all the defenses we have made for ourselves as apologists for war are worth nothing. The doctrine of self-defense has been made to carry a very heavy load during the war period. One need not be a nerveless or passionless weakling, submitting to every insult, to see the distinction between a just and righteous self-respect and self-defense and an attitude of belligerency such as makes war possible. The moral equivalents of war are far more effective than fighting if they are trusted to operate. There are a hundred steps that could be taken before war is even contemplated. And we know that not one of them was fully tried out before the resort to arms.

The issues were clouded, and national prejudices were constantly fanned. If the amount of propaganda released in support of narrow patriotism and national hatreds could have been devoted to conciliation and world friendship, the war could have been prevented. But the cultivation of the war spirit was the definite and profitable business of a whole company of diplomatists, politicians, profiteers and militarists; while the protest against war was only the mild and pallid effort of the churches, and the serious business of so small a group of ardent spirits that it failed to make a place for itself in the consciousness of the nation. As a result men and women of almost every class threw themselves into any kind of war work they found available. Convinced for the moment that patriotism justified the struggle, and that all efforts were required, they easily overcame their scruples against militarism, and took up the support of the government with ardor and enthusiasm.

It is not too much to affirm with emphasis that tens of thousands of men have learned their lesson and would never follow that course again. It is not that the war cost too much in blood and treasure, although it did exact a heavy price. It is not that scores of thousands of the young men of the nation will never get the horrors of trench life, its loathsome and unimaginable stench, indecencies, defilements and sufferings, out of their minds. That chamber of horrors will not be soon forgotten. Not all the pomp and pageantry of mimic demonstrations can ever efface or make impressive again the sordid and bloody business. The bravery and picturesqueness of military affairs have departed, never to return. But the serious part of the business is the increasing conviction of hosts of men who took part in the conflict, as well as of other multitudes who did the best they could to assist, that the justification for war has gone forever, and that for themselves they are through with it once and for all.

Especially is this a growing sentiment among Christian men. They went into the service with the joy and determination of true patriots. They performed their duty, whatever it chanced to be, with the consciousness of fulfilling a rightful obligation. They did not stop to ask questions in the face of what they conceived to be a great and solemn responsibility. But now they have had a chance to think it through, and they know deep in their hearts that the thing could never be justified again. They do not believe they did wrong in following duty as they saw it then. But they know they could never again count it a duty to go to war in any cause.

It may be that all the cost of the war is not too great a price to pay for such a lesson. But that lesson must be made articulate in the speech of those who have learned it. The shallow and superficial patriotism of the militaristic and profiteering order will not be silenced easily. Vicious journalism is whipping it up with constant threats of the designs of this nation and that against the United States. But the other nations have learned their lesson in an even sadder school than ours. They are weary of the folly and the futility of fighting, where one struggle only makes cause for others to follow. Gradually the nations are discovering the truth of the ancient and divinely-inspired maxim that they who take the sword shall perish by the sword, and that the only real leader of men who has a peace program that will work for all people and all times is the Prince of Peace, who passed this way to make all men brothers, fellow citizens of the world and haters of war. —From the Christian Century (Fifth Month 4, 1922).

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

In a conveyance provided by Agent John D. Miles we proceeded over the prairie about thirty-five miles to the Wichita agency where we were welcomed by our friend Jonathan Richards. The buildings at this place are convenient, as well as neat and in good taste, reminding one of settlements near our eastern cities. The boarding school was commodious and comfortable and well filled. It had been arranged to have a council at this place with a number of the wild tribes. Messengers had been sent to summon them, but the Indians came in slowly and we had to wait several days for the more distant ones. At length it was assembled on the banks of the Wichita River under the shade of some fine trees. The tribes represented were the Wichitas, Caddoes, Delawares, Apaches, Comanches, etc. It was very picturesque to see them coming from various directions on the ponies in their highly colored blankets. About noon the chiefs were seated in a circle and the council was opened. Speeches were made by Cyrus Beede, Thomas Wistar, Dr. Rhoads and myself, manifesting our good-will and the interest felt by Friends in their welfare, giving good counsel and exhortation to industry and cultivation of the land instead of hunting—encouraging them to allow their children to be educated and brought up in civilized habits. They gave patient attention to the speakers, and when informed that we had finished, the chiefs one after another rose and spoke with much deliberation. They mentioned their varied wants, their desire for improvement and their wish to walk in the white man's path. Each speaker before he commenced came and shook hands with us in a cordial manner. There were many Indians gathered around, some on horseback, others standing or reclining on the grass. The council held about two hours. The day was fine and all seemed gratified. Black Beaver, a Delaware Indian, who is quite civilized, is much respected. He is the owner of a large farm with a good dwelling, barn and out-buildings. His daughter was married to a young white man who lived with him and assisted in the farm work. We visited several of the Indians who had commenced farming and had comfortable homes. At one place we saw several Indian women coming in from their milking with pans of milk on their heads. Others we saw in their bark huts and skin lodges. At one place they were at breakfast. I tasted the home-made bread and found it sweet and good. Afterward I went alone to visit Horseback, a Comanche chief, at his lodge in a shady grove. He was seated with three wives and a number of children near the door of his tent. I could not talk with him, but I had a picture of Penn's treaty with the Indians which I endeavored by signs to explain. He was gratified by my giving it to him and showed it to his wives. This chief had been a great warrior, but had changed under Friendly influences. He was now quite serious and when we went to our meeting for worship on First-day morning he accompanied us and sat with quiet attention. The farm at this agency was well stocked and cultivated, and the garden planted with fruit trees. There is a large saw mill and good shops for wheelwrights, blacksmiths and carpenters. While at this agency, a couple applied to the agent to marry them. He consulted us, and it was concluded to hold a meeting for the purpose. This was done, a considerable company assembling. After a time of solemn waiting, some appropriate remarks were made, and then the parties repeated Friends' ceremony, and the certificate was read by Jonathan Richards and signed by the bride and groom and most of those present, and the important matter concluded to the satisfaction of all. After completing our service at this agency, Dr. Rhoads and I went on to the Kiowa agency near Fort Sill. We were driven by Thomas Battey, a Friend, who resided with a band of Kiowas in order to instruct them and their children, submitting patiently to much privation. He was much respected by the tribe. It was a lonely journey over the wide prairie about thirty miles. We arrived towards evening at the agency, where James Haworth accommodated us very comfortably.

While there the Indians of the various bands came for their rations. These consist of live cattle, of flour, sugar, bacon, soap, tobacco, etc. The men receive and kill the cattle, the women take charge of the rest. It was an amusing sight to see them divide the spoil. A number of women seated themselves in a circle—a bag of sugar was placed in the centre—one who had a tin measure was appointed to distribute it. She did it impartially. The flour was divided in the same way. All appeared in good humor, laughing and talking with one another. Finally when all had received their portion the articles were packed in bags, placed on their ponies and the squaws trotted off to their lodges. One of them had a little infant which I saw lying in a small box lined with buffalo skin, apparently contented. I watched the disposal of it. There was a grandmother in the company. She was placed on the pony—the box was handed to her, and arranged for the ride. Then the mother packed part of the family supply behind the grandmother, and the remainder on another pony which she mounted, and all moved off in good spirits.

After this a council of the Kiowa and Comanche chiefs was summoned. About thirty came, among them Satanta, who had been confined in a Texas prison on account of murder, and several other ferocious chiefs with painted faces and savage dress, nearly all armed. We spoke to them on the importance of giving up their wild, roving ways, and becoming cultivators of the land—of giving up raiding and living peaceable lives, telling them we came unarmed, having no other thought than to do them good. Satanta appeared bold and reckless, said he would hunt buffalo, and that buffalo and Indians, etc., go together. All the rest of the chiefs were sober and respectful and several made peaceable speeches. We were subsequently interested to know, that in the sudden outbreak which occurred a few months after, these chiefs remained quiet and restrained their warriors, so that there was no serious conflict. This result we think may be fairly attributed to the good influence of the agent and the peaceable advice of Friends. Satanta, however, got into a drunken brawl and was taken again to the prison in Texas. Some of the violent and insubordinate who refused to attend the councils were afterwards taken prisoners, and sent by the military authorities to St. Augustine, Florida, which proved eventually a great boon to them, some Christian ladies of that vicinity becoming interested in their welfare, and giving them Christian instruction. The officer in charge, Captain Pratt, took a similar interest. When they were released they were brought on their homeward journey by way of Hampton, where a number of the young men consented to become students of the manual labor college. They have conducted themselves well and improved rapidly.

While at Fort Sill I went to a photographic establishment and procured a number of likenesses of the Indians and of the buildings at the Wichita agency. We attended the school, and witnessed the Indian boys performing sums in fractions on the blackboard and heard recitations of both boys and girls in other branches.

FROM THE NEW LONDON DISCIPLINE.

PART I.

A very helpful part of Part I, English Book of Discipline, entitled, "Christian Life, Faith and Thought in the Society of Friends," is the section "Spiritual Experiences," from which we quote two examples; quite dissimilar, yet, for that reason, perhaps, very interesting. They are given together, just at the close of the section.

"Lucy Anne Woodhead (1845-1912), of Manchester, and Colwyn Bay, assisted for many years in the grocer's shop belonging to the family, and, on retiring from business through ill-health, moved to Colwyn Bay, choosing a house adjoining the meeting-house so that she might serve the congregation as much as lay in her power during the declining years of her life.

"Frequent attacks of bronchitis eventually compelled her to retire altogether from business and remove to Colwyn Bay, where she resided for the last seven years of her life. She purchased a house adjoining the meeting-house premises that she might be able to attend meeting as regularly as possible, and she found what was perhaps the most important part of her life's work in the loving service she was enabled to render to the little congregation of Friends gathered there. One striking feature in her character was her great capacity for friendship; her house was a centre from which was shed abroad sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men and women; and to enumerate the tired souls in need of rest, and the impecunious, unable to afford a holiday, to say nothing of ministers, visiting the meeting, who were entertained in that hospitable home, would be impossible.

A constant attender at Colwyn Bay meeting writes . . . "Her experience of life had not been a wide one, yet such was the intuitive power which love gave her, that it was never necessary to explain different standpoints, other modes of life; she always understood, and put the kindest construction on it all. She dearly loved little children; and though no child ever had the blessing of calling her mother, yet she mothers us all, and our meeting. By devoting the last years of her life to our small gathering, she gave it a soul, and is there any higher form of creation than this? She gave us a standard of what one might become who walked with God."

THOMAS HODGKIN, 1831-1914.

"Thomas Hodgkin, the historian, wrote the following poem when he was in his thirty-seventh year. It carries with it something of the spiritual atmosphere of Thomas Hodgkin's life. After long years of varied service, the call came just as he would have wished . . . as he was preparing to start for meeting at Falmouth. There was no leave-taking. He had always dreaded a lingering illness, or the loss of his reason, or any "struggle of this dying" . . . There was no austerity in his life, the keynote was joy.

"Father! I live or die in this confiding,
That Thou art King;
That each still Star above me owns Thy guiding,
Each wild bird's wing.
That Nature feels Thee, great unseen Accorder
Of all her wheels,
That tokens manifest of Thy mightier order,
Her strife reveals.
And that without Thee not a wave is heaving
Nor flake descends,
That all the giant powers of her conceiving
Are Thy Son's friends.
Yet, I beseech Thee, send not these to light me
Through the dark vale;
They are so strong, so passionlessly mighty,
And I so frail.
Nol Let me gaze not on some sea far-reaching,
Nor star-spent sky,
But on a Face in which mine own, beseeching,
May read reply.

Such was my cry; hath not the mighty Maker
Who gave me Christ,
Hath He not granted me a sweet Awaker
For the last tryst?
Given a Son who left the peace unbroken
That reigns above
That He might whisper God's great name unspoken,
The name of Love!
Have I not known Him? Yes, and still am knowing,
And now shall know;
Have not His sweet eyes guided all my going,
Wept with my woe;
Gleamed a bright dawn-hope when the clouds of sadness
Made my soul dim,
And looked their warning when an alien gladness
Lured me from Him?
Lord, when I tread this valley of our dying,
Sharp cliffs between,
Where, over all, one ghastly shadow lying Fills the ravine;
Oh, Son of Man, if Thee, and not another
I here have known,
If I may see Thee then, our First-born Brother,
Upon Thy throne;
How stern so e'er, how terrible in brightness
That dawn shall break,
I shall be satisfied with Thy dear likeness
When I awake."

ADVENTURING FOR THE PEACE OF CHINA.

CHAPTER 3.

So here we find ourselves again in Shan Hai Kuan, waiting to see the next step. There is a lull in the fighting. Now and then a shell is let loose and the house shakes. We are trying every possible means of getting into communication across the lines to see what the prospects are for reopening the parley. Each time it is more difficult. The telegraph and telephone lines are cut and it is certainly hard to see a way to reach across this breach. But we feel it must be done.

Sixth Month 16, 1922.—Things have been happening since last I wrote. After trying every other possibility of getting a message across we decided we must go ourselves in a little fishing boat. As both lines of trenches run down to the coast and as no boats are allowed out, there was an element of risk, but much less than to cross over between the lines. We found a San Pan that would take the trip and sailed forth about ten in the morning. A few soldiers took a crack at us, but we tied an old British flag to our mast and kept well to sea. We were a funny crew; the sea was rather lumpy; and two of us were sick. We reached the harbor of Chin Wang Rao at two. The port is neutral and foreign, which we felt boded well for our mission as we wished to get some foreigners on that side to co-operating. In this hope we were mistaken. The foreigners there as elsewhere had been instructed from their legations to keep aloof from the war and especially warned about this so-called "peace delegation." I should say here that this was doubtless the wise official attitude, as considerable bad feeling has already been aroused in the Chinese by certain foreigners "taking sides," and our consuls are right in their request for neutrality and non-intervention. Our own consuls in Moukden made this very clear to us before we started. We came absolutely on our own responsibility to plead as Christians for a cessation of bloodshed.

We soon saw there was nothing to be gained here and that we had best go straight to the Chili headquarters again. We wondered very much what kind of reception they would give us this time, since our last visit had been followed by two days of the severest fighting with many casualties and each side placed the blame for beginning on the other. We certainly looked decidedly like fakes! But this was no time to be thinking what we looked like, so we passed in our cards and waited. They were distinctly surprised to see us again, and though faultlessly courteous it was plain to see that they were preparing for another battle. At this point the strange thing happened again, the thing that might happen nowhere else but in China. We were taken into a meeting of all the military staff and had a conference of an hour discussing the possibility of a peace. The whole difficulty lay in this, that neither side believed in the good faith of the other. Here were two armies lying right up against one another, both perfectly willing and wanting to stop fighting, but each one afraid of turning the back. There may be a few random and unauthorized shots on one side and then the other hits back, and it is the easiest thing in the world to get a battle started and each fellow blaming the other for beginning it. The problem is to get the armies apart and to bring the best on either side into conjunction. This is just the reason why we can be of some service in this deadlock. We can run back and forth as messengers and explain misunderstandings before they go too far.

Our conference with the military staff was directed toward restoring some confidence in the sincerity of the Manchurian side and toward arranging a meeting with them in some neutral place. In the harbor there were several foreign battleships, and we suggested that it might be possible to borrow one of them for the purpose. They agreed to this if it could be arranged. After much amusing and rather exasperating red-tape we finally secured a British man-of-war. The next job was to see whether General Chang would meet at the stipulated time. This was, of course, a most crucial point, but we felt confident that he would accept if we could catch him before he went ahead, as we now had a neutral meeting place and one general booked! It was too risky to wait until the next morning to interview him, however, and there was nothing to do but to sail back in our foolish little craft. We pulled up on the beach at Shan Hai Kuan in glorious moonlight at 1:30 A. M.; went straight to headquarters and got General Chang's agreement before we went to bed that night. Early the next morning we were off with the General in the British battleship. There was a helpful conference and it was decided to stop fighting at once and the next day meet again with full powers to arrange formally the details of the withdrawal.

CHAPTER 4.

Sixth Month 18, 1922.—Picture the Captain's cabin of the same British ship last night with the generals of the two armies seated side by side on a sofa fully empowered from headquarters to complete the Armistice. Everybody was in fine spirits. You would never suppose these excellent gentlemen had just been pointing guns at each other across the lines. All the difficulties and complaints, however, were freely discussed and faced through. Then and there at two o'clock in the morning a satisfactory agreement was reached and the Armistice formally signed. We have witnessed the first busy day of evacuation, which began this morning at nine, and are taking the night train to Moukden to our glad homes.

This has been an interesting and significant experience and has thrown into bold relief some of China's difficulties. One of her greatest political hindrances is this system of local military governors practically running affairs in the provinces and entrenched behind personal armies of illiterate and ignorant men and boys. We saw many on both sides not more than seventeen or eighteen years old, fitted out with Western apparatus of war—guns of all kinds, mines, bombs, wireless communications, search-lights, air-craft, moving them against each other, setting back all constructive progress, and blazing a path of wreck and ruin across the quiet countryside. And for what reason? What are the points at issue? Very little besides personal distrust, envy, ambition.

But a new day is imminent. People are looking for a better way. Li Yuan Hung agreed to accept the vacant post of President of China after making very clear his position in the matter of abolishing these local military governorships and private armies. Telegrams from all over China support him in this. We are moving through a stage that is dark and at times discouraging. But the best in China will win out. And she needs the best from the West to help her. The power of the Living Christ is indispensable in producing the unselfish leadership that China lacks so strikingly to-day. She asks to know a more perfect way. This is our moment to speak. What a joy it is to have some little share in holding up Christ's banner and in releasing resources of love which can conquer hatred and suspicion where anything weaker than love fails.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THURSDAY"—By T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH.

I dreamed that I was in a shipwreck. Huge waves of icy water were breaking over me. I awoke, but the dream seemed to continue. A tent flap had come untied and was flapping like a sail. Instead of water, waves of icy air beat upon the tent and snow dust was prickly upon my face. A vast roar pervaded the forest. Great squalls approached, inundated us, swept on with terrible intensity, leaving as a wake the duller undertones of steady blowing. Our tent, more than half buried, was protected by the balsam clump, yet there was wind sweep enough to keep us from being completely buried.

After an interminable period morning dawned darkly. The world seemed lost in a forest fire of wind and snow. I could not have lived in the open. The steady stream of snow bit at the face and hands. Bed was the only place for us, since a fire was out of the question; Thursday snuggled close, shrinking a little when fierce blasts swept over the upper woods. The day crept on. We had a little food, and we had each other for warmth; so we lay and dozed and talked and listened to the wind celebrate the coming of winter. I dreaded the night; but as night drew on the gusts boomed less and less resolutely, and before long I slept.

Light from a cloudless sky and ease from a fallen wind wakened me. I shivered. Who does not know the going-home feeling! No matter how short or how long a time you have been away, no matter how little or how much you have enjoyed yourself, when the last bar is taken down you are in a hurry to get home. The blizzard had conclusively stopped my season's work, and when I awoke hungry, cold, aware that there was nothing to keep me, I was desirous of getting out of the woods. Their silence suddenly grew overpowering, their severity needless; the hardships they exacted were no longer sweetened by necessity.

"Poor Thursday!" I thought. "Pauvre chien!" I said. Thursday merely snuggled closer.

I looked out from the tent. The winter woods—black boles of pine and green arms of spruce and all else a world of white! Three feet of snow lay on the forest floor, and where it could drift, huge waves of snow curled, ready when they broke to engulf little seedlings. I blessed the impulse that had turned me back for snowshoes. Thursday viewed the scene plegmatically. I dug down to my woodpile, and he and I had a real breakfast—the last of our food. How glorious were the long views of white sky and shadowy earth! Hardships? Never a thought!

We set out blithely for the home camp. With no food in my pack, I could not think of moose yards. At best it would be a long day's snowshoeing back to the headquarters tent, and I feared for Thursday's strength. Where the snow was packed by the wind he had no trouble and in other places he managed by keeping in my tracks; but it was dull work for him, and I felt like encouraging him. "Courage, mon fils!" I called over my shoulder. He kept solemnly at my heels, husbanded his strength, and even turned a deaf ear to a chattering red squirrel that had come out to break its three days' fast. As for me, my heart was light, for I was homeward bound. The woods travel was easy along the forest aisles. The brisk air intoxicated me, made me careless. That is the only way I can account for the accident that befell me.

Dusk was gathering when it happened. I was going down an easy slope a little too fast for safety, I suppose. I had turned my head to say something to Thursday. The snow had drifted over a fallen tree. Seeing too late, I jumped. One shoe caught on a dead stick. I remember striking something headforemost.

I must have come to my senses in a few moments, for it was not quite dark. Thursday was licking my cheeks and forehead. But for that I might never have regained consciousness, for the still cold soon soothes a man into a last sleep. "Bon chien, Thursday."

BOOK REVIEW.

"CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE."*

[This volume has been reviewed in various widely circulated English periodicals. Through this means many thousands have had the opportunity to make its acquaintance. The brief review here given touches seriously only one of the many problems involved. Our readers will be well repaid by reading the volume carefully for themselves.—Eds.]

"It is our belief that war is evil not so much because of the suffering it involves—others preach that—but because it depends for its process and very existence upon a fundamentally wrong conception of the relationship of human beings to each other. . . . Pacifism is a philosophy which teaches men to respect each other. . . . No political or religious creeds can ever achieve happiness for the world which do not recognize the dignity and value of human personality." These quotations taken from Clifford Allen's address at the last meeting of the No Conscription Fellowship and given in John W. Graham's book, "Conscription and Conscience," seem to reveal certain fundamental differences in attitude toward the State taken by Conscientious Objectors (to war) in England and in the United States. The belief that radical changes in the economic and political structure of society were necessary before it could become the medium through which the individual could express his conception of Christian idealism was fairly common in England. In this country the feeling was more prevalent that the system was not so bad, the fault lay in the people who worked it.

Many English Friends and other similar groups had become interested in or identified with the British labor movement which, unlike the American movement, is interested not only in hours and wages, but also in the fundamental question of the status of the worker in industry. Thus it came about that there were many of the future Conscientious Objectors who had come to feel that "it is chiefly by the expression of religious impulses through political effort that we may hope to change men's hearts and practice."

And so it happened that when the war broke out there were a number of men who were questioning whether an economic society organized for profit could possibly be administered in the interests of the many. The society which they envisaged could do no violence to personality. Then came the war and later, conscription. Conscription seemed to be the crowning attack of a vicious system upon personality. To yield to it, to make any compromise with it, was to recognize the right of the State to force the individual to render certain service against his will. This the absolutist could not do. The military seemed dimly to realize that here were a group whose ideas struck at the very foundations of military power and the established order of society, and they pursued them with relentless cruelty. The story of this conflict between the government and the 16,000 Conscientious Objectors of different convictions and types is the theme of John W. Graham's book. The author by careful selection of material not only lets the men tell the story of their sufferings, but he also lets them explain the ideal for which they struggled, that we also may see something of the vision they caught in many an English prison cell.

A MESSAGE FROM JAPAN.

TOKIO COLLEGE OF COMMERCE,
Japan, May 21st, 1922.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE FRIEND:
Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Friend:—After four long years spent abroad, three in Philadelphia and one in London, during which I as a student have been busy like a bee gathering honey out of American and English flowers—and they were many and sweet—I am back again on my native soil. These four years have been the most significant period of my life in more ways than one. Academically it covers my happiest and most fruitful years of scholarship in the peace and quiet of West Philadelphia, as well as in the historic storehouse of English culture, the British Museum. I have read much, I have thought much and I have developed much in thought and knowledge. I owe to this period the foundations of what meagre scholarship I possess at present. Socially, too, my stay in America and England has been unusually rich and full, as it has given me opportunities of forming some very valuable and, I hope, life-long friendships to which I am happy to say the Society of Friends has contributed the largest quota. These Friends have rendered me inestimable service by showing me splendid examples of Christianity, which have influenced me profoundly.

With these thoughts and memories uppermost in my mind, one of the first things I have been promising myself to do after my return from England was to go to the Friends' Mission School in Mita, Shiba, Tokio, and to meet Gilbert Bowles and wife and others working with them. I have done so to-day and I wish here to give you a brief account of my visit, hoping that Friends in Philadelphia may be interested in the latest news of their "cousins" in Tokio. (In Philadelphia, especially among Friends in Germantown, everybody is everybody else's cousin.) The Friends' Mission School in Tokio is situated on the slope of Hijiri-zaka, Mita, overlooking the Bay of Tokio. I had not been there for who knows how many years. But here a sweet memory comes back. As a lad in his early teens, I remember having been taken to the School by a school chum of mine. This boy's grandfather was then, and still is, teaching flower arrangement to the girls there, in order to buy a copy of the Bible from a Japanese gentleman taking care of the school-house. This was my first Bible and that Bible happened to be one printed in Philadelphia. At that time my English was even more doubtful than it is now, and the classical language of the authorized version was, for aught I remember, an impenetrable barrier to my understanding, to say nothing of my appreciation of the Gospel. But the thought is pleasant that I had my first Bible from the hand of the Philadelphia Society of Friends, and when I think of this in connection with what happened to me many years afterward, viz., my actual going to Philadelphia and living a great deal with Friends there, I must say that my boyhood experience was strangely prophetic. It was more than fifteen years ago, and since then I have never again been within the school grounds—until to-day.

As I entered the gate, these reminiscences filled my thought, and scenes of my younger days hovered before my mind's eye like glimpses of a far, far-off land of dreams. I went up the hill and called at Gilbert Bowles's residence opposite the school-house. He was away at the Meeting then sitting in the lecture-hall and his wife, to whom I introduced myself, kindly took me to the Meeting. My first impression on entering the hall was that the congregation was much larger than I had expected, including girl pupils of the school. The male portion of the congregation consisted largely of young students and those who appeared to me to be young graduates of colleges and universities. What particularly attracted my attention was the presence of a number of shop-boys or apprentices, which suggests two facts, or the possibility, at least, of such facts. One is that there are more shops in Tokio nowadays which observe Sundays as days of rest. The other is that a growing number of young people engaged in shops are taking interest in spiritual matters. This it may be too hasty to generalize for all Tokio or Japan, but I can confidently say that the good work of Gilbert Bowles and his fellow-workers is showing its effect in that direction far and wide and deep. The service was not of complete silence, as with you or with English Friends. Hymns were sung, passages were read from the Bible and sermons delivered on those passages. The effect of the whole affair upon my mind was that of a Sunday-school with marked Quaker characteristics. One Friend, a venerable gentleman from the country, got on his feet and gave us some of his recent thoughts on things close to his heart. Among other things he told us that he had just finished transcribing some 1,700 pages of the Bible. This delivery of messages is undoubtedly a Quaker characteristic.

After the Meeting I was introduced by Gilbert Bowles to many Friends, both Japanese and American. I met among others Margaret Rhoads, of Germantown, a "real" cousin of Esther Rhoads whom I had the pleasure of meeting in Germantown about two years ago. I also made the acquaintance of Thomas and Esther Jones, whose names had long been familiar to me through THE FRIEND. They are now working with Gilbert Bowles at Mita. I was greatly impressed by the gratefulness of Esther Jones's Japanese; in fact, all American Friends at Hijiri-zaka have a wonderful command of the Japanese language. I understand that Esther Rhoads is specially interested in the study of the vernacular. Later I was invited to have lunch with the family and the other guests, including a Japanese lady interested in the care and education of the feeble-minded. At table I gathered much news of Friends at home and abroad. You all know already of the new Meeting House now in course of construction. Gilbert Bowles showed me the plan, or the building which struck me as being two-thirds Japanese and one-third Quaker in style, although the simplicity of the whole structure bears the unmistakable hallmark of Quakerism. It will be completed this coming autumn and will doubtless greatly facilitate the work of the Mission. My host told me also this interesting story. It has nothing to do, if I remember correctly, with the building of the Meeting House, but I believe that it bears repetition because of its intrinsic value. On a certain occasion the Mission invited contributions from the neighborhood. Among the contributors was a baker. He brought to Gilbert Bowles fifty yen, with the request that ten yen be announced as the amount of his contribution and forty yen as anonymous. His idea was not to embarrass his neighbors who were each giving ten yen. Such delicacy of sentiment is quite touching and well worth appreciation. Incidentally this baker has two little children whom he would like to send to the Friends' Kindergarten.

Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin is revisiting us here in a week or so on his way to England through the United States. When I arrived in London, he had already left for China and it has been my great regret to have been denied the pleasure of meeting him there. But I now know that that pleasure has been deferred to this date and I shall have my long-cherished desire before long. Another guest now being expected is Ned Wood, whom I go to the Germantown Friends one better and call "Brother" Ned. He is due here in the late summer, unfortunately the hottest time of the year in Japan and therefore not very convenient for seeing things and getting about.

I must not trespass upon your valuable space at this rate, so I will close with hearty greetings to all my friends in that dear old Philadelphia where I have made my home for three years and whose sweet memories are ineffaceable from my recollection.

Fraternally yours,
TATSUNOSUKE UEDA.

A HOSPITAL IN THE FAMINE DISTRICT.

Emma Krauss, a nurse who has just gone to Russia, sends the following letter to her friends in the German Unit. Her vivid picture of one of the hospitals on Sixth Month 1, 1922, shows how little has yet been done to meet the medical needs in the famine area.

"First of all greetings to you and your co-workers, for after I get started I shall probably have little to say, but of the distress here. I have just returned from the children's hospital and am in no frame of mind to write about anything but of the dreadful need for everything. I wonder whether you can visualize the hospital from my description? It is a one-storied building with two rooms for patients, a room for personnel, a wash-room and a toilet (?). The wash-room furnishings consist of a stove arrangement built of some plasterlike substance, a large iron kettle fitting into the centre of the stove (the hot water supply), a rubber basin is the bath-tub, towels I have not seen. The first morning I arrived at the hospital too late to see the bathing. Of the reason for my lateness I shall tell you later. This morning I arrived earlier, but again the washing was completed. I am beginning to wonder. To-morrow I shall go still earlier and see what takes place. So much for the wash-room. Crude and dilapidated.

"The toilet is a bucket which is emptied into the yard. At any rate, I believe that this is better than the vile, so-called toilets I saw in Sorochinskoye. There they are filthy and small, too.

"The wards? I should say the rooms are about 15 feet by 15 feet. There are two of these. The day before yesterday there were about 22 patients in these two rooms. Some of the children sleep two in a bed. The walls are plain wood boards. The beds crudely made things, plain posts, no finish, no paint, just as you see them in the lumber yard. The spring,—any plank available—serves the purpose. The mattresses—flour sacks stuffed with straw; no sheets; pillows—when there are any—the same as the mattresses; covering—old coats, pieces of cloth, anything. There are so many flies everywhere. The children have a way of covering themselves entirely. I have come to the conclusion it is done as much to keep the flies off as to keep warm. This habit of covering gives the room an appearance of rag heaps. These rag heaps are not uncommon in Russia. You see them at railway stations, by the wayside. All I can think of when I can see these people huddled up is a bundle of old, soiled rags. One is just helpless here. No medicines, no supplies, little water, no clothes, no linen, not enough food, and not the right kind for the sick, lots and lots of flies, persons without energy and initiative.

"The reason I came so late to the hospital yesterday—the doctor at Sorochinskoye told the doctor (?) of our place to send all his dysentery and rephutis cases to S. Ten of them were huddled into two typical Russian carts and taken to the station the night before last. You never know just when a train is coming, so you just go and wait until one comes. However, yesterday morning we learned that the children were still at our station and that they had been refused transportation. It was a mistake to take those children without permission from the railway. It was finally arranged to send them by wagon. You cannot picture the sight it was—those ten children (buddles of rags) strewn about the room at the station. The odor was vile. Of course, that was natural, for some of the children were unable to walk alone and their disease made it impossible to avoid accidents causing odor. Thin coverings, you cannot call it clothing—were a horrible sight, dirty, wet, ragged. They haven't the slightest idea of sanitation, nor have they anything to try to make it sanitary, although I believe a little more energy would help, but they are mostly too weak. Much bread with grass is still eaten. We have seen it here in many homes. No wonder there is bowel disturbance. In spite of what I see now I cannot picture how dreadful it must have been during the winter. I must close for we have an opportunity to send mail to Sorochinskoye. Schools have no books, no pencils, no paper!—consequently school is a rest house. Best wishes to you all. Hope you can stir up something for these poor children."

CROP PROSPECTS IN RUSSIA.

Homer L. Morris, who with Edna Morris returned from Russia on Eighth Month 4th, reports that the Russian crop will not be large enough to feed all her people next winter.

He says: "Just before leaving Russia Sixth Month 20th, we made a trip of inspection of our district. The seed grain was growing nicely and the prospect for the harvest was very good. Since we left Russia there has not been sufficient rainfall. A cable received from the field since our arrival states:

"No rain, complete crop failure some sections. Famine will continue though in smaller area than last year. Crops excellent in some sections. Russian government estimate total harvest shows 35 per cent. more grain than last year. This year's crop in our area is 60 per cent. better than last year in some spots, in others total failure. Even the best areas yield far below normal."

"Even with a good harvest there would not have been enough food because of the very small acreage planted. In spite of all efforts of the government to supply seed, the peasants were not able to get sufficient seed. Because of the shortage of horses the villages farthest from the railroad were not able to haul the seed which was allotted to them by the government. In other cases, they were too weak to plant the seed without horses which had died or been eaten.

"In our district about 50 per cent. of the peasants would have enough grain to carry them through the coming winter; about 25 per cent. would have sufficient grain to carry them for three or four months, and about 25 per cent. will not have any grain for the coming winter. This will make it necessary to continue the feeding program over next winter.

"It is estimated that about 100,000 refugees are moving back to the famine district. These are the people who fled last winter in search of food. With the report of a good harvest they are now moving back. Next winter these people will present a serious problem, because they will arrive too late to plant grain and there will not be sufficient food in the district for them.

"The need for clothes is almost as great as the need for food. Next winter this need will be even greater than it was last winter. Ordinarily, they plant a great deal of flax. This year there was no flax planted in the district. They have been compelled to kill their sheep, so that they will have wool with which to make clothes. The Russians say that they have eaten their clothes; that is, they have been compelled to sell their clothes in order to purchase food.

"When we went from Moscow to Sorochinskoye in Second Month it took ten days to make the trip. When we returned in Sixth Month it took about four days. This indicates the improvement that has taken place in the transportation system. As a result of this, the food which is being sent from America is now reaching the famine district much more quickly than during the winter."

VISITORS FROM THE OTHER SIDE OF THE POND.

We welcome visitors eagerly in Poland and last First-day it rained visitors, a brisk shower of Americans. We entertained forty American students to tea at Foksal, the palace where some of our workers live in a flat loaned to the Society of Friends by Princess Radzywil and are waited upon by the Princess's ancient retainers. The retainers welcome visitors, too, and tea was served by them on the wide verandah overlooking the garden.

After tea the students were shown samples of peasant embroidery and bought a quantity to send home to their friends. A Mission worker's duties in Poland are many and various and on First-day the duty of mannequin was added to that of publicity.

"Say, Mam," said a voice at my side as I held up a tray cloth—"Say, Mam, I'd take that jumper right now for my li'l girl—I figure she's just your size."

I parted with the jumper with a pang; it was one I was particularly fond of.

"Mam," another hand fingered the sleeve that was no longer mine—"have you more jumpers like that one?"

"This one is sold, but I can order another for you. What size?"

He scratched his head, puzzled.

"Well, I guess you've got me fixed there—but she weighs 120 pounds."

A third prospective buyer pushed him aside as I booked the order for a jumper for a girl weighing 120 pounds.

"I want a jumper like that for my mother, but I guess I didn't bring her dimensions," he said regretfully. He chose instead a hand towel.

The students stayed with us much longer than they intended and left us with the satisfactory feeling that at least a small proportion of the American people would be made to realize the needs of Poland.

CHARLES J. RHOADS—J. HENRY SCATTERGOOD:—

Dear Friends:—I am writing to you in order to follow up the suggestion that arose as we came away from the meeting in Twelfth Street last Fourth-day.

I then mentioned the problems being faced by the new National Christian Council for China of which I have been asked to become secretary. Its hope is to unite in a far more intimate fellowship, if not in organic union, the various Christian bodies in China. This is to be done under Chinese leadership in the main and if I go it will be as a colleague to two or more Chinese Christians. Thus a step towards the development of a truly indigenous Church is being taken at the same time as one towards closer union. Both are very significant and hopeful.

It is strange to me that a Quaker should be chosen as an officer of such an organization, but I put this down to the fact that already it is seen that the Spirit is more important than the forms under which unity can be achieved, and also to an openness of mind towards the position we take on war and other questions greater than we usually find in ecclesiastical bodies in the West.

This being so it would be a grave responsibility to refuse, even though one is called away from other work that opens up most urgently. It also leads me to feel that Friends in America may be particularly glad to further this work by their gifts. In the present very serious condition of the missionary societies, the financial position of this new venture is exceptionally precarious. From an English Friend I have already a promise of $5,000. I have wondered if it might be laid on the hearts of one or more American Friends to do likewise, not necessarily of course as to amount, but in some way to help what is so promising an adventure of faith. Such help would not carry any conditions actual or implied that would fetter the free expression of Christian truth by the Chinese Church as led by the Spirit. Yet it might help them to realize how deeply Friends appreciate their desire to think out for themselves the meaning of the Christian faith and to apply it fearlessly in personal and public life.

I hope this would not become a burden to anyone. It is but a suggestion which may find one here and there keen to discover a way of helping this great nation in her struggle towards righteousness and peace.

Your warm friend,
(Signed) HENRY HOGKIN.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Germantown, Eighth Month 10th, in the afternoon, with the average attendance of about eighty-five persons. The total membership of the Quarter is about 670.

A spirit of worship soon spread over the Meeting, and the living silence found expression in prayer and ministry, that seemed to reach the hearts of those gathered. We are always ready to welcome Visiting Friends, especially those who are drawn to us in the love of the Gospel. Two Friends of the Yearly Meeting's Visitation Committee were acceptably present.

The four Queries usually read at this time were answered. Verbal reports covering the recent work of the Representative Meeting and of the Committee under appointment to assist smaller meetings, were listened to with interest and satisfaction. There was introduced the subject of changing the time of holding the Quarterly Meeting as many find it difficult to observe the present hour of gathering at 3.30 P. M. A Committee was appointed to carefully review the situation under the feeling that it is the part of the Meeting to do what it can to meet the wishes and convenience of the membership as a whole in this respect.

The holding of a future session of the Quarterly Meeting at Frankford was suggested as a possible means of stimulating a wider interest and attendance, but no action was taken.

Following the Meeting for Discipline, supper was served as usual in the Committee-room, which has become a distinctive feature and exerts a cementing influence in our corporate life.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING was held on the 14th and 15th. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders on the afternoon of the 14th was the usual size of the summer meeting and was an occasion of favor. Besides the Queries which come in course, two matters of more than common interest claimed the Meeting's consideration.

The general meeting on the 15th was attended by 250 or more. Two members of the Yearly Meeting's Visitation Committee were helpfully present. A Friend present, who might have used a different method of expression, said that there were fourteen vocal offerings and fifteen silences.

The Quarterly Meeting has a long list of recorded Ministers and of those often engaged in vocal ministry not recorded, so that oftentimes, when several of these are heard on the same occasion, the after picture of the meeting seems to lack in the presentation of any one great central truth. On this occasion it was different, for though so many as fourteen were heard, the session was not a long one, and the same train of thought and religious exercise characterized several of the offerings.

The business session in the afternoon offered several matters for consideration; one of the most serious being a proposition to give in some way to the Overseers the privilege of attendance at the Meetings of Ministers and Elders. While this subject may require Discipline revision and so belong to the Yearly Meeting, it was felt right to appoint a Committee of the Quarterly Meeting to give it attention.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING.—The Meeting held at Coatesville, Eighth Month 18th, was attended by a goodly number of its members, as well as a few visitors. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders convened at nine o'clock with a very slim attendance.

In the general Quarterly Meeting there was a period of reverential silence, after which there was considerable vocal expression in testimony and prayer.

The circumstance of the rich young man making inquiry of our Saviour as to what he lacked in order to inherit eternal life was lovingly dwelt upon; it has its present-day application where there is so much to dissipate and lead away from the main issues of life as it should be.

In the business session, there was little out of the usual routine. The answers to the third Query brought out a lively testimony in regard to the ministry; those too, who do not preach by the spoken word have a responsibility which should be fully recognized, for the lives and conversation of consistent Christians are as sermons.

The request of the Preparative Meeting at Marshallton to be discontinued was acceded to, the members being transferred to Caln; it is hoped, however, that the First-day morning meetings may not be given up.

The Meeting over, a toothsome luncheon well served, was partaken of, and the summer session of Caln Quarter is now a pleasant memory.

H.

At our late Yearly Meeting a few delegates were appointed to attend a conference of religious bodies, who, by their creed or practice, opposed war as contrary to the teachings of Jesus.

This conference met at Bluffton, Ohio, the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh of Eighth Month with all of our delegates present; the total number of those who registered was one hundred, but many came in from the surrounding country, to attend the sittings; people from Boston to California and from Saskatchewan to Texas, were present.

Those who were there felt it to be a great privilege, it is seldom such harmony of view exists in any body as was manifested in this conference.

Christian brotherhood pervaded the session, shown because there was an evident realization that all felt called to a more strict following of the teachings of our Master, than is commonly practised by the professing Christian world, while the courtesy and hospitality of our hosts filled the intervening hours with profit.

The following topics were presented: it is hoped the papers may appear in these columns for our readers:

The Basis of the Christian Testimony against War; Christian Service; Obligations of the Christian in Times of National Danger; Christianity and Patriotism; The Heroic Appeal of Christian Service; Methods of Developing Peace Sentiment—Through the Church and Sunday School, Through Public Agitation and Legislation, Through Schools and Colleges; The Key to a Warless World; How Young People Can Further the Peace Testimony; The World Outlook for Permanent Peace.

At the close of the Conference, a delegate from Saskatchewan presented the condition of Mennonites in southern Russia, some twenty-five hundred of whom already have passports out of the country; to provide for their transportation and care is a situation similar to the case of the Doukhobours some years ago. There will be some one in our section of the country in the near future, probably, to present the needs and some plan for relief.

MEETING AT ARNEY'S MOUNT, N. J.—On First-day, Sixth Month 25th, a meeting was held at "The Mount," Arney's Mount, N. J., by Orthodox Friends, with a large attendance. An inspiring prayer and several sermons showed the spirit of Friends was still there,—that spirit that did so much toward making this section of Burlington County in the past, when most of the farms were owned and lived on by Friends.

On Seventh Month 2nd, the Liberal Friends held a meeting with a good attendance. Isaac Wilson, the only speaker, gave a message of love.

It is well that interest can still be felt for these old meetings which in former times were filled to overflowing. Through the active interest of some Friends, whose ancestors lie in the adjoining burying-ground, a fund has been raised, the interest to be used for the perpetual up-keep of the burying-ground, lawn and house. Could this be done for all old grounds, wherein lie the pioneer Friends and others, so they could be made pleasant, attractive spots for surrounding neighborhoods, how much better it would be than the lonely, neglected appearance so many now present. Thus could be shown love and respect to those who made it possible to have the present comfortable farms and homes. "The Mount" meeting-house was built in 1775.—REBECCA N. HOUGH.

FIFTY THOUSAND HEAR SPEECHES WARNING OF MILITARISM'S MENACE.—Berlin, Seventh Month 30th—Fifty thousand people gathered before the former Imperial Palace at noon today and listened to warnings that the militarism responsible for the great war was not yet dead in Germany. The meeting was one of many international "No-More-War" demonstrations.

The speakers asserted that a revival of the German monarchy meant renaissance of militarism, maintaining that monarchism was a camouflage for war preparations to recover losses by force. The addresses were interrupted by cries of "Hoch Republik."

Demands for Germany's entrance into the League of Nations and reform of education in the spirit of republicanism and peace were cheered. There was no counter demonstration.—From Philadelphia Ledger.

THE generation which is now coming on should develop a very much keener sense than has characterized the past both as to how money is earned or secured and as to how it is spent. The application of Christianity to the getting and spending of money is one of the fields which the Christian church has yet to face squarely. The acquiring and spending of money was a deep concern in the mind of Jesus and He found that more people lost their way because of the temptations in regard to money than perhaps through any other source. A careful study of how we are getting our money and of stewardship of the possessions which we have though they may be limited, should enter into the program of any Young Friends' organization for the coming year.—CLARENCE E. PICKETT.

"At least 1,000,000 people are living in the Near East today who would have perished had it not been for American relief." These significant words appear in the report of the Near East Relief Commission to Congress. Could the $50,000,000 which the American people have contributed for this work have been better spent! Fifty dollars to save a life is certainly a good investment. All whose contributions have saved or helped to save a human life are as truly heroes as if they rescued a child from drowning or from fire. No Carnegie medals will be awarded but the inward joy which they feel must be greater than any award could bring them. Thousands of American people are foster parents of little sweet-faced children in Syria and Armenia whom they will never see. Though the worst is over these little orphans, more than 100,000 of them, are still dependent upon Near East Relief for the necessities of life. Kind-hearted Americans must "carry on" a little longer until native agencies are able to give these children proper care.

THE delegates from London Yearly Meeting to the Five Years' Meeting are: John H. Barlow, Ex-Clerk of London Yearly Meeting, and Clerk of the London Conference, and his wife, Mabel C. Barlow; Barrow and Geraldine S. Cadbury and their daughters, Dorothy and Geraldine Galt; M. Catherine Albright, Henry T. Gillett and J. Rowntree Gillett.

It is probable that Herbert Corder will also attend. Many American Friends recall pleasant interviews with him here just prior to the London All Friends' Conference two years ago. It is also to be hoped that Corder Catchpool and wife, Gwen Catchpool, as also T. Edmund Harvey will be of the number. These Friends are much more than names to many Americans.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE is redolent of Quaker memories, which have often been recalled in biography and sketches of the neighborhood and its events. In a local paper Theodor Roscoe has written five short love stories of Buckinghamshire worthies which have been reprinted in a little book published by King & Hutchings, Uxbridge. Two of the sketches relate to Quaker wooings, those of Thomas Ellwood and William Penn. Poor Thomas! His hopes must often have risen as his opportunities to converse with Guliema Springett were multiplied; but in the end he had the grace and good sense to see that "she was reserved" for another. The story of his subsequent proposal to Mary Ellis is briefly but effectively told. There is not much that can be related of the actual wooing of Guliema by William Penn; but the writer, in her six pages on this subject, creates the right atmosphere. The other stories relate to Richard Brinsley Sheridan at Burnham Beeches, Benjamin Disraeli at Bradenham and the poet William Cowper.

JAPAN NOTES.—The marriage of Alice Lewis to Dr. William Pearson took place in the auditorium of the Friends' Girls' School in Tokio on Sixth Month 30th. Gilbert Bowles and wife, George Braithwaite and wife and several Japanese Friends occupied facing seats. Parents' places were taken by the Binfords and the Hirakawas. The meeting was felt to be a favored occasion. Vocal part was taken by Lettice Braithwaite, Gilbert Bowles, Ozaki San from Takahagi and Thomas Jones. Edith Newlin read the certificate.

After the meeting, the company went over to the Bowles' house and lawn for refreshments. In the evening, the mission gave a dinner to the bride and groom in the newly rearranged dining-room of the teachers' residence. Margaret Rhoads arranged this part of the proceedings. The table was beautifully decorated with gladioli and sweet peas, and the edibles were altogether worthy of the occasion.

Next morning the newly married couple held a reception at the teachers' residence for the pupils of the School, who could not be permitted to the meeting on account of lack of room. On First-day, Seventh Month 2nd, a meeting was held at the same place to which all of the members of the meeting were invited. (It must be remembered that building operations are in such a posture that no meeting-house is available.)

The cellar for the Jones' residence is done, and the builders were expected to be at work by the second week in Seventh Month. The money for this work had been received, and the state of exchange is such that it realized 942 yen "profit."

IN its review of "Christian Life, Faith and Thought in the Society of Friends," the Expository Times says: "Perhaps one must be a Friend to obtain the full benefit of it, but to enjoy it one has only to be a student of religious life. The literary charm cannot be missed; the biographical interest is very strong; but the essential worth of the book is in its testimony to the fact of true religion."

THE Young Friends' Conference, recently held at Richmond, Indiana, was attended by 316 persons, registered from nearly all parts of the United States, with one from China, one from Canada and one from Cuba.

WHY NO CREED?

When our daily papers give news items with flashy head lines on some mooted theological question, what does it portend? We would like to think that it marks a period in newspaper history that stands for advancement.

Each may have his own opinion, for ourselves we incline strongly to the conviction that it stands for nothing more than the most modern contention of wits concerning church cleavage; newspaper readers are interested to learn how each party gains or loses in argument, and care very little, if at all, for the real essence of religion which should, and probably does to a great extent, underlie the controversy.

The present is a time of no little unrest in doctrinal discussion in the churches. The cleavage is not between the different sects. It is probable that if the major Protestant churches were merged to-morrow, a year hence there would be little to distinguish in doctrinal belief or even in practice one from another. The real division is between classes within the sects. It does not set a Baptist against a Methodist, so much as the Baptist against the Baptist and the Methodist against the Methodist. It is not as heated and outspoken as church contentions have often been in the past, but it is none the less here, and is growing at no slow pace. It places in all the disturbed denominations thoughtful communicants in one of two classes, differently named to suit different originating causes. They may be called primitive and modern; or conservative and liberal; or literalists and free-constructionists; or orthodox and rational; or evangelical and radical. To put it in a nutshell—"One is based upon supernaturalism, the other upon rationalism. The one requires absolute belief in a faith revealed through an inerrant Bible; the other seeks to harmonize itself with science and a developing civilization. The one holds that religion is essentially individual and static, the other that it is social and evolutionary. The one views it as a preparation for existence beyond the grave, the other as a means of bettering the world here."

At the Baptist Convention held some months ago in Indianapolis, the distinction between classes was made very evident. The discussion at times became so tense that it was an easy task for the reporter to gather readable copy for the ordinary news column and for the editor to fill his column with matter that would hold the attention of an ordinary reader to the end. One such editorial has had a second reading by the present writer within the past few days. It impresses one with how human we all are and how much alike we are if we will but neglect certain surface and minor peculiarities.

The most modern tendency of all this is to force upon the church a creed. The editor of a church paper, himself justly classed with the literalists, has printed his creed as follows. It meets with full endorsement on the part of some, but is opposed by many who cannot in justice to truth as they see it, yield their consent. "We believe that the Bible is God's Word; that it was written by men Divinely inspired, and that it has supreme authority in all matters of faith and conduct. We believe its history, its miracles, its doctrines and its prophecies. We believe that Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, was conceived of the Holy Ghost and born of the Virgin Mary. We believe, with the Apostle Peter, that Jesus Christ bore our sins in His own body on the tree. We believe in the visible return of our Lord to this earth."

A widely known preacher gives this as his creed: "I know no Christ but the Christ of the Bible. Of His holy person seven essential facts are set forth therein. These are: His supernatural birth, His sinless life, His vicarious death, His bodily resurrection, His glorious ascension, His present indwelling of and lordship over the believer and His triumphant return."

Wherein does this interest Friends? In this. As the spirit resulting in the French Revolution planted seeds long ago which were slow but sure in their germination, so may this present spirit of controversy which has so completely gripped the Protestant church to-day, soon include the Society of Friends; even now threatening signs are easily discernible on the horizon.

The question of creed at once suggests to the Friend the much-discussed letter of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes. We need to remember in the first place that this now historic document was never given forth with the thought back of it, that it should stand as a creed. Fox was in agreement with all that was stated in the declaration and that squared with the accepted belief of the Protestant churches of his day. He may have seemed to some of his time to have lost sight of these essential Gospel truths in his earnest conviction of the largeness of the new truth that he would have the world accept—the new truth that Christ within was the Word of God.

To this he called the multitudes, and to this as to no other fundamental principle the Society which sprang from his preaching was committed from the first.

If to-day an essential faith is to consist in a statement of belief in a formulated creed and a declaration to stand by it, we have failed as Quakers of the George Fox type. Those, not of us, who know us historically, who can not agree with us on many points tell us this and with no little emphasis. With the Friends, they say, the conviction must come from within, no theological opinion coming from without can answer.

Now to very many it would seem that the first step to lead to this would be for Friends to subject their ministers, other church officers, prominent and influential workers, and maybe the entire membership to a series of questions, on the answers to which would depend their standing.

George Fox recognized that a Society without an organization behind it might soon turn liberty into license, and we know that in the last and ripest years of his life he surrendered much time to the development of a Church discipline, which, though it experienced a notable decline in the eighteenth century, had nevertheless an element of real life in it and has survived.

Spirit-led Elders and Ministers were to confer together, labor together, and be mutually helpful as a class and as individuals one to another. They were not to assume to themselves dictatorship. The principle was made clear that they were but a part of the body, in no sense the head, and with all others who believed constituted the true and only priesthood of believers. As we have gotten away in thought and practice from this basic principle, other measures have been substituted, and the Church finds itself to-day in places almost ready to measure a man's fitness for church service by his assent to a formulated creed. God's witness is ignored. The Voice within, if heeded, is made secondary, and the doctrine which George Fox promulgated as his great message in large measure has been lost.

THE CANTONESE AND THE POLITICAL MIX-UP IN CHINA.

WM. W. CADBURY

A British Admiral declared before the Washington Conference met that "there is only one problem and it is the problem of the coming conflict between the two halves of the human race, the white and the colored; it will be in the Pacific. In this conflict Asia could draw upon 1000 millions of the colored races as against some 500 millions of the white people."

"Undoubtedly, the scene has shifted from Europe to the far east and the Pacific. The problems of the Pacific are, to my mind, the world problems for the next fifty years or more" are the words of General Smuts, and John Hay declared years ago that: "China is the key to the future of the world."

The truth of these statements is evident to all who have followed the proceedings of the recent conference in Washington.

If, then, the Chinese, numbering one-fourth of the population of the globe, are to be such an important factor in the history of the world, it behooves us to consider for a moment forces at work in this great nation.

The Empire itself covers an area one-sixth larger than that of the Continental possessions of the United States and the population is more than three times that of our own country.

The history of China begins in the third millennium before Christ, but with the reign of the Emperor Yü in the Ha dynasty in 2205 B. C., there is a transition from the legendary to the historical period.

But to Europe China was almost unknown until Marco Polo made his remarkable journeys to the Court of Kublai Khan in the thirteenth century, and from that time on China became of ever greater importance in the eyes of the West. It should be recalled that Columbus was endeavoring to find his way to China when he accidentally hit on the shores of America.

The history of the nation is full of romance,—one great dynasty follows after another until in 1911 the Emperor abdicated and the republic was declared. Sun Yat Sen, the first President, and the leaders in this revolution were Cantonese, and from this time on the influence of Canton has been of growing importance in the counsels of the nations.

Who are these Cantonese? They are the inhabitants of the province of Kwangtung, in the southeastern corner of the Empire. This province is the richest in China. It is watered by three large rivers, the East, the West, and the North, converging at the capitol city of Canton and forming there a great delta with its fertile plains.

The population of the province is estimated at 32,000,000 or about 320 persons to the square mile.

These people are shorter in stature than their brothers north of the Yangtze. In a recent study I found that the people of Kwangtung province average only 5 feet 4 inches, while the Chinese north of the Yangtze average 5 feet 6 inches, or more.

Ages ago the ancestors of the Cantonese came as conquerors to South China. They drove the Aborigines before them and became the dominant race. These Aborigines, known as the Miaotze, are still to be found in the mountains where they lead a more or less independent existence.

Later, another people came from the North, chiefly from Fukien Province, and these were known as the Hakkas. They also were an inferior race, and were allowed to remain, but as subjects to the dominant Cantonese people.

The superiority over these two tribes may have much to do with the fact that the Cantonese are such a proud and progressive people.

Before the tenth century there were settlements of these Chinese on the Coast of Africa and from the two districts, San Ning and San Wui of this province, come 90 per cent of all Chinese who have emigrated to Canada, the United States, Mexico, the West Indies and South America.

It is chiefly the Cantonese who constitute the important Chinese element in the population of Australia, New Zealand, the East Indies and the Malay Peninsula. They are to be found in Africa and Honolulu.

It is estimated that more than 9,000,000 Chinese live outside the limits of the Empire and almost all of them are from Kwangtung.

Wherever they have gone they have proved themselves an industrious, peaceable folk, attending to their own business.

Shanghai, which is rapidly becoming the greatest foreign settlement in China, owes its present commercial importance to the Cantonese merchants there, and its trade is but an expansion of that which started in Canton.

In the Philippine Islands there are some 70 or 80 thousand Chinese, all from South China—Canton and Amoy. According to Walter Robb, in "Asia", among the 10,000,000 Filipinos this handful of Chinese carry on 80 per cent. of the commerce and industry of the Islands. There are 3000 Chinese firms in Manila and 7000 in the provinces.

In Malaysia it is said that 90 per cent. of the mines and estates are in the hands of Chinese from the south of China.

Canton was the first city of China opened to trade with the West. The modern department stores which have grown up in the last two decades in Hongkong, Shanghai and Canton, are entirely financed and managed by Cantonese merchants. These are known as The Taai San, Chan Kwong and Wing One Companies.

Canton was the first city of China to tear down her ancient walls and build in their places broad thoroughfares through which automobiles now travel.

It was here that the first hospital was established by Peter Parker in 1835 and the first Protestant Christian was baptized.

One of the remarkable features associated with the initiative and progressiveness of the Cantonese, lies in the fact of their living in a sub-tropical country. No evidence exists of that languor which so often appears among tropical peoples. The Cantonese dialect itself attests to this fact, for final consonants are clearly pronounced and not dropped from the speech, as is the case of Shanghai and generally in tropical countries.

In the South Sea Isles, where the white man grows indolent and sickly under the effects of the tropical sun, and the natives live a hand-to-mouth existence, the thrifty and hardy Cantonese settles down, raises a family and carries on the banking and business of the community.

No wonder then that when the revolution of 1911 was led and organized by Cantonese it was bound to succeed.

It is needless to recount the long struggle that has been going forward since that day. When one considers the forces at work there is no wonder that a settlement has not yet been attained. As Alfred Sze, Chinese Minister at Washington, recently declared: "China is making the change from a social democracy, which has existed for ages, to a political democracy." It signifies the merging of the ideas of the west with those of old China.

Patriotism in China is not jingoism but a love of one's own people, without hatred of others, declared Admiral Tsai, so the present conflict is not inspired by an intense hatred between leaders of the north and south, but, unlike the American war of the Rebellion, we have in China now a truly "civil" war going on.

It is of interest to note that of 95 delegates to the Washington Conference who came over with Admiral Tsai, 74 were from the Southern Provinces, although appointed by the Peking Government.

Let us not forget that it required six years to prepare the American Constitution, when the population of the United States was but two-and-a-half millions. Sixty years later the question of state rights was still unsettled. China is dealing with a country of 400,000,000 people, 95 per cent. of whom are uneducated.

In 1912, after the Republic had been established, a most enlightening and progressive government was formed in the Province of Canton.

General Chen, who at the present writing is in control at Canton, was the military governor, and the most capable and well-fitted men were placed at the heads of the Departments of Justice, Education, Public Health, etc.

In 1913 it became evident that President Yuan Shi Kai was not in sympathy with this progressive movement in the South. There was a revolt and the leaders in the South were driven out and a servant of the Peking Government was placed in power.

All preparations were worked out for Yuan Shi Kai to assume the throne of the Empire. The Cantonese discovered that they had been deceived and so definitely separated from the Peking authorities. This separation only became complete in 1920 when Sun Yat Sen and General Chen returned to Canton, having driven out General Mok, who represented the military leaders of the North.

THE Friends' Quarterly Examiner finds its way into the home libraries of several Friends here; it is carefully read by others who find it in our Friends' libraries; the fact remains, however, that there are many, very many, among us who are the losers of much that is worth while by not making it a rule to regularly examine it as soon as it comes to the library table. The following is a brief review of the last number from The Friend (London):—

Friends will be interested in the first article, for it is the address given by Arthur Rowntree at Dublin Yearly Meeting, under the title "Education for Freedom." "Character training," said our Friend, "means the gradual substitution of intelligent self-guidance for rule of thumb; not a sudden pitch-forking into chaos at the beginning of adolescence. True education results in freedom and independence of thought, a wide outlook on life and a strong sense of the difference between convention and reality." The subject of "Co-education" is dealt with in a suggestive article by Lydia S. Graham, headmistress and lately acting head of Sidcot—a co-educational school—in the absence of Dr. Lean. Discussing first education generally, she describes four adjustments that the growing child needs to make,—to reality, to society, to parenthood or potential parenthood and to the Infinite. With much cogency she argues that "co-education, whether it be at home or school, makes it possible for most boys and girls to make these all-important adjustments, or rather to begin to make them, in a natural, easy and successful way." John William Graham's history of the struggle between Conscription and Conscience is sympathetically reviewed by T. Edmund Harvey in an article in which, from his own intimate knowledge and experience of the subject, he adds not a little to our information with regard to the events of those terrible times. He tells an amusing story of an interview with a high official of the War Office who thought he must have completely overthrown all C. O.'s on Scriptural grounds, by the New Testament quotation, "Fear God: honour the King." "How can they believe that if they won't obey the King's regulations?" "And I dare say," added the great man, "when I can find time, I shall be able to find a few more things here for them,—in the New Testament, that is!" Pilate's letter to Seneca, the work of John W. Harvey, is an able and ingenious effort in interpreting the mind of the Roman Procurator with regard to the great event in which he was an unwilling tool of Jewish hatred. Other articles are by L. Violet Holdsworth, John Edward Southall (on "Life at Bootham Fifty Years Ago"), and J. Aubrey Rees (on William Stout, a Quaker grocer of the seventeenth century). The glowing description by a Viennese lady of "a trip to Avalon" will move the reader by its generous appreciation of English hospitality to the foreigner.

MORNING THOUGHTS.

A white sail on the far horizon's rim
Where blue of wave meets softer blue of sky,
Just as the mists of night are growing dim,
And one fair rosy cloud is floating by.

When the great sun comes with his glowing beam,
"Like a strong man," rejoicing in his power—
Across the sea—the many vessels seem
To hide the sail which marked that early hour.

One pure thought in the heart that turns to Thee
At early dawn—O Father! may be mine,
Like that white sail far out upon the sea,
Before the crowding things of life combine
To shut away Thy wide Horizon Line.

THE BLUFFTON CONFERENCE.

The National Conference of Religious Bodies who hold that Peace between Nations can be maintained by following the teachings of Jesus, held at Bluffton, Ohio, Eighth Month 4th-7th, was an inspiring gathering.

Thanksgiving surely must fill all hearts at the accomplishment of this Conference at Bluffton, Ohio! We Quaker pacifists are now assured for all time that we have in the field true collaborators for Peace! Never again can we speak of our peace testimony as though we as Friends had exclusive right thereto when we know of the long-time devotion of our Mennonite and Dunkard brethren who have suffered untold hardships for this testimony as precious to them as to us! From the opening session in the First Mennonite Church to the closing in the chapel of Bluffton College (Mennonite), the way was marked by such devotion, earnestness, consecration and sincerity as to elicit our deepest thanks. The cordial welcome accorded us on our arrival at Bluffton maintained its high-water mark throughout; the homes freely offered and the courtesies extended left an impression of whole-hearted hospitality not soon forgotten. We left Bluffton with a sense of fellowship hitherto unknown. May it increase and deepen with the years!

Now as to the Conference itself. There were one hundred members registered from a distance, not including the large numbers attending from nearby. Of those registered 57 were Mennonites, 31 Friends, 5 Brethren or Dunkards, 2 Schwenkfelders, 2 Congregationalists, 1 Christian, 1 Reformed Church in United States and 1 Methodist. The poll of States revealed seventeen States and two provinces in Canada.

Of the Friends twelve were members of the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, each meeting sending five regularly accredited delegates. Others were from New York, New England, Baltimore, California and Indiana Meetings.

As the call carefully set forth, the object of the Conference was two-fold:—To come together for a season of conference and prayer, and to discuss ways and means of furthering the cause of peace. It was not expected that any permanent organization would be effected. In fact, we were admonished over and over not to think of accomplishing great things here, but rather out of the inspiration gained to go back home to work with renewed vigor—to be touched "as with a live coal from His holy altar" and be purified and consecrated anew. How inadequate are words to convey the spirit of this assembly! Truly it was a holy place, where there were heart-revealing and soul-searchings, where the oil of consecration made easier the way of the future.

At the opening session the evening of Sixth-day, Eighth Month 4th, Elmer E. S. Johnson, of Hereford, Pa., a Schwenkfelder, declared "If there ever was a time when the Christian people were faced with a challenge to make impossible a repetition of the late war, it is now." This was the key-note of the conference. President S. K. Mosiman, of Bluffton College, in his address of welcome, likewise declared: "If Christian people had held as diligently to their real purpose as in building up church organizations, we would now have the Age of Peace." His delicately expressed greeting was: "We are happy to be your hosts, as you come from the east, the west and across the sea. We trust you may become a part of us as you spend these days with us, and when you leave may a part of you remain, while you take a part of us with you." Wilbur K. Thomas, in stating the object of the conference told of the greater knowledge and closer relationships growing out of the war, which made desirable a gathering of the denominations believing war to be inconsistent with the teachings of Jesus.

S. E. Allgier, of West Liberty, Ohio, who will be remembered as serving with his son in the Friends' Reconstruction Unit in France, told of "The Basis of the Christian Testimony Against War." During this and later sessions, greetings were received from far-distant groups, wishing God-speed to this venture. One came from the Russian Mennonites in the Volga Valley; a cablegram from the Friends' Unit in Russia; a letter from the Kremmer Bruder in Kansas; also letters from Michigan, Pennsylvania and Cleveland, Ohio.

The morning sessions were preceded by real devotional meetings of an hour, wherein in Quaker fashion each was encouraged to bear testimony as the Spirit might lead. A delegate from South Dakota led the first, and it is noteworthy that both here and in the business sessions our women (Friends) took part and were respectfully heard, though no other women than ours broke the silence, indeed there were no other women delegates than ours!

In discussing the subject for Seventh-day morning, "Christian Service—Its Obligations and Opportunities," the speakers were respectively Mennonite, Brethren and Friend, one of each also being heard in the afternoon, when "Methods of Developing Peace Sentiment" was the theme. In this way, as perhaps in no other, was shown the real unity of purpose. Sub-divisions of the subject were discussed by each speaker. H. P. Krehbiel, of Newton, Kansas, dealt with "Obligations of the Christian in Times of National Danger" and urged that Christ rather than man be obeyed, declaring that as in darkness there is most need of light, so in war-time is the great need of the Christ spirit being made active and effective. J. M. Henry, of Washington, D. C., in discussing "Christianity and Patriotism" declared the supreme hour has come to unite Christian forces in the propagation of the principles of Peace, and dwelt on the fundamental need of Christian education, not only for members of our denominations, but for the world outside. "Patriotism," he said, "is not a program of government or life, but an attitude of mind and state of being." Referring to applied Christianity, he, as well as others, spoke of the work done by Friends abroad in child-feeding, but such tributes were discouraged by Wilbur K. Thomas, who felt "Friends do not want praise for doing what was our clear duty to do, and which we would not have been enabled to do without your aid in money and men, for 59 Mennonite and Brethren boys were with us." "The Heroic Appeal of Christian Service" was discussed by Alexander C. Purdy of Earlham College, Ind., who stressed Christian love as applied to everyday problems—"The way of Christ to life is heroic in the best sense. Internationally, racially and industrially, Christianity has not been tried," he said, and emphasized the need of leadership here.

In introducing the afternoon topic the thought was brought out that the primal cause of war was wrong information, and therefore education of the right sort was necessary. N. E. Byers, of Bluffton College, discussed how the church and First-day School might aid in bringing this about, and deplored the lack in the past of a program of Christian ethics. The need of good writers and speakers was emphasized. "Christ has given words," he said, "the peace message to these small denominations; had it been given to the Methodists and Baptists, I wonder if they would have done more with it than have we." He urged in bearing this message that it be not burdened with non-essentials. In considering how Public Agitation and Legislation may develop peace, I. S. Edgar Nicholson, of Washington, D. C., declared first of all this reform must be centered and grounded in religious conviction. He urged that the use of the press and "movies" be not overlooked, in promoting the gospel of brotherhood, however important legislation looms. W. J. Swigart, Huntingdon, Pa., in speaking of Schools and Colleges as avenues for the dissemination of peace sentiment, urged less of war in school histories. "Christianity," he said, "is Christ's extension into history, and humanity's history is too often written in humanity's blood." Charles E. Tebbetts, of Whittier, Cal., called attention, optimistically, to various publications, periodicals, and printed articles favoring peace and urged every effort be made to increase the list. William Bishop of Philadelphia, Pa., felt there was too generally an under-emphasis of the Divine and an over-emphasis of the physical, and declared if ten students out of every college would live as did Christ, war would disappear in two generations.

Elijah E. Kresge, of Allentown, Pa., in his address on Seventh-day evening on "The Key to a Warless World," declared "Jesus Christ holds the key to this as to every other problem, and he took the first step when he said 'Our Father, The spirit of love between brothers precludes war. What is wrong? Has Jesus failed or have we? The Christianity of the Church is not the Christianity of the Gospel.' It is clear we must come back to the simple religion of Jesus."

On First-day morning members of the Conference divided attendance among the various Mennonite Churches in and near Bluffton. The First Mennonite Church was in a measure a Friends' Meeting since a Friend from Baltimore and one from Philadelphia were the speakers, the pastor announcing a devotional silence from which might come messages.

The afternoon was devoted to the discussion of "How Young People Can Further the Peace Testimony." Six young men took part in this, whose experiences in camp as C. O.'s and as Reconstruction Workers abroad had more strongly grounded them in the peace faith. A strong Christian pacifist position was taken by a Schwenkfelder who on the command: "Thou shalt not kill" declared he would stand through life. Two of our Quaker boys were united that the lack of peace education in Friends' schools, so noticeable in the past, should be remedied in the future. The Mennonite boys felt that the majority of young men had been opposed to war, but that few had nerve to take the right stand, and they urged each one present to "Shout Christian Pacifism" when he returned home, feeling ample adventure would result from maintaining this standpoint.

The evening session was filled by Frederick J. Libby on "The Outlook for Permanent Peace," after the Joint Peace Letter of Philadelphia Friends was read by William B. Harvey. The declaration of General O'Ryan that "the American people can end war in our generation if they get on the job" was emphasized, as was the great activity of women in this line. The Anti-Saloon League was cited as succeeding in its campaign, by driving nail after nail into the saloon's coffin, and three nails were mentioned as effective for the war coffin:—world organization, world-wide reduction of armaments and education for peace. Quoting the last of the Peace Letter the speaker closed with the query: "Do you want to leave the next war as your legacy to the church? America must lead the way to abolish war and Christians must lead America."

As we came to the closing session on Second-day morning, surely all felt with the leader that we had been on the mountain top, and the need was to carry the vision home, and make it visible to others. It was felt these small bodies here gathered should make plans for the cultivation of the rich soil within their own borders before attempting to stand as accredited teachers to others. As a means to this end it was desired that the addresses given at the conference should be assembled and distributed.

Encouragement was given to the efforts to secure Peace Lessons in the International Sunday School Lessons, and as other definite means of service the following resolutions were adopted:—

Resolved: That this conference encourages Peace oratorical contests in the colleges of the United States and that the following committee be directly responsible for the promotion of such contests: Stephen R. Weston, Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio; Alexander C. Purdy, Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana; Payson Miller, Bluffton College, Bluffton, Ohio.

As a group of members of various denominations meeting in a conference at Bluffton, Ohio, we wish to record our approval of the efforts of the Canadian Mennonites to bring Mennonites from Russia for settlement in Canada. We believe the plan is sound and therefore recommend that Mennonites, Friends, Dunkards and other related bodies do what they can to provide the necessary funds.

While there had been a strong feeling against a possible tendency to pass resolutions and to feel in so doing that something definite had been accomplished, yet there was an expressed desire that what had been gained in knowledge and fellowship should serve as a nucleus for the future. Accordingly, the following resolution was adopted:—

Resolved: That this conference approves of the continuation of the efforts to unite in Christian fellowship all denominations and individuals who by faith or practice hold that peace between nations can be maintained by following the teachings of Jesus. We believe that the concern now resting upon us should be given further consideration, and we look forward to a meeting to be held a year from now or some convenient time when we can meet for further consideration of this great theme. The Committee responsible for calling this conference is authorized to invite other denominations or individuals to become associated with us in the work.

The Committee—Wilbur K. Thomas, Elmer E. S. Johnson, Samuel K. Mosiman.

Under covering of the Spirit manifested so wonderfully throughout, this unique conference came to an end.

YEARLY MEETING IN COPENHAGEN.—In regard to the recent Annual Meeting of Danish Friends, the following has been received:—

Concerning the Annual Meeting of Danish Friends Peter Gulbrandsen writes:—The meeting was held in Copenhagen on Seventh Month 16th at Borup's High School. About thirty people, nearly all Friends, attended the opening meeting, in which Johan Marcussen and Alfred Kemp Brown took vocal part. In the absence of the Clerk, Hans Gulbrandsen, Peter Gulbrandsen, his son, was appointed in his place. Two applications for membership were accepted. Greetings were read from Effie Ryle, the Council for International Service, and the Friends' War Victims' Relief Committee; also the London Epistle and a greeting from Friends in Paris. Johan Marcussen read the letter from Bilthoven, which gave rise to considerable discussion. It was decided to send a message to Friends in Holland.

The Clerk outlined a scheme for a permanent Quaker centre in Copenhagen, Fred. J. Tritton supporting. Martha Dodington urged the need of modern Quaker literature in Danish, and F. J. Tritton promised support to any plans which could be realized. A collection totaled 74 kroner.

The meeting was followed by a conference next day, when the interest was alive and keen. Alfred Kemp Brown introduced the subject, "Fundamentals of Quakerism," in an illuminating address, interpreted by Peter Gulbrandsen, who acted in that capacity throughout the day. In the interesting discussion which followed, Peter Manniche, Director of the International High School, Ida Worm Beck, Johan Marcussen, F. J. Tritton, and Ernest Lorenz took part. At the afternoon sitting, the subject was "Friends' Principles and Present-day Problems (The Problem of War)," Fred. J. Tritton introducing it. The discussion turned mainly on the question of conscription; many Friends took part. A resolution was adopted for publication, urging the removal of conscription from Danish law. It appeared in most of the Copenhagen dailies on the 19th, some of them giving it considerable prominence.

At the evening meeting several non-Friends were present, amongst them a radical ex-Cabinet Minister, now an M. P., and his wife. Peter Manniche gave a brilliant address on international understanding, drawing upon some of his recent experiences in the United States. He emphasized the need for a true Christian spirit in all international work. Ernest Lorenz arrestingly described the work of Friends and the spreading of Quakerism in Germany, and Winifred Cramp spoke of her experiences of work among Berlin students. The conference closed with vocal prayer by Alfred Kemp Brown, that it might bear fruit.—From The Friend (London).

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

Our duty being now fulfilled we left Fort Sill for a long journey through the Indian territory to Caddo, which is on the railroad to Texas. We were driven by our friend Thomas Battey in his wagon and were provided with provisions and blankets for camping out. We stopped to dine in a pleasant grove, making a fire to obtain a warm cup of tea. The ride over the boundless prairie had some features of interest. Verbenas and other flowers were blooming luxuriantly, and the Red Bud or Judas tree skirted with crimson the foliage of the little ravines we passed. As night approached we sought a good place to camp, and found one on the borders of a little brook where some teamsters had already stopped to rest. We made a good fire and enjoyed our supper. Then Dr. Rhoads and I laid down in the wagon. The best I can say of the night is, that I waited patiently for the day. In the morning we refreshed ourselves by the water of the running brook, took our simple breakfast, and again started over the plains. A little distance off we saw a wolf strolling along, but he was evidently satisfied that there was room enough for him and us without a collision. Our day's journey was rather tedious, but about noon we stopped at a settler's house, and Dr. Rhoads proposing that we might have a meeting with the family, they freely consented. The Doctor spoke instructively and it proved a good time. They were grateful for the opportunity, and we parted in tenderness of feeling.

Looking ahead we saw the gathering of dark and ominous clouds. Gradually we came into the region of the rainfall, and as we approached the place where we intended to lodge, we found in our way a torrent that could not be forded. We were then compelled to ask for shelter at a humble cabin which after some hesitation was granted. Before we laid down for the night, we were much interested by our host proposing that a portion of Scripture should be read, which he said was his custom. Then he offered a short prayer. It was unexpected to us to meet with such evidence of religious feeling. In the morning we had a similar service and parted with our kind host and his wife who with the very limited means at their disposal had done their best to accommodate us. We made an early start expecting a prosperous journey and soon reached the banks of the Wichita. The river is usually about two feet deep at this ford, but to our great disappointment we found the recent heavy rains had swelled it into an impetuous torrent, probably about eight or ten feet deep. Our friend Thomas Battey at first was not aware of the force and depth of the current and thought of driving in, but I suggested it would be safer to take off one of the mules and see whether it was practicable. He accordingly mounted and urging the animal in soon found there was no safety but in swimming across, which provisionally was accomplished, but he could not return. He then on the opposite side went in search of some assistance and met with some men who had a skiff, who kindly came down and ferried Dr. Rhoads and myself over, but we were obliged to abandon our comfortable wagon with our blankets and provisions. Our friend T. Battey could no longer accompany us, and it became quite a difficult matter how to get his mule back, the animal being very unwilling to encounter the fearful torrent again, and it would have been a desperate risk for T. Battey to attempt it. We therefore thought of sending over and having the other mule brought down to the opposite bank where his companion could see him, and then by main force he was pushed into the torrent, and having no escape he struck out and happily reached the other shore and joined his mate. Then T. Battey was ferried back in the skiff and Doctor and I left to make some new arrangement.

We procured an old vehicle and team with a driver who had been over the prairie track and started. The weather soon became cloudy and drizzly and towards evening rainy. This softened the track so that our progress was very slow, and we had to cross divers muddy sloughs. Night overtook us. We had neglected to bring either lantern or matches. Our driver got out and walked before the horses to direct us, but finally acknowledged that he was lost, and said we must trust in Providence. Doctor and I remained in the vehicle and the driver started back to see if he could discover the right track again. After a considerable time he returned, believing he had found it, and we concluded to go on. After about two hours' suspense we were rejoiced to perceive in the distance a dim light which happily proved to be that of the stage ranch.

Arriving there we found all closed for the night, but continued knocking roused some of the sleepers and we were admitted to lie on a poor bed on the floor for the remainder of the night. In the morning we had a good breakfast, a tender wild turkey forming part of the fare. This being over, our driver informed us that his horses were so jaded by yesterday's journey that they were not fit to undertake the long drive of to-day, and he advised us to take the stage which was about to start for Caddo. This we concluded to do, being the only passengers. We went through the country of the Chickasaws and Choctaws, finding many proofs of civilization, among others a court house and jail. Arrived at Caddo after dark and were well accommodated at the house of an interesting white man who had married a Choctaw woman, and who was in consequence considered one of the Nation. We had much conversation about the future prospects of the Indians. When we were about to start next day he refused any compensation as we were the friends of the Indians. His sons, who were nice, intelligent, educated lads, carried our baggage to the cars, as a matter of friendly duty. After a long railroad ride we landed at 3 A. M. near the town of Seneca, Missouri. We then had to walk over an uneven road in the dark about half a mile to a tavern where we lodged the remainder of the night. We then proceeded to the Quapaco agency and were welcomed by the agent Hiram Jones and his wife. In this vicinity the Modocs were encamped, who had just arrived from the scene of their conflict with the U. S. troops. We were introduced to Bogus Charlie, one of the chiefs, a fine intelligent young man of twenty-six years. He took us to his tent where his wife and child were. She was modest and well-behaved and had evidently taken pains to keep things clean and in order. I got a handsome small work-basket of her manufacture and Charlie gave me his bow and arrow, for which I gave them presents. Charlie took me to his garden where he had several kinds of vegetables growing. It was in excellent order. The whole tribe were very peaceable and wore the civilized dress. Some of the women were very neat in their attire. The wife of Captain Jack, who was condemned for shooting General Canby, looked very sad. The children are nearly all placed at school and a number of the adults were striving with some assistance to understand the spelling book. The next day we visited the Wyandotte School. This nation and the Ottawas have for years past adopted civilized dress and habits. Crossing the Spring and Neosho Rivers, which had become great floods from the recent rains, we visited the Ottawa settlement. When we arrived the people were assembled on account of the funeral of a child. This was conducted in a very simple and solemn manner very similar to our mode. Some feeling addresses were made both in the Indian and English language and we accompanied the procession to the grave. An aged Indian woman, more than a century old, walked beside us without assistance. She was very bright in mind and not very long before had addressed the children of the school exhorting them to prize their privileges. We proceeded from this place to the Quapaw Mission, where Asa and Emmeline Tuttle were the conscientious and efficient superintendent and teacher. The Modoc children were taught here. We thought this the most interesting school and family we visited. Besides literary instruction the boys were taught practically how to cultivate the farm and garden, and the girls were practised in household affairs. An earnest religious feeling appeared to prevail and many of the children were pretty well versed in Bible lessons. This was our closing visit in the Indian territory. Being conveyed to Baxter Springs in Missouri we there took our tickets for Philadelphia via St. Louis, where owing to delay in the connection we were detained a day which enabled us to visit the magnificent iron bridge over the Mississippi which was nearly completed. From its lofty height we had a beautiful view of the river, with the numerous steamers and the thronged levee and its stirring commercial activity.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THURSDAY"—By T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH.

I winced when I tried to move. One arm was cramped under me. It hurts even to remember it. The leg caught by the snowshoe ached. It was not broken, but badly sprained, and was swelling; but the pain of it was being rapidly shamed by the shooting stabs in my left arm. That was dislocated at the elbow. It hung at a sickening angle. I knew that if it were not pulled into place my nervous system would be seriously harmed. How the task was to be accomplished I failed to see.

I laughed, because in my perplexity and pain I could as easily laugh as cry. "Courage, mons fils!," I whispered, remembering what I had been telling my comrade all day.

Thursday was troubled. He realized that something was wrong and showed plainly that, although he did not quite understand, he sympathized. With my well hand I patted him, and his anxious, uncomprehending gaze was pitiful. "It's up to you, mon bon ami, Thursday," I said. A sickening throb barred any sentiment. The world was revolving about my arm.

I tried to pull it gently. The agony weakened all resolve. I sat there in the snow in a sweat, thinking. Night had fully come, and the stars shone. Hardly daring to plan, I got ready to do something. By long blowing on my frozen snowshoe thongs I managed to unwind a strip of moose hide, and with my knife and teeth and good right hand I knotted a piece about my left wrist, leaving a loop.

"Tiens, Thursday; come on, little doctor."

Puzzled, but obedient, the dog wagged his tail and tried to lick my forehead again. "Tiens," I said, pointing to the loop. He did not understand what I wanted, so I inserted the moose hide between his jaws. I braced myself with my sound foot; then I shouted, "Tire, tire, pull, Thursday!" My voice was harsh; he felt the importance somehow. He braced himself.

"Tire, Thursday!" He had the power of a wolf. I leaned back. The trees seemed to close about me, the stars to blur; but I kept enough head to know that I must twist my arm, and then I felt it straighten and the bone slip back into its socket. It was done at last. And then nervousness and my nerve departed in a pair. I lay back on the comfortable snow exhausted—shaken.

It was well that severe cold had not followed the snow. I was numbed but not frozen, and after recovering from the excessive pain and shock I had no idea of giving up. As best I could I scraped a hole with my snowshoe big enough for us both to lie in, and there we spent the night. Cuddled close to me, Thursday supplied me with the heat, and indeed with the hope, for the lack of which I might easily have perished.

So the night wore away, and with the day came a great desire for food. A snow compress on my ankle somewhat reduced the swelling, but I could not walk. I knew that I should not be able to hunt for several days and that by then I should be too weak. In comfort and warmth a man can do intellectual work without food for some time without suffering. But in the woods in winter, busy or idle, he needs heat-producing food to keep him from freezing. For the first time in my life I shook hands with hunger.

During that day I broke off from the dead cedar as many small branches as I could reach, in order to have a store of firewood in the event of zero weather. I melted some snow on a tiny fire, for I was thirsty, and it helped to pass the time. Thursday had left me at dawn to forage, as I supposed. He had not had a square meal for a long while.

It was not surprising that he should go. But I missed him. Noon passed. The tree shadows pointed the other way. Suddenly the force of the loneliness and my helplessness came upon me. I denounced Thursday for a faithless friend. It was certain that he had deserted me. The intensity of my emotion passed. Instead settled a weight, a sense of helplessness. I was hungry.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE governments of India, Canada, and South Africa have ratified the Washington Treaties, and Newfoundland is expected to ratify them this month, the British Foreign Office announces.

MAJOR-GENERAL CLARENCE R. EDWARDS, commander of the First Corps Area, with headquarters in Boston, recently warned the citizen soldiers training at Camp Devens, Massachusetts, of the need of being "well prepared to meet any exigencies that may arise" from the present unsettled state of things in the industrial world. In the course of his remarks, he said that those who preach "No More War" in the United States are usurping the functions of government.

General Edwards, commenting this spring on the work of the National Council for Reduction of Armaments, said that the organization evidently had millions to spend. He is evidently impressed by its effectiveness.

J. MAYHEW WAINWRIGHT, Assistant Secretary of War, has been elected to Congress as a representative from New York, and will resign his secretaryship on the fourth of next Third Month. Under the National Defense Act, the Assistant Secretary of War is engaged particularly in preparing plans for industrial preparedness for war. Military men are hailing this election with delight, foreseeing an able advocate of preparedness in Congress, for Secretary Wainwright has shown enthusiasm and ability in his work in the War Department.

PREPARATIONS for a demonstration in honor of Field Marshal von Hindenburg at Munich aroused considerable resentment at Berlin. An active minority in Germany is doing everything in its power to keep alive the traditions and glamour of the old militaristic régime, but its efforts meet with scant encouragement among the working people.

THE paragraph two weeks ago dealing with preparations for peace education at the fairs this fall omitted to record the work of Friends in Moorestown, Riverton and Mt. Holly at the Mt. Holly Fair. This group succeeded in doing effective work last year, as measured by requests for literature received afterward at the Peace Committee office, and is actively making ready for this autumn.

The volunteers who do the actual work at the Mt. Holly Fair are planning to get together beforehand, to mobilize their information, and prepare for all sorts of questions.

RUSSIA PROPOSES REDUCTION OF ARMIES.—Mutual disarmament is to be the subject of a conference called by Russia, to meet at Moscow on Ninth Month 5th, to which Latvia, Esthonia, Finland, Roumania, and Poland, all states adjacent to Russia, have been invited. A tentative proposal sent out by the Russian Foreign Office some time before the fruitless conference at the Hague, met with no refusals, so a definite date has been suggested.

A substantial reduction by Russia will be a great help in stabilizing conditions, for the "Russian menace" is one of the reasons given for the large armies that are dislocating economic and political conditions in France, Poland, and the "Little Entente."

JAPAN REDUCES ARMY AND NAVY.—The military estimates for the year 1923 submitted to the Japanese Parliament, show material reductions over those of last year, as the table indicates:—

	ARMY	NAVY	TOTAL
1921 (appropriations) . . . . .	$131,003,925	$251,031,915	$382,035,840
1922 (appropriations) . . . . .	126,516,289	226,821,289	353,337,579
1923 (estimates) . . . . .	109,940,000	159,500,000	269,440,000

Compared with the American appropriations for the year 1922-3, of $250,069,929 for the Army, and $280,493,699 for the Navy, the Japanese appropriations seem reasonable enough, but the reductions are reported to be not sufficiently drastic to satisfy the popular demand for economy and a peaceful policy.

The personnel of both army and navy are being reduced at the same time as the appropriations, in the Land of the Rising Sun, the army by about 15 per cent. and the navy by 18 per cent. The reduction in the number of men in the navy is mainly the result of the Washington Conference, but the army reductions are made possible by a reorganization which does not greatly reduce the power of the army.

REPRESENTATIVES of Greece, Jugo-Slavia and Roumania are meeting to consider the control of the "comitajis," or raiding bands of Bulgarian bandits, who have not confined their activities to their own fatherland. A commercial blockade of Bulgaria is threatened unless the nuisance is abated. The Bulgarian government has requested a conference on the control of the bandits, promising in advance that Bulgaria will approve of any measures that may be agreed upon.

The Presidents and representatives of the cabinets of Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua are meeting aboard an American cruiser to find means of dealing with a similar class of gentry in Central America.

NAVAL HOLIDAY AN ACCOMPLISHED FACT.—The King of England has signed the Washington Treaties, England, Japan and the United States have now completed the formal ratification of the treaties, and await only the favorable action of France and Italy to exchange ratifications, thus bringing them officially into effect. Meanwhile the three naval powers are adjusting their navies to the terms of the treaties, and the naval reductions are an accomplished fact, irrespective of the action of France and Italy.

The Japanese evacuation of Siberia has begun, and will be completed, according to the present plans, sometime in the Tenth Month.

DR. HULL AT COPENHAGEN.—Professor William I. Hull, of Swarthmore College, addressed the International Conference of Churches, held early this month at Copenhagen, Denmark, under the auspices of the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches. His subject was "The Reduction and Limitation of Armaments."

Pointing out the necessity of action by the churches to guard the peace of the world, as shown by the economic chaos and the hostility still wide-spread after four years of "peace," Dr. Hull went on to say:—

"It is evident that there is something at stake far more fundamental than the mere reduction and limitation of the number and size of warships, guns, forts and armies. It is not a question of how large or how deadly armaments shall be.

"There is involved nothing less than the realization in our day of the prophet's vision of a time when swords are converted into ploughshares and nations learn war no more. It is not merely a reversion from modern war back to the primitive means and methods of killing men, but an abolition of war itself through a rejection of the whole military system from the hands, the minds, and the hearts of men.

"It is not even a conversion of national armaments into a so-called international police force, for this implies the military and economic coercion of whole nations, the innocent and the guilty alike, old men, women and children as well as the combatants in the trenches. It is rather the utter rejection of war as a method, the application of the capital and labor at present invested in preparations for it to the arts of peace, and a single-hearted reliance upon exclusively peaceful means of settling international disputes and of co-operating in international tasks."

POLISH HORSES.

No doubt the Polish horses have seemed a species of nightmare to those who corralled or contributed them, but Polly Maris is riding triumphantly at the head of a column of 95, presented by residents of Pocono Lake.

This represents a sum of $632.70, and does not include a few promised checks.

The young people who made the collections did a fine piece of work, and the A. F. S. C. extends its thanks to them as well as to the donors.

The Haywood children gave $1.30, earned by picking and selling blueberries. Nancy Coleman and her sisters, besides making an efficient collection, sold a doll and fudge for $2.35. Janet Morris made and sold $8 worth of candy. The Imbrie check bore the inscription "For Polish Horse"—a drawing of a horse taking the place of the word—a good way to interest the youngest child.

A touching incident was the receipt of a check from a lady "in memory of my dear little John, who loved the Lake so dearly and would have been so interested in hearing about the horses." His aunt also gave a horse in his name. Thus the little boy's spirit lives among us and will work for good in a far land.

If only all the boys and girls who worked to get the horses could see the joy of the Polish peasants when, next spring, they find themselves able to plant and sow to furnish food for their children! They will say "Thank you!" with all their hearts.

THE WORK IN THE COAL LANDS.

The child feeding is progressing satisfactorily in both Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Four feeding centers are now open in Bedford County, Pa., where 195 children were being fed the week ending Eighth Month 12th. It is expected that feeding in Somerset County will begin this week. Francis Walton and Esther Dunham of Philadelphia, and Dr. Emily Seaman, of New York, are taking the places of workers who must leave shortly.

In West Virginia 182 children are being fed at five centers and 115 mothers and babies are receiving fresh milk. Richard Cadbury, who recently returned from Poland, will succeed Philip Furnas, who leaves Ninth Month 1st.

There appears to be much greater need than in Pennsylvania. The conclusions arrived at by Walter Abell and Drew Pearson in their investigations early in the year, are borne out by the reports from the workers. They write: "In trying to find where there is need for relief work, one should guard against judging by appearance. Here in West Virginia there appeared to be poverty and need; but whether that was a mere appearance and not a fact was at first a question. The question seemed to be answered in a decisive fashion by the first medical examinations which were made here. The children were weighed and their height taken, and the results were compared with the forms given by Dr. L. Emmet Holt and the Child Welfare Station of the State of Iowa. The children examined were divided into four classes: I, Normal; II, Undernourished; III, Seriously undernourished; IV, Diseased and seriously undernourished. Less than 50 per cent. of the children were in Class I. A child was not put in Class II or III unless he was more than 8 points below normal, a number that would indicate that he was from six months to a year below the average development or was from one to fifteen pounds underweight. Of the 211 children in three different camps examined at the time of this writing, 108 or over 50 per cent., were in Class II, 47 or 22 per cent. were in Class III and two were in Class IV.

For the other children who show condition of undernourishment we have organized, through the co-operation of women and men in the local camps, feeding centers to which the children come for one good supplementary meal each day.

It is certainly true that ignorance as well as the present industrial situation has contributed to the condition in which the children now find themselves. The schools in most of the camps are not well equipped, and we are told that they are not well administered. In one of the camps we were told that there were no trustees now. Many of the men and women as well as the children cannot read. I began reading a few lines from a paper to a man in a small store yesterday, and in a moment there were a dozen or more standing around anxious to hear what the news was, but in many instances quite incapable of finding out for themselves what it was.

The need for some kind of help is universally admitted.

Appreciation of our work is expressed as soon as it is understood. Any one who cares to try relief work in these communities will be astounded at times by the remarkable response which supposedly unimpressible people make.

THE FAMINE IN RUSSIA IS NOT OVER.

The awful prospect of another famine this year is to be reckoned with. At the end of last month, the cables reported that for a month there had been intense heat and no rain. Already in some districts the grain had been scorched and killed before maturity. Later cables were still more disheartening. The prolonged drouth had caused a complete crop failure in many sections. In no part of the country would there be a normal crop. The entire grain yield would be far from enough to feed the population through the winter. On the fourth Beulah Hurley cabled: "No rain, complete crop failure in some sections. Famine will continue through smaller area than last year. Russian government estimate total harvest shows thirty-five per cent. more grain than last year. Our area last year's harvest almost total failure, this year sixty per cent. better some parts, total failure other parts. Even best areas yield far below normal."

Now comes the reports from the Unit telling of the peasants' despair as they face another famine winter. Robert W. Dunn has been visiting the villages and everywhere the story is the same: "Those who escaped last winter are doomed this winter." These incidents will show how serious the situation is.

"At Nevjinkino they gathered around the car and told us of the failure of their gardens on account of the dry spell. They told us how the soosiki ate the grain and even the flax and hemp. They told us of millet spoiled so that only the cows could use it for food. They told us how the bulk of their wheat was a failure. They told us how their rye was drying up when it was half matured and filled out. Indeed, their greatest disappointment and tragedy lay in this rye, their largest crop—over a hundred dessiatines. They told us—some of them—how they had nothing planted anyway, or perhaps only ten small sajhins. From this amount there might be a pool of rye, scarcely enough to feed one soul for one month. These were families of five to ten souls each, that must live through a year of twelve months till the harvest of 1923.

"As we stopped in Petropovlovka a peasant crowd surrounded us. So we turned off the motor and began to ask questions. As usual we had almost as many answerers as there were souls in the crowd. But not as many answers. For had a ballot been taken I believe every one would have testified to the following facts:—

"That most of the families of this village will be unable to get through this fall and winter without help from the Friends' Mission.

"That a large number—perhaps the largest number—of families will not be able to subsist longer than two or three months. Some, such as widows and invalids, will not be able to survive unaided even so long.

"That one-half of the families in the village have no grain sown. They have only their small and patiently tended gardens.

"That the millet sown is almost a complete failure on account of the worms and the unbroken hegemony of the sun during the past four weeks.

"That on the longest street in the village—village streets are amazingly long in Russia—there is but one horse. For the whole population of the village—some 2,000—there are less than fifty. It is obvious that there are not enough horses to plow any appreciable amount of land for the sowing of the fall rye.

"Still more will die next year than this year," predicts an old peasant priest who looks as though he might be one of those to succumb. We wave him a good-bye as we ride out of Petropovlovka.

"THE people are looking and talking pretty gloomily today," remarks Anna Antonovna, a Quaker outpost worker in Grachovka. "They are just sitting around moping, and talking about the rye, and wondering what is going to happen to them."

"Are they all feeling that way?" I ask.

"Yes, almost all. Those who were crying a month ago because they had nothing planted are no worse off than the others to-day. They all join in the general lamentation about their luck, for most of the rye will yield them nothing but straw. The grasshoppers got to it ahead of them."

"We are putting up a few currants for next winter. We thought they would vary our diet of beans and flour and grits and taste much better than those uncertain dried crab-apples from Turkestan we devoured last spring. But while we are eating them some of those people whose hopes were dashed by the sun and the grasshoppers will be on 'their way to the cemetery,' unless—unless all those who eat currant preserves do something about it."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

OUR Friend Wm. Bacon Evans, under date of Eighth Month 1st, writing from Ras-el-Metn, Syria, says:—

"We are, mercifully, all well. The country is quiet, in spite of false reports to the contrary. Work is, unfortunately, hard to be found, except for trained workmen. More industries for the country would seem very desirable, and we hope they may come with increasing settlement in economical lines."

ALFRED LOWRY, with a minute from his Monthly Meeting, is attending the meetings included in Ohio Yearly Meeting, expecting also to be present at the Yearly Meeting. He is accompanied by Samuel S. Haines.

Class of 1923—Edward K. Haviland, Port Deposit, Md.; Norman E. Rutt, 914 Old Lancaster Road, Bryn Mawr, Pa.; G. Randle Grimes, 333 Vassar Avenue, Swarthmore, Pa.

Class of 1924—John F. Blair, Winston-Salem, N. C.; Howard Comfort, Haverford, Pa.; Philip G. Rhoads, Moorestown, N. J.

Class of 1925—Leigh E. Chadwick, 16th and R Streets, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Class of 1926—Danzell F. Hartman, Lancaster, Pa.; Francis H. Ale, 1162 Murray Hill Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Frederick Roedelheim, Elkins Park, Pa.; Daniel C. Lewis, Jr., Millville, N. J.

President William Wistar Comfort and Head of the Department of Romance Languages, is traveling in Spain and France and expects to return to the college by the middle of next month.

JAVA.—William C. Allen, writing from Bandoeng, Java, and alluding to his experiences at Canton Christian College, says:—

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting is particularly interested in this College because some of its members are on its staff. We much regretted not seeing Dr. Wm. W. Cadbury and family, now in the United States. It was a source of great pleasure to be with Morris Wistar Wood, of Germantown, whose sympathy and help were greatly appreciated. Other Friends are also connected with Canton Christian College and it was a joy to meet with them in social and religious fellowship.

We came to Java, not knowing anyone, but from city to city way is opening for service in spite of the diversity of sects, the conservatism of the Established Church and the extreme difficulties growing out of the use of many different languages. All requires much patience in endeavoring to overcome the trials associated with such conditions, day by day, close to the Equator.

So many Friends have read of the incident of the visit of Indians to a meeting of Friends at Easton, New York, introduced by L. Violet (Hodgkin) Holdsworth, as "Fierce Feathers" in her Book of Quaker Saints, and by J. Doyle Penrose in his painting, "None shall make them afraid," that it may be of interest to state that an early reference to the incident has come to hand in "The Journal of Rufus Hall" (1744-1818). Rufus Hall was a son-in-law of Zebulon Hoxie, who "sat at the head of the meeting," and a resident at Easton. Referring to the disturbances caused by the nearness of both the British and Continental armies, he writes: "But the skulking Indians seemed to strike the greatest dread. One day the Indians came to our meeting, just as it was breaking up, but they offered no violence. Their warlike appearance was very shocking, being equipped with their guns, tomahawks and scalping knives. They had a prisoner and one green scalp taken from a person they had killed but a few hours before, but they went away without doing any violence." The date given is summer, 1777.—From The Friend (London).

RACHEL KNIGHT, whose death occurred last year, devoted considerable time to the study of original manuscripts at the Devonshire House concerning George Fox; as the outcome of her research work, there is now announced fresh from the press of George, Allen & Unwin her book, entitled "The Mysticism of George Fox." Whether there proves to be a demand for another presentation of this character remains to be seen. We hope to give a brief review of the book in an early number of THE FRIEND.

T. EDMUND HARVEY has accepted the appointment of English Friends as delegate to the Five Years' Meeting; he has also received a minute from his home meeting (Brighouse), afterwards endorsed by the Representative Meeting, to attend the General Conference of (Hicksite) Friends, to be held at Richmond just before the Five Years' Meeting and now in session.

IN commenting upon the last session of London Yearly Meeting the London correspondent to The Christian Century, after noting that the membership is 20,049, says: "The value of such figures is plain for they show how little numbers matter. The influence of the Friends cannot be measured by the proportion of their numbers to those of other denominations. They have a place of distinction in this land because of the steadfastness of their witness, and because of the sincerity and thoroughness of their discipleship."

ACCORDING to statistics gathered by the Federal Council of Churches, of every 106 persons in the United States, 10 have no religious affiliation and 66 are affiliated through membership, financial support, attendance or other ties with various religious bodies, as follows: Protestant, 75, Roman Catholic 18, other faiths 3.

"CAREFUL search extending over several hundred years has revealed not a single case of false affirmation by a member of the Society of Friends. There have been thousands of cases of perjury in which persons have sworn falsely, but the Quakers who object to taking an oath have been free of this offense."—DR. EDWARD S. NINDE, in his recent sermon on "The Friends and George Fox."

A CORRESPONDENT writes from Constantinople of their Peace Society:—"Friends may like to know that our Peace Committee is composed of representative persons. The Greek and Armenian Patriarch sent, at our invitation, some of their people, professors from the American College, members of both Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. branches here, the minister of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, also native and Protestant Church leaders. For years I have tried to interest people in this cause, and I now rejoice to see a movement which must tell on the public mind of these disturbed people who hitherto have seen so little of the ways of Peace."

A FRIEND who had recently returned from Russia, said in London Yearly Meeting that while there he had been visited by representatives of those calling themselves Quakers, and in mingling with them made the discovery that their beliefs were very like those of Friends. They were absolutely convinced of the unlawfulness of all war to the Christian, and believed in the positive side of communion with the Lord. Those holding these views were reckoned to be quite one million, which is to say that the number of "Friends" in Russia is more than in the whole of the rest of the world. Where is the centre of Quakerdom?

ITINERANT MINISTRY.*

There are few incidents in the early history of Friends, indeed we are justified in saying, there are few if any parallel incidents in church history, that stand out more conspicuously in harmony with the narrative of the New Testament than that which occurred in 1654, when under George Fox's leadership the sixty went forth as Gospel messengers.

George Fox's first visit to the northernmost shires of England were the richest in their final fruitage of all the work he did. Following the enumeration of many valiant who had just cast in their lot with him in Cumberland and Westmoreland he says:—"For about sixty ministers had the Lord raised up, and did now send abroad out of the north country. The sense of their service was very mighty upon me."

Through journals and letters we know much of the intimate lives of these men. Their names in Quaker history have become familiar. They constituted, as already suggested, a unique band. They were in the main young and vigorous in constitution—they had mingled with men of affairs and were not unaccustomed to the ways of the world. They were for the most part ready speakers, clever in argument—not closet students, but at the same time, many of them well equipped to meet the tests that were to be set them, they were eager for service, ready, in some cases anxious, to welcome difficulty and hardship that they might test their armor, fairly courting temporary defeat, if defeat was to be their portion, but courting it only that they might make a more telling and more triumphant victory out of defeat.

We are not told that this group of sixty gathered about George Fox to receive a parting message. Such was not his way. But we do know that he had a parting message for them. An epistle of advice, couched in language not at all Scriptural in style, though strictly so in intent, he addressed to them. It will be found in full among his collected Epistles, but is entirely too long for insertion here, neither does it bear directly upon the central thought that has called forth this editorial. This paragraph, however, as illustrative of the whole, can answer for all:—"All Friends that speak in public, see that it be in the life of God; for that begets to God; the fruits of that shall never wither."

The Gospel record of the sending of the seventy is familiar to all:—"And He said unto them, the harvest indeed is plenteous, but the laborers are few. . . . Go your ways. . . .

Carry no purse, no wallet, no shoes, etc.," "and the seventy returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the demons are subject unto us in Thy name."

The parallelism here is self-evident and calls for no special comment.

When the Society of Friends both in England and in America, though numerically strong, was in reality at its lowest level, this same spirit that was so conspicuous in the early days was the one thing, under God's grace, that seems to have saved it from utter extinction. Reference is made to that period, about the middle of the eighteenth century, when the one interesting element in Friends' history centres about the experiences of the traveling ministers.

We may well bear in mind, however, this great difference between the two periods. The first itinerants had as their goal the gathering of the people to a standard which they conceived to be the very Will of their Divine Master, the making of converts from among all conditions of people to no new sect they were founding, but to call them from the Lo heres and the Lo thers to a witness within themselves. The second itinerants were a part of a new sect, which like its sister churches, had allowed form to usurp the place of life and power, these found their great task to be rescue work, to help establish, if they might, on the ancient and only true foundation, the church of their fathers. The names of Woolman, Fothergill, Remberton, Dudley, Churchman and scores of others are naturally suggested as the bright figures of this period. Their task was an arduous one and they had no George Fox's Epistle and no spirit of the seventeenth century to animate them. They had a condition to meet that offers little to stir the spirit of youth, and we find the itinerants among Friends of the eighteenth century men and women mature and thoughtful, in no degree lacking in zeal, but less vigorous in their appeal to others, especially to the young. We know of the labors of these through their journals. We know what lives of devotion they lived and what great victories they won, but their history does not stir us as do those experiences of the previous century.

Throughout the history of our Society the itinerant minister has had a most important place. The development of the plan "of recording ministers," and of appointing elders makes a little history of itself, but when a meeting commits itself to this plan it assumes a share in all that this entails.

We believe that the plan is Scriptural, that it finds its model in the narratives recorded in the New Testament, and we read that it is a copy, imperfect though it may be, of the practice of the primitive church. We believe further, to borrow a convenient though hackneyed expression, that the plan can be supported on psychological grounds.

The one-man-minister system fails in these regards: (1) Each person viewing Truth from his own angle, tends to stress certain aspects and to under-rate others. (2) Congregations grow deaf to the reiterated messages of one person or, appearing to follow him, grow callous, while a real need for the minister's message exists in other quarters. (3) Running water does not grow stagnant, the same applies to what we have under consideration, as can be testified to in numerous instances. (4) A meeting is more attentive and sympathetic toward a message from a visitor who has taken the trouble to come and worship with them, than toward one whose voice and line of thought may be very familiar to them. This is said with no reflection upon the "gift" of the latter. He may be, and often is, the more powerful and effective minister of the two. (5) Referring to the minister it is only reasonable to suppose that in his travels he will rub smoother his own "imperfect sympathies."

This feature of the subject might be further elaborated, for while we hold that our views concerning the ministry of the Gospel rest upon Christ's own teachings and as has been already said upon the practices which held in the early Christian church, we claim that it rests also on solid ground, when viewed from the standpoint of philosophy.

But what does this entail upon the congregation—in our case upon the Society of Friends, divided into its component Monthly Meetings? That it entails very much, or should do so, can be ascertained by a reference to the labors of Margaret Fell Fox: "Ten times in her long life she made the journey to London, from Swarthmoor, but these visits by no means exhaust the catalogue of her travels on the behalf of Friends. In 1663, when about fifty, she traveled a thousand miles through England, for the most part on horseback, visiting their meetings, and cheering them with the presence which so many of them had longed for. . . . Five years later, fresh from her own imprisonment, she undertook to visit the Friends who were scattered up and down through the prisons of England."

Even a cursory glance will satisfy us that she gave without stint of herself and her worldly substance to the relief of the sick and the imprisoned, to the outward support of the ministers and their families and to other calls associated with the best life of the youthful Society. She was by no means alone in this, but for many years, due in part to her social position, but more to her inherent fitness for the service, she was the centre of a radiating system of help, that fostered the development of the Society of Friends along the lines which George Fox and others had advocated.

Two hundred and more years is a long remove from her day, and the plans that appealed to her and that suited those conditions do not hold now, but the problem is identical with hers.

A minister in the Society of Friends should have to assume no tasks that his fellow members cannot help him to carry. The minister is called to the service by his Divine Master. He recognizes this and yields to the call. His fellow members if attentive to the same source know of this, and at once yield their help and become partakers with him in the service.

This is the theory of public ministry as held by Friends. It touches at once a very practical question of support. There are two types of ministers to be noted, first, as instanced by the doctor, lawyer or successful business man who has felt a call to the ministry and who has yielded to the call. The world needs this kind of witnessing to the Truth, that the active man of affairs may be called of God and used by Him. The second type would include those who are first of all ministers and who then must find a way of earning a living and supporting their families. This group has to exercise great care in choosing a profession or business that will leave them so that first things may be placed first. Possibly the most striking illustration of this type since the "early days" and in our own country, is the case of John Woolman.

Viewed again from a slightly different angle there are three classes of ministers: (1) those whose income ceases if they themselves cease work to travel in the ministry and whose families would suffer unless helped out. (2) Those whose income is sufficient for their families to get along in their absence, but who find it a real burden to pay the expenses of the journey. (3) Those able to be quite independent, traveling at their own cost and providing for their families while away.

In the allusion to Margaret Fell Fox we referred to what one person was able to do for the Church in the matter under consideration. In those early days we are told of one, William Rogers, who complained that Fox and his fellow leaders were making constant appeals for "money, money for the ministry." Regular collections were made, up and down the country, to supply the needs of the large number of Friends traveling to and fro as ministers.

To-day those needing assistance are helped by their meetings, but the onus is upon the minister. He expects and is expected to pay his expenses, if at all possible, even at considerable sacrifice, of which perhaps little is known, outside the family group.

May it not be the case that a meeting sometimes grants a "minute for service" without seriously considering the expense of the contemplated journey. It ought not to be "We are willing for him to go, if he is able to manage it," but, rather, "Is it right for him to go?" "Is it the Divine Will that he should?"

Having no pastors to support, and being spared this expense, would it not be reasonable that the money thus saved might be used for furthering the concerns of such members as are rightly called to travel?

Traveling in the ministry, as known two generations ago amongst Friends, is hardly known among us. It is now the exception, not the rule, for a Friend to introduce such a concern into his meeting. Why? The answers to this may be various.

We all yield assent to the proposition that nothing should be allowed to hinder right traveling in the ministry, least of all the question of finances. The burden should be shifted from where it is, to where we think it should be placed—namely, from the individual to the meeting. There would be a sense of greater liberty. Those who were "separated by the Holy Ghost" would be sent forth to preach the Word of God.

COMMEMORATION DAY ADDRESS AT EARLHAM.

HERBERT C. HOOVER.

[There is so much to cause every Friend everywhere to pause and put to himself the query: "Have I had any part in this?" that we give almost in full Herbert Hoover's address at Earlham last summer before an audience of more than three thousand people.—Eds.]

"It is almost a commonplace saying with regard to the Friends as a Society, for the great theme of the Friends, aside from the spirituality of their beliefs and holdings, has been a sense of service to humanity, not only in its daily life, but a willingness to rise to the emergencies of great catastrophes and great events, and to organize those events and those catastrophes in the amelioration of their dire results.

"My mind goes back to the earliest of the great organized beliefs in the world, when it was the Society of Friends who organized the relief of the city of London during the great plague, and if you will follow down with each great war and each catastrophe, if you come down to modern times, to our Civil War, if you come to the Franco-Prussian War, if you come to this last great war, you find, of all the outstanding organizations, the outstanding individuals who have engaged themselves in the amelioration of the terrible results of war, they have had the leadership of Friends.

"There must be something here more than an accident, that out of a body of less than perhaps 250,000 or 300,000 people of all the world, for the membership of the Friends is not much greater than that, there should have been contributed to humanity during all these centuries that sense of service, for that sense of service, indeed, makes itself strong from the thought, the spiritual expression of the Friends themselves.

"And it is in these services, it is in the results, it is part of the vision which must determine the righteousness or the unrighteousness of any faith, of any group. It is perhaps, unseemly for me, or for you, to speak of our own, but it is well to remind ourselves, for our inspiration and the inspiration of our children, that there is here a tradition, there is here the motivation of some great aspiration that follows through generation after generation of our people.

"During the last war the Friends have served, not alone, —and I am not speaking of myself,—in all of those great measures which have saved from loss of life numbers far in excess of those who have died. If we were to recount the services of the relief of Belgium, the relief of northern France, the relief of Poland, of Austria, of Germany, of Czecho-Slovakia, of Servia, of Finland, of Esthonia, and not even to enumerate Russia, we could enumerate over a hundred millions of people who owe their lives today to the intervention of the American people, and in whose representation has been found so large proportion of the men who have sprung from the Society of Friends, who have had their inspiration from institutions of this character.

"And the Friends are still in service today. In Russia we today witness one of the most terrible holocausts from the war itself, in a famine of greater and more terrible portent than any that have hitherto flowed from it. Born of a revolution, the attempt of a great people to secure for themselves a freedom which they had never enjoyed, the swinging of their social pendulum to extremes, under the lash of their previous suffering and endeavor to escape the great inequalities and the injustices of centuries, flogged beyond endurance by the war itself, and freed from restraint by the failure of that war, the Russian people have themselves destroyed their own institutions and have brought upon themselves the most terrible of the visitations that have yet come to the human family. It was the Friends who first went to their relief, in the direct representatives of this Society more than a year and a-half ago, who first endeavored to reach that great sea of misery and to do something that would encourage and give hope to that great mass of people. The organization of which I have myself the direction, and in which are associated many Friends, entered upon the scene later than the direct Society of Friends themselves, and in co-operation with the Friends' Service Committee we have undertaken the relief of some 25 millions of people, a relief that has so far required the service of some sixty steamships, has demanded the entire operative capacity of the railways of Russia for over five months, that has cost the American people upwards of 60 millions of dollars, in order that we might save human life.

"The Friends have all of these years not only held to a quality of service, but they have held in their faith, not only their spiritual faith but their economic and their social faith, to one other strong bulwark and that was individualism in itself. The Friends revolted from Europe, from the established church. They migrated to America because of their belief that the Divine Spark alone exists in the individual human heart. They held that that spark did not lie in institutions. It did not lie in hierarchy or agreements or in organizations. They held that it was alone the property of the individual. But Russia today, in the government that dominates their people, has attempted to organize the state on the faith that the divine spark does not exist in the human heart; that it is not the property of the individual. It has placed the motto over the great cathedral at Moscow that 'Religion is the opiate of the people.'

"There is something in this for Friends. A sect that has held strongly all these 250 years to that faith, a sect or society that has produced these results; that, with these comparatively trivial numbers has managed, through the excellence and character of its men and its women to establish themselves in such positions that they have been able to create relations that command the admiration of the nations, should stick, and stick hard to this faith of our forefathers, and that is, that the inspiration to aid human kind is the inspiration of the individual. It is not the mass, and not the institution. There lies the foundation of Quakerism.

"These seven years of struggle and of death have set the world adrift from its spiritual moorings. We have witnessed the sacrifice of millions of men in battle and more millions of women and children by famine. These men have gone cheerfully, they have gone gladly to death with every heart imbued with awakened idealism, with faith in the service they gave, their loved ones often comforted that these sacrifices were not only for our country but for the world as a whole.

Many millions of others have given sacrifice and have given service that these great things might be accomplished. But with the ending of the war the world had hopes of a civilization that would be purified and ennobled by these sacrifices. It had thought that the fine unity of purpose that it had gained in the war could be carried into unity of action to remove the great blots on civilization in peace; to illumine and alleviate the great wrongs, the great inequalities, the great sufferings, and our great high courage gave birth to great hopes of the future in the world.

"But, from the concentration of all this spiritual and material energy for the single purpose of war, the scene changed into immediate complexity with the many problems of peace. In distribution of sacrifices and the miseries of the war the world found that they fell with greater inequality. In the war some had died; others suffered great loss and others suffered none but profited greatly. From the dying embers of war nationalism has flamed up into greed; religion is blamed for its failure to restrain the conflict, and for its failure to kindle the lasting fires of peace from the embers of war; defeat has brought revolution. Victory has brought discontent and disappointment. To all these unsatisfied spiritual difficulties are added many of other characteristics, and there can be but little wonder that, in the failure of immediate realization of these great ideals and great hopes of the war, that there should be great discouragement and great unsettlement, for the human mind is searching earnestly and hopefully for serenity and happiness. And yet our people overlooked that one watchword through which progress is to be made in our civilization, through which the wrongs of humanity are to be righted, that watchword for which Earham College has stood these seventy-five years, and that is Service.

APPOINTED MEETING AT CALN.

A meeting appointed for Divine Worship, by request of Samuel Jones, of Lansdowne, was held at Caln, on First-day afternoon, the twentieth of Eighth Month. The occasion also elicited the interest and help in Gospel fellowship of Edward T. Binns, and Walter L. Moore.

While the attendance was not large as upon some former occasions, being composed very largely of persons from the immediate neighborhood, which is rural, the meeting seemed overshadowed with an evidence of Heavenly blessing. Especially was this manifest as the meeting drew near to its close, when a tendering sense of the presence of the Saviour of men for their spiritual uplift seemed to draw the congregation into oneness of Christian fellowship, wherein all sense of preacher and "preached-to", gallery and body-of-the-house, seemed to fade away, giving place to that within the heart of the believer which if sought and heeded will bring the answer to the prayer of Jesus, "That they may be one," and "That the love wherewith Thou hast loved me may be in them, and I in them."

The expressions of feeling of helpfulness derived from the meeting, made by several at its close, gave encouragement to those responsible for its holding.

To those who remember Caln as it was fifty or more years ago—say on Quarterly Meeting day, when it gathered within its walls the membership of eleven or twelve meetings scattered throughout and near the Great Valley, in Chester and well into Lancaster County, there must needs come an overwhelming sense of the changes wrought by time and circumstance. A few days ago there assembled in the nearby growing city of Coatesville, in the new and up-to-date meeting-house, the little remnant of this once great Quarterly Meeting. A circumstance which shows most forcibly the change of its people from a rural industrial and agricultural to an urban industrial mode of life, to a largely diminished birth-rate, and to the lack of power in our Quaker faith to lead men to its practical acceptance as a way of worship.

No one with an eye for the beautiful in nature could be other than charmed with the extended view of the great Chester Valley, as seen from the front of Caln Meeting-house;

the oldest portion of which has the age of nearly two hundred years. In the two graveyards adjoining the records show near or over one thousand interments. Though our Quaker poet of meeting houses speaks of the place as,

"Little, ancient, solitary Caln, Dreaming upon its solitary hill," it has its place in the heart of many who there have felt—

"Sweet comradeship with man and nature;
And there responded to devotion's call."

BOOK REVIEW.

"TEN STUDIES IN THE HISTORY AND TEACHING OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS."*

This manual is exactly what the title implies. Twenty or so years ago, a self-appointed group of Friends in Philadelphia issued a Course in Reading, for Friends' Study Circles, which, during the five winters immediately following, was responsible for a very lively awakening of interest in the reading of Friends' biographies and journals.

The list as we now recall it was of titles only, but it was so complete and suggestive, that if any one read all that was mentioned (and some young people we know did so) he would have more than a fair knowledge of Quaker writings.

The manual under review embraces ten lessons. One wonders why some characters have been omitted, but in a work so curtailed, the element of choice becomes somewhat arbitrary and every one is entitled to his own.

Why so little is made of William Penn, whose life as a Quaker could never be more appropriately studied than during the next twenty years, we can only guess; and also we can only guess why Isaac Pennington's contribution, with his nice shades of thought, should receive so scant mention, in a day when his particularly clear definition on the topics that few are better able to expound than himself should make them especially welcome.

Lessons 1, 2 and 3, naturally deal with the story of George Fox. If one really becomes an honest admirer of Fox, as Spurgeon said of such, he can scarcely be otherwise than extravagant in his language of commendation.

In chapters 4, 5 and 6 the messengers under George Fox's preaching find their best exponents in Francis Howgill and Edward Burrough. Chapter 7, on John Woolman, is the most suggestive one in the book, and should certainly leave the reader with a veritable desire to know more.

Eight and 9 are devoted to the two separations; but long before a careful student has reached these, he will have been so saturated with the story and charmed with the life of Elizabeth Fry, William Allen, Stephen Grellet and many another whose biography has made a life-long impression on scores of readers, that he will have little place for the Separations except as matters of history.

Chapter 10 is a suggestive one, it hints at what Quakerism is today, and what it may be tomorrow.

The manual, we hope, will be extensively used. It is easily conceivable that study groups of Friends (with the books listed in the manual borrowed or owned by members) can by fortuitous discussions of the topics embraced in it find themselves well acquainted with Quaker literature and Quaker biography as the result of a winter's reading.

"I SEE the wrong that round me lies,
I feel the guilt within,
I hear with groan and travail cries
The world confess its sin.
Yet, in the maddening maze of things,
And tossed by storm and flood,
To one fixed trust my spirit clings,
I know that God is good."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THURSDAY"—By T. MORRIS LONGSTRETH.

In the few weeks that we had been together Thursday had grown dear to me. He was not my pet, but a partner. I argued that he had come to me of his own will, and that his was the right to go—unattached, silent, as he had come. Argue as I might, however, his desertion seemed brutal just at that time; I needed him.

The short afternoon waned; dark crept up the first until only their spires glistened in the last sunlight for a brief moment. Not even the whiskeys jacks paid me a visit. In some subtle manner they were aware that I had no food. Silence and darkness enveloped me. I had never feared either, but now they seemed full of omen. I broke off before branches and kindled a small fire.

I do not know how many hours passed. I raised myself on my right elbow, for surely I had heard a bark. Nearby a bush crackled, a dark form ran toward me.

"Thursday, mon bon fils!" I cried.

He dropped a large gray rabbit, the wood hare, beside me. I hugged him. He did not know the names I had called him. He would never know, and I should never doubt his fidelity again. Now I understood his long absence. Game, of course, was scarce after the storm. The chase was arduous. He had had, no doubt, to wait for hours beside a runway. Doubtless, too, he had eaten nothing himself.

That night we had fried rabbit. Later, as the fire died away and Thursday slept beside me, I lay looking into the darkening coals and thinking of my comrade.

I stayed several days in my snow inclosure until my ankle was stronger. Thursday hunted daily, but I was not lonely or even depressed again. We suffered little from the cold. At last when another storm showed signs of approaching we set out for the main camp. In another week I was able to put things in order and to start for the K. & W. Co.'s lumber camp.

And now comes the hard part for me to tell; but it throws so much light on the character of Thursday that I dare not omit it. People to whom I have confided my friendship for Thursday invariably ask me whether I have him now. I admit regretfully that I left him in the woods. "In the woods!" they exclaim. "I shouldn't think that—" Then, of course, I stand on one leg until they get over calling the situation names and repeating that they do not understand it. I did not understand it at the time, but I do now.

When we had got within a few hundred yards of the lumber camp, Thursday, who had so patiently followed me in my lame progress, stopped short. He wagged his tail and sat down.

"Dépeche-toi!" I called. He did not budge. Apparently he had stopped, not as if it had just entered his mind as a thing to do, but as if he had planned to see me so far and not a trot farther.

With a sudden sinking of the heart I walked back to him. He licked my hand, but would not move. I coaxed, ordered, pleaded with him in his own jargon and in English. He whined a little, but remained obdurate. His solemn eyes said plainly, "We have been good comrades, les bons amis." Then he turned and trotted off into the woods.

The men said I looked played out when I limped into camp. Certainly my heart was heavy. Inquiring, I learned there had never been a dog at that camp. I sent in two men for my tent and duffel and cautioned them to keep an eye open for Thursday. They saw nothing.

Real crutches and generous fare and the sparkling days seemed good enough excuses for my lingering there. But down in my heart I waited in the hope of seeing my old partner; but I never did. At first it mortified my pride to believe that even a dog could sever a friendship that was apparently so strong; but later it seemed only a natural manifestation of his bold and original character.

He came to me in mystery and unsought. In mystery he chose to go. And when I had got back to town and was confined whole brilliant days in closed and crowded lecture rooms it came over me that Thursday in his dog wisdom had chosen well.

RECOLLECTIONS OF YOUTHFUL DAYS, AND SOME RECORDS OF AFTER YEARS.

WRITTEN BY MARMADUKE C. COPE. COMMENCED AT NEWPORT IN THE SUMMER OF 1877 IN MY SEVENTY-FOURTH YEAR.

We arrived safely at our respective homes, having completed this most interesting and informing journey with uninterrupted health. In the Twelfth Month of 1875 I again visited the colored schools of Virginia and North Carolina under the care of our Freedmen's Committee. Arriving at Danville I met our beloved friends Alfred and Mary Jones and enjoyed their company. I spent several days in calling at the homes of the colored people, finding some in abject poverty and others in very comfortable dwellings. It was pleasant to be able to assist some and to congratulate many who had by industry and good management greatly improved their circumstances. The school was large and flourishing. I attended one of their religious meetings and was impressed with the order and solemnity with which it was conducted. One of our former pupils preached the sermon which contained good matter and sound doctrine. From Danville I visited in company with Alfred Jones, the schools at Charlotte, Lincolnton, Thomasville, Salisbury, Greensboro, Salem, Goldsboro and Hillsboro, doing what seemed right to encourage the people to industry and temperance.

In the spring of 1876 I purchased the house No. 5 East Penn St., Germantown, making some addition to it, and settled there in the fall of that year. My sister-in-law, Elizabeth W. Wistar and my beloved grandson Marmaduke C. Kimber, forming with myself the family. The arrangement was cheering and the promise fair for the closing years of life. But it pleased my Father in Heaven, who ordereth all things well, again to break up the rest on earth, by the removal in the Second Month of 1878 of the precious grandson who had endeared himself greatly to me.

ON THE DEATH OF A SON.

(From the German.)

Thou'rt mine, yes, thou art still my own,
Who tells me thou art lost?
But yet thou art not mine alone,
I own that He who crossed
My hopes hath greatest right in thee;
Yea though he ask and take from me
Thee, O my son, my heart's delight,
My wish, my thought, by day and night.

I long for thee, my son, my own,
And He who once hath given
Will have thee now beside His throne
To live with him in Heaven.
I cry alas! my light, my child,
But God hath welcome on him smiled
And said "My child, I keep thee near
For there is naught but gladness here."

We pass our night in wakeful thought
For our dear children's sake,
All day our anxious toil has sought
How best for them to make
A future safe from care and need;
Yet seldom do our schemes succeed;
How seldom does their future prove
What we had planned for those we love.

But now I need not fear for thee,
Where thou art, all is well.
For thou my Father's face doth see,
With Jesus doth thou dwell.
Yes, cloudless joys around him shine,
His heart shall never ache like mine;
He sees the radiant armies glow
That keep and guide us here below.

Then be it as my Father wills,
I will not weep for thee,
Thou livest, joy thy spirit fills,
Pure sunshine thou doth see;
The sunshine of eternal rest
Abide, my child, where thou art blest,
I with our friends will onward fare,
And when God wills, will find thee there.

The ministry of a number of Friends lately in our meetings has been very impressive on the subjects of the shortness and uncertainty of time and the great need of preparation for an eternal state of existence. The need that we should fix our affections so on heavenly things that nothing on earth should come between us and our Father in Heaven but the dear Saviour.

May I now, nearly seventy-four years of age, take this closely to my heart, and see whether my happiness for the few remaining days of my life ought not to be in the dearest earthly affections, but should consist in the love of God and his dear Son my Saviour. My share of human happiness and prosperity has been far above the average of my fellow beings, and still the heart clings too fondly to these joys and would fain seek to renew them as in days that are past; but even while looking at such a prospect, a shade comes silently over it as if to remind me that true happiness can alone be found in the presence of the Lord. May I then no longer seek "to build beneath the skies," but keep my hopes fixed on one of the many mansions in our Heavenly Father's house, and with the trust of a Christian believer bear in mind that each day brings me,

"Nearer the bound of life
Where I lay my burden down."

SOME FACTS CONCERNING THE COAL INDUSTRY.

EXPUNDED BY THE RUSSELL SAGE FOUNDATION.

"They have opened three mines where only two were needed; they have employed three men where only two were necessary. These mines and men can find productive work only during 175 instead of a possible 300 days in a year. . . .

"This idle time of the miners is not confined to one season or period during which they can find employment elsewhere. To the contrary, the men are always subject to call, for which reason they urge a greater daily wage that their annual income may be sufficient for their needs."

This statement was made not by coal miners but by their employers, the coal operators of the bituminous coal fields. If it is accurate, it reveals a perplexing dilemma. . . . Is it true that the miner is given opportunity to work less than three days out of five working days? Is this intermittency in work so uncertain that he never knows from week to week, or even from day to day, how often the whistle will blow to tell the men in the camp that the mine will be open for work? If the industry must keep too many men "subject to call," can the wage rates be made high enough to pay the cost of living for the miner and his family the year round? How great a tax does this intermittency of coal production levy upon the pockets of the buyers of coal, and upon the profits of investors in the industry?

The above are the opening paragraphs of a pamphlet published last spring by the Russell Sage Foundation, entitled, "The Coal Miners' Insecurity," by Louis Block, which is pronounced by The Survey to be "the most significant body of facts as to the underlying human situation" yet published. The closing paragraphs summarizing these facts follow:

1. The capacity of the bituminous mines to produce coal has been conservatively estimated as 700,000,000 to 800,000,000 tons a year, compared with actual requirements of about 500,000,000 tons.

2. The bituminous coal mines have operated on an average of only 214 days a year in the thirty-two years from 1890 through 1921. If we accept 304 days as a full working year, the lost days of employment in bituminous mines have averaged 90 in a year.

3. Of these lost days 37 per cent. according to the estimates of the United States Geological Survey, have been due to the over-development of the industry. The short working year has continued through times of prosperity. The excess of capacity over production in the bituminous coal mines makes employment intermittent for mines even when business in general is most prosperous.

4. The production of coal has increased from 120,600,000 tons per year in the five-year period from 1890 through 1894 to nearly 507,000,000 tons a year from 1915 through 1919. The number of employes has increased from an average of less than 200,000 in 1890 to about 600,000 in 1921. The days of employment in a year have shown no appreciable increase except temporarily during the period of the war. The increased demand for coal has resulted in opening new mines and employing more miners, rather than in giving more regular employment in the mines already operating.

5. Seasonal variations, according to the United States Geological Survey, account for 47 per cent. of the lost days in bituminous coal mining. In the period from 1913 through 1921 the excess of production of coal in the month of greatest output over that of the month of least output in each year varied usually from 11,000,000 to 16,000,000 tons or more and was never less than 6,000,000 tons. These seasonal variations result in keeping more men in the industry than would be needed if work were more evenly distributed throughout the year. This excess in numbers of men employed in the industry tends in turn to make employment more irregular and uncertain.

6. With employment intermittent and uncertain, the bituminous miners are forced to seek higher rates of wages to offset the periods of idleness and lack of earnings. The mine workers reported to the Bituminous Coal Commission that in 1918, which was a year of unusual regularity of employment owing to the war demands, the average annual earnings of their members in the central competitive field varied from $1,364 in Ohio to a maximum of $1,583 in Western Pennsylvania. Data derived from the United States Census indicate that in 1919 the average annual earnings of the miners in the same area varied from $1,062 in Indiana to a maximum of $1,318 in Pennsylvania. Estimates of annual earnings derived from average daily earnings reported by the National Coal Association to the President's Bituminous Coal Commission indicate that the average annual earnings in the central competitive field for men working the full time of mine operation were about $1,277 for inside day labor, $1,492 for loaders, $1,579 for hand miners, and $1,760 for machine miners. The general average increase of 27 per cent. granted would have increased these earnings had employment continued to be no more irregular than in the past. Even in the comparatively prosperous year of 1920, however, employment was 12 per cent. less than in 1918, while in 1921 employment decreased 23 per cent. as compared with 1920 and 32 per cent. as compared with 1918. This shows that opportunity for employment as measured by the number of days the mines are operated is of primary importance to the miner, since irregular employment nullifies the advantage of increased rates of pay.

7. Estimates of the cost of living, prepared for the United Mine Workers, and presented by them to the Bituminous Coal Commission, showed that in First Month, 1920, $1,603 was required for a budget to provide a "minimum of subsistence" for a family of five. The cost of providing a "minimum of health and comfort" for families living in mining communities was estimated as requiring an annual income of $2,244. Even in the prosperous year of 1918 the miner's average annual earnings were not equal to the "minimum of subsistence," except for the annual income of a comparatively small group of machine miners employed "full opportunity," as estimated from the operators' figures, and their earnings were nearly $500 less in a year than the miners' "minimum of comfort" budget. An allowance for a decrease in the cost of living and an increase in the miners' rates of pay probably would not cover the difference between a reasonable budget and the annual income of the miner in his short working year.

8. Present conditions in the bituminous coal industry render precarious and difficult the lives of more than half a million miners and their wives and children. The adjustment of wage rates is sure to produce conflicts and bitterness until the equally important questions of stability for the industry and security of employment for the miner receive effective attention from operators and public. Greater security in employment must be made the foundation of better human relations in this industry.

Wasteful over-development is a problem of organization of the industry as a whole in which either the operators or the public must take the initiative. The cost of living of everybody is increased by disorganization in the basic industry of coal. The public, the operator and the investor and the coal miner have a common interest in making bituminous mining efficient and economical.

THE CANTONESE AND THE POLITICAL MIX-UP IN CHINA.

WM. W. CADBURY.

At the opening of the present year there were three dominant factions seeking for first place in the affairs of China.

In the North was the bandit governor of Manchuria, Chang Tso Lin. It is well known that he was firmly allied with the Japanese militarists, and in view of his controlling influence over President Hsu Shi Chang at Peking the situation appeared the more ominous.

In Central China, as governor of the Provinces of Hupeh and Hunan, was Wu Pei Fu. He is unique among the military leaders of China, in that he is educated, a keen student of foreign affairs, and honest.

Finally there was the Southern Government, or Canton faction. The leading spirits and most capable administrator here was General Chen Chung Ming, a native of the Province. With him was Sun Yat Sen, the recently elevated President of the Southern Government and the first provincial President of the Republic, until he resigned in favor of Yuan Shi Kai.

While Sun Yat Sen was aspiring to a national consolidation, Chen's ambition was more modest. As Nathaniel Peffer said of him in "Asia": "He is determined to let the national government take care of itself. He desires to make of Kwangtung one province that would be administered decently and with some regard for the people's interest—a model province. Already a municipal government has been set up in Canton, the first of its kind in China, and free rein is given to the American trained young men who are administering it."

There is the Municipal-Executive composed of the Mayor and the Commissioners of Finance, Public Safety, Education, Public Health, Public Works and Public Utilities, all appointed by the Governor.

Then there is an advisory Council composed of 30 members, 10 appointed by the Governor, 10 chosen by general election and of the other 10, 3 are selected by the Chamber of Commerce, 3 by the labor organizations and one each by the medical profession, the educational association and the lawyers' association.

Finally there is an Audit Bureau with a chief auditor appointed by the Governor, empowered to audit all municipal accounts.

When the new Governor entered Canton, he found the city depleted of money by the former Governor Mok, and yet one of his first acts was to abolish the gambling monopoly, one of the chief sources of revenue to the Government.

As further evidence of the liberal policy of Governor Chen, he has promised to give to the Agricultural Department of the Canton Christian College the sum of $100,000, silver currency, annually for 10 years, with the object of thereby helping to promote progress in the Agricultural development of the Province.

The adjoining province of Kwangsi was added to the Southern Government, and four other provinces have indicated their sympathy with the Southern leaders. Thus more than half the population of the Empire may be said to be on the side of the Southerners.

The other dominant personality of China is Sun Yat Sen. While his ambitions are more outreaching than those of General Chen, they worked together without open breach up until a few weeks ago.

It is President Sun's ambition that each of the provinces shall be organized along the lines that Kwangtung is now following, and when this is accomplished there shall be a federation of these commonwealths under a common head, along lines similar to those which led to the formation of the United States.

No more impressive scene could be imagined than that which occurred at the inauguration of Dr. Sun in Canton, on Fifth Month 4, 1921. For many hours students, labor organizations and the representatives of the various guilds filed past the President and his wife expressing their admiration of the man of their own choice.

Such was the situation in the early part of the present year, but during the past few months marked changes have occurred. Wu Pei Fu has moved from his position in General Central China against his chief rival Chang Tso Lin. The latter was compelled to resign and Li Yuan Hung, who succeeded Yuan Shu Kai as President, has been reinstated.

Genuine efforts have been made to win over Sun Yat Sen, but although he offered his aid to Chang Tso Lin he has held out against Wu Pei Fu. In spite of this, his chief supporter, General Chen, has shown a strong inclination to yield to the Peking forces under certain conditions and so bring about a reunification of the country. On this question Sun and Chen have broken with one another, so that President Sun was forced to flee from Canton. He is now seeking to return and there are rumors of a reconciliation between these two southern leaders.

Much criticism has been made of Sun Yat Sen in this country and by foreigners in China because of his obstructionist tactics in the present crisis. It has been said that he has outgrown his usefulness and is actuated solely by selfish ambition for personal advancement. One must recall, however, the occasion when he yielded the Presidency to Yuan Shi Kai, he was completely deceived, and it was mere chance which saved the Republic from losing every vestige of the democracy which Sun had devoted his life to achieve. The educated men of Canton and the Cantonese in this country still believe in Sun Yat Sen.

It is to be hoped that through compromise north and south may be once more united, for it appears that Wu Pei Fu is at one with the Southern leaders in desiring to mould the government along liberal constitutional and democratic lines.

Such are the forces working within China, but there are always the more sinister influences from without.

Japan in the north and Great Britain in the south have seemed only too ready to continue the internal strife for their own political ends.

The United States, on the other hand, is generally considered a true friend by the Chinese. While there are many incidents in our relations with China of which we have no reason to be proud, yet the return of the Boxer Indemnity and the generally sympathetic attitude of Americans toward China have given us a place in the confidence and affection of the Chinese people unequalled by any other nation.

The situation has been to a large extent clarified by the Washington Conference, and China is left to work out her own internal salvation. If the other nations do not interfere, we look with hope at the experiment so successfully inaugurated by the Cantonese. In their government and their initiative live the real hope for the future of China.

Many of the young leaders of modern China have received their education and their ideals from America. It would appear then to be peculiarly the work of America to foster a closer friendship and sympathy with the people of this young sister Republic.

As Wm. H. Seward declared as far back as 1852: "The discovery of America and its development were but preliminary to the more sublime result now in the act of consummation,—the reunion of the two civilizations which, parting on the plains of Asia 4000 years ago and travelling ever after in opposite directions around the world, now meet again on the coast and islands of the Pacific Ocean." "Who does not see that this movement must effect our own complete emancipation from what remains of European influence and prejudice, and in turn develop the American opinion and influence which shall remould constitutional laws and customs in the land that is first greeted by the rising sun"!

It calls for devout thankfulness that the Committee has been able to accomplish such a stupendous task and to face the future with the full confidence of all parties whose interest has been elicited in the work.

Among the items in the long report we give the following:—
Grand total in gifts in cash and kind for all fields of work . . . . . $4,748,080.00

It is also interesting to note in connection with this that contributions for the Seventh Month were $34,340.32 as against collections for the same month last year of $25,072.51. Contributions for the last three months total more than for the corresponding months of 1921—$252,594.48 as against $107,322.62. Readers should give special attention to the contributions of the various groups of Friends. Some of the money in "Individual Contributions" represents money contributed by Friends who are not definitely affiliated with any particular Yearly Meeting, but most of the sum was contributed by people who are not Friends.

NEED FOR FAMINE RELIEF CONTINUES.

ROBERT W. DUNN.

After a trip through some of the southern volosts fed by the American Friends' Mission I can only repeat what I wrote two weeks ago. A new famine, or at least a continuation of the old famine, is now a fact in more than half of the eighteen volosts in the American fed territory. Feeding on a famine scale will have to continue throughout the coming winter. There is no other way of saving the population.

The conditions in Barabanovaya Volost, of which Gamaleyvka is the volost center, had prepared me for what I found in both Matveyskaya and Shestakovskaya Volosts. Jessica Smith, the Quaker Supervisor for this District, had told me that the entire crop of 800 dessiatines of millet had been ruined by the thirty days of uninterrupted drought, that more than half of the wheat was lost, that the barley was very bad and that the rye harvested had yielded a bare 25 poods to the dessiatine. (In good years this should run from 60 to 200 poods, depending upon the density of the planting.) This was Barabanovaya, one of the "better" volosts, where they have been saying a month ago, "the other crops look poor but we can depend on our millet." The showers of yesterday were not equal to the task of reviving this millet. It is gone and with it the hope of surviving through another winter, unless the Quakers continue their systematic feeding.

Together with Jessica Smith and Walter Wildman, Director of the Russian Unit, who has been making a visit to the field this week, I went south toward the Ural Cossack lands to explore the conditions in the two southern volosts.

We passed through the capital town of Matveyskaya Volost, wishing to see the actual conditions before we read any of the discouraging reports the volost officials would be expected to hand us. Stari Bekugorki, a town two-thirds Tartar and one-third Russian, was our first stop. Of the 140 dessiatines of rye from which a crop had been expected, only 80 yielded anything. Even if the crops had been extraordinarily fruitful from the amounts of seed planted (about 15 fants per soul) there would not have been enough grain to last them more than two or three months. With almost half of the planted land a total failure and the yield on the rest far below the medium, the outlook for this village is no better than the worst I have seen in some of the even more impoverished volosts to the north. It means another year of famine, nothing less.

Of course there will be little grain to plant this fall or next spring. But even had they sufficient to seed a larger area they would be unable to plow more than they did last fall. In some towns in this volost they estimated they would not be able to plow as much, so great has been the death rate of horses. Out of 2755 in this volost last summer only 223 remain. The human population has dropped from 11,500 to 6,000; there was one horse to every four or five persons last summer, now there is one horse to every twenty-seven souls.

In Shestakovskaya Volost it is even worse. A month ago they told Jessica Smith that only four of the ten villages would be able to feed themselves and that only if the crops were good. Yesterday they came to tell us that none of the villages could survive the winter without help for almost the entire population.

Take Pronkino for example. We have it on the word of both the village priest and the President of the Soviet that the millet is entirely burnt up and that the other crops, with the exception of the rye, promise almost nothing. Even the rye will yield a sickly crop as compared with other years previous. The President himself formerly owned thirteen horses. The famine has taken all but one. Last year he had four dessiatines planted; this year he has but one, and half of that is lost.

We ask this local official how much land the people in Pronkino will be able to plant. He answers that he knows they will not be able to plow as much as last year; even if they could, would it be worth while? "Dear tovaritch," he asked, as his eyes filled with tears, "is there any use planting the little rye we possess, if we are to starve during the winter?" It was the same question the peasants in these volosts put to Anna Haines last fall. And we answered as affirmatively as we felt we could, "Plant your rye, tovaritch, we will do what we can to help you." Some of those who heard these words from the lips of Anna Haines last summer have probably died. Some who will hear it from our lips will die—unless the Friends' organization, now much more completely equipped to do famine service, can keep pouring the food into Buzuluk County.

Then there is Bashirov, a dusty Tartar village where there was some cannibalism last winter. They tell us that last year they had cows and horses to kill. They lived on meat apparently—that of both man and animal. But they lived. They tell us their chances of surviving are less this fall. Their millet is altogether dried up. They are already going out to dig up weeds and roots in the field. They know there will be nothing else to eat during the winter. Some families, from the rye they have harvested, will be able to live a month, some six weeks, none of them any longer.

As for plowing for the future, they can think of nothing else. But it avails little to think when, for a population of 600, there are eleven horses, seven of which are at present too tired and sick to work. Of course there are no horses to be bought anywhere for less than from four to five hundred million roubles. No one in Bashirov ever saw that much paper money. It is quite out of the question to think of buying horses from itinerant horse speculators from Uralsk. Thus with no plowing to do, the population is reduced to sitting—sitting and waiting for winter to come and put an end to it all. . . . This the Tartars do not like. Many of them are intelligent, charming, alert persons, in many respects superior to some of the great Russians who live in the nearby villages. But both Russians and Tartars are human beings; both have their "right" to live and enjoy life even in the face of a hostile nature. It is against that hostile nature that the Friends' mission in co-operation with the Soviet Government will be waging a struggle throughout the coming winter. For there will be famine, unmistakable famine, in this and other towns and volosts in Buzuluk County, Russia.

NOTE—1 pood—36 lbs.; 1 funt—14 oz.; 1 dessiatine—approx. 2½ acres.

WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED IN GERMANY.

No one can measure the results of the child-feeding work in Germany; but the following letters, one from President Ebert of the German Republic, the other from one of the stenographers in the Berlin Office of the American Friends' Service Committee, indicate that the spirit which actuated us in all the work has been understood.

BERLIN, August 1, 1922.

In answer to your kind letter of July 27th of this year I desire to express my feeling of gratitude and joy for the splendid co-operation of the American Quakers with us in the blessed work of ministering to the undernourished children and mothers during the last two-and-a-half years. At a time when Germany was still cut off from all intercourse with the former enemy countries the Quakers appeared, bringing a message of friendship and good-will. Germany will never forget this. May the desire to be of real service in reconciling all nations, for which the Quakers stand, permeate all international relations and lead us toward a more promising future.

EBERT.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

It hardly seems possible to imagine that the Kinderholfmission does not exist anymore. Yes, the Mission closed "formally"—but we over here all feel that its spirit still lingers among us, and will be our guide in the future, in order to reach our aim—a common brotherhood.

We who remain in Germany will try to live up to the wonderful ideals you left us. I do hope that the seeds you planted among our youth will bear fruit one day. We must have patience—and particularly with ourselves, in order to follow the narrow path before us. Whenever we stumble on our way, we can always count on Him whose patience never fails.

Dear Friends, let me thank you for the great privilege you gave me in being able to take part in your work. I realize that my share was only a very, very small one, but whatever happens, the time in Dorotheenstrasse will always count among the brightest spots in my life. Even though my present work did not allow me to keep up the personal touch with the mission as I should have liked it, my thoughts often wandered towards my dear Kinderholfmission friends, and I hope they will forgive me for having been silent so long. Thank you for the patience you had with me. There are many things that are on my mind, but it is so difficult to express them in words—particularly in English words. My poor vocabulary, however, allows me to summarize my feelings in sending lots, lots of love and my very best wishes to all of you.

As ever,

Sincerely yours,
ELIZ. MAI.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING.—This, the fifth of the summer series of Quarterly Meetings, was held at West Grove, Eighth Month 25th, in one of the newest of our meeting-houses (nineteen years old), though an ancient stronghold in Quaker annals, the old meeting-house bearing date of 1786 having been used by our branch of Friends until it was replaced by the present structure in 1903. The resident members have become much reduced in numbers by death and removal to other districts, though the assemblage on the above date was above the average in size for the Western Quarter.

Early in the session there was brought forcefully to our attention the quotation to be found in Malachi iii:10—"Bring ye all the tithes into the store-house, that there may be meat in Mine house, and prove Me now herewith saith the Lord of Hosts," etc.; this had a settling effect on the meeting. A visiting minister referred to the account of Joseph of Arimathea given in the Gospels; he was a devout man, but lacked that boldness in acknowledging fearlessly to the world the Divine attributes of his Lord and Master, needed at that time as well as to-day.

The first session closed under a tender covering of the Divine presence.

In the business session which followed immediately, there was little out of the usual routine until the answers to the fourth Query were read, where references were made to Bible reading; much pertinent counsel was given. There is objection by some, that the daily reading of the Holy Scriptures is apt to become formal, but it was pointed out that a good form was a good thing to indulge in, and that daily Bible reading in the family and in individual capacity was most heartily to be encouraged; begun in early life and all through life it is a very great help in building up the spirit.

The answers to the Queries were candid, and they had a refreshing originality which gave them life.

A luncheon in the upstairs room attracted friends after adjournment, where social discourse kept pace with a well-whetted appetite for the good things served.

As has been the practice for years, a conference was held in the main meeting-room after lunch; at this time Wm. B. Harvey, who was one of the Yearly Meeting delegates to the conference recently held at Bluffton, Ohio, told of the proceedings of its various sessions; this gathering was composed of Christian sects who believe that by following the precepts of our Lord and Saviour, wars would not occur. Reports of the conference have appeared or will be given in these columns.
H.

At a recent conference on the Negro Question, Arthur E. James, Professor of Chemistry at Lincoln University, Pa., made among others these points:—

1. There is nearly as much difference between light and dark Negroes as between whites and Negroes, and also some hard feeling.
2. The Garvey movement, "Back to Africa," does not come from the best element of the Negro race in this country, and does not have their support.
3. The best way to educate the colored people is to teach them to teach themselves.

The Woodbrooke Extension Committee, England, has recently published a pamphlet by Edward Grubb entitled "The Society of Friends and What It Stands For." Particularly in view of the fact that it was written to be delivered as a lecture to non-Friends, it is one of the most explicit and concise statements of the Quaker Faith and its implications that we have seen, and should prove useful for giving to "enquirers." It can be had at 304 Arch Street.

Now it is First-day afternoon, and a company of us have gathered in Professor Boeck's garden at Mauer. We are Austrian, Dutch and English, and though we cannot all understand each other's language, this Quaker Meeting will be one of the greater Meetings of our experience. To feel an unspoken understanding of a common experience of God, going far beyond national barriers, is an experience we wish more Friends could share. There is a simplicity, a warmth, and a beauty about Austrian Quakerism which makes us very hopeful for its future.—From a Young Friends' Experience.

THE Quaker Embassy in Paris is in touch with people from many countries and nations, including Germans, Americans, Austrians, Serbians, missionaries on their way to Madagascar, Poles, Greeks, Russians, Italians, Japanese, Swiss, and people of Palestine and Constantinople. It reads like the report of the Day of Pentecost. May the results be as wonderful!

THERE are fourteen Normal Schools in Pennsylvania. Most of them conduct summer schools for the training of teachers, who have attended the past summer to the number of about 8,000.

It seemed to the members of the General Conference Section of Friends' Disarmament Council that no better work could be undertaken this summer than to give Friends' message on the abolition of war to these teachers, whose influence among their pupils will extend far and wide.

Therefore, application was made to those in charge of these Summer Schools, in the name of the Society of Friends, for the opportunity of addressing their students. Favorable replies were received from eleven of them, no reply having been received from California, in Washington County and the Principal of Lock Haven declining.

The Executive Secretary, O. Edward Janney, employed last month in visiting these schools in Pennsylvania, and addressing the students on the topic, "The Educational Approach to a Warless World." In this service he has visited the Normal School Summer Schools in the following order: Millersville, 600 students; Indiana, 1,146; Slippery Rock, 900; Clarion, 574; Edinboro, 670; Mansfield, 597; Kutztown, 397; Bloomsburg, 85; Shippensburg, 592; West Chester, 360; East Stroudsburg, 460. In all, 6,761 teachers received the message.

To reach these eleven schools it was necessary to travel 1,875 miles by rail, trolley and auto, occupying twenty-four days.

At all points the message was well received, and the courtesy shown by those in charge was delightful. It is felt that this sowing of seed has been well worth while.—The Intelligencer.

A QUAKER ON COMPROMISE.—In His Swarthmore lecture upon "Religion and Public Life," Carl Heath dealt with compromise in a suggestive manner:

"What is the content of this word compromise that gives it an ill sound in religious or in moral conduct? The streams of life produce an endless series of complicated knots in conduct in which at most we see truth relative to mixed conditions. It is not political compromise that is the enemy of religion, but the method by which compromise is reached; the method that is falsely called democratic, of reaching an agreed end by immoral surrender of principle and by voting down and coercing one another. A nobler way of transcending differences has been achieved in the Quaker method of reaching a decision, without vote or counting of heads, by a spirit of co-operative search for the best. This Christian method needs to be applied to all the problems of corporate life."

This will sound to many readers a most impossible suggestion. But, speaking as one who has seen it work, I can testify to the value of the Quaker method. No vote is ever taken at the annual meeting of the Friends and in other assemblies of which I have personal experience. There is a patient, sincere, charitable discussion; there is a readiness to wait for the guidance of the spirit; there is the open mind; and in the midst there is the spirit of love and truth. It works.—From the Christian Century.

"THE leader for the time being, whoever he may be, is but an instrument, to be used until broken and then cast aside; and if he is worth his salt he will care no more when he is broken than a soldier cares when he is sent where his life is forfeit in order that the victory may be won. In the long fight for righteousness the watchword for all of us is spend and be spent. It is of little matter whether any one man fails or succeeds; but the cause shall not fail, for it is the cause of mankind. We here in America hold in our hands the hope of the world, the fate of coming years; and shame and disgrace will be ours if, in our eyes, the light of high resolve is dimmed, if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men."—T. R., Carnegie Hall Speech, Third Month 20, 1912.

"IT CAN'T BE DONE."

There are two sorts of people in the world, those who view a difficulty in their way as a notice to quit work, and those who see it as something to be overcome. "It can't be done, and it's no use to try," is the mental exclamation of the first when mountains of opposition appear. "There are no Alps," is the attitude of the second. A Napoleon makes a road through the Simplon pass. Difficulties, it would seem, are the great test of a man's soul.

In the outward affairs of our daily life this difference is very evident. A tree is to be felled—an eighty foot tree—and it is needful to fasten a rope to the top so that it may be guided in the right direction when it falls. Who will scale the height? Able-bodied workmen have not the nerve to attempt it, but a little man, nearly blind, is equal to the occasion.

Often we assume that human nature cannot be changed, our own or others. "The thing that hath been is that which shall be." The famous Preacher of Jerusalem has a great following. Faint-hearted and indolent, we content ourselves with mediocrity of character and fail to climb to the moral height appointed us. Habits have us in their unyielding grasp, we think. Yet some one tells us of a woman of eighty, who was careless in her habits till then, when she entered a family where method and order prevailed, and she, too, followed the rule of "a place for everything and everything in its place."

According to popular judgment there are in civic life multitudes of things that "can't be done." "You cannot carry out the Golden Rule in business." "You cannot enforce prohibition." "You cannot do away with war." "You cannot conquer the Germans by love." In fact, the Gospel of Christ is an impossible Gospel in many respects when you think to apply it to national or international affairs. Such people forget the wonderful truth, "Love never faileth."

It may strengthen our courage to recall various "impossible" things that have been done. The transmission of the human voice by telephone, the radio marvels—what would our grandfathers have said of such propositions? "Fulton's Folly" and the tunnel under the Hudson taxed the popular credulity to the limit. But the advances of science are so many and so wonderful that we forbear to say that any new mode of travel or communication cannot be realized, lest we be like the speaker in the English Parliament proclaiming that no steam-propelled vessel could cross the Atlantic because it could not carry enough coal to last the voyage—when lo! the feat was accomplished, perhaps even while the debate was going on, the vessel arrived.

If we find it thus rash to predict failure in the sphere of matter, how much more preposterous is it to say, "It can't be done" in another sphere where the forces are more purely heaven-born and heaven-directed! If a conviction strikes us that a personal action or course of actions is right, if we know that God wills the routing of evil and the uplifting of a higher standard on the earth, none of us should doubt the certain triumph of Right. "We are to set no limit to what God can do through us if we are faithful," says the London Epistle of 1922.

Then—

"He who sees the future sure
The baffling present may endure."

The difficulties we meet under such circumstances should therefore be nothing more than something to be overcome. It is not always that we can quote Theodore Roosevelt with satisfaction, but he has some brave words on this subject: "In the long fight for righteousness the watchword for all of us is spend and be spent. It is of little matter whether any one man fails or succeeds; but the cause shall not fail, for it is the cause of mankind."

We may go again to our ancestors for courage. The "service of love in war-time" was a beautiful conception, and has been fine in its effectiveness. But this work has been for the individual workers scarcely the venture of faith that impelled Mary Fisher, for instance, to visit the Grand Turk, or that led Mary Dyer and her companions again and again to face the tedium and dangers of Colonial travel, the exactions of the Puritan conscience, and finally to suffer martyrdom on Boston Common. Our ancestors, says Dr. Jowett, now of London, "would even obey the grip of a dumb imperative, not seeing the distant scene. They went forth, 'not knowing whither they went.' They were not afraid to take risks with God.

They marched out with trumpets blowing over the roadless moors, trusting to the guidance of the Lord. "Dare we do this now to the extent they did it, or do we say: It isn't safe and we can't accomplish anything by this rashness?"

The foreign field of adventure and labor is appealing, but the tamer home-field is within the reach of more of our members and meetings. If we don't do our part, who will cultivate it? Nor can we do without faith and courage at home any more than abroad. "Without are fightings, within are fears." Discouragements abound. "Former efforts have failed." "It can't be done." Acknowledging there are some things that can't be done, we still need men to do the much that is declared "impossible." Somewhere in New England, it is said, there is found this brief but telling epitaph for a woman with a large family and many neighborly outreachings:—"She did what she couldn't."

And Lord Shaftesbury spoke with authority when he said:—"Let no man despair of a good cause for want of helpers. Let him persevere, persevere, FERSEVERE, and God will raise up friends and helpers."

MORE NOTES OF INDIAN TRAVEL.

When European settlers first came to our Atlantic seaboard, they found the aboriginal inhabitants more or less useful, and more or less cordial, just in proportion to the treatment which they themselves accorded to the occupants who had preceded them. In almost every instance—if not in every one—the white men were received in a friendly spirit, and it was not until they committed overt acts that they were met by bloodshed and slaughter. Unfortunately there is far more truth than jest in the statement that the original settlers in Massachusetts "first fell upon their knees, and then upon the aborigines." Almost all colonial history is full of brutal incidents of which the Indians were the victims. In New England they were more extreme than elsewhere* and even our own Pennsylvania, after the time of William Penn and his immediate associates, was not by any means free from blame.

As the encroachments of the whites proceeded, the Indians were driven further and further back, and there gradually grew up the "reservation system," which involved the segregation of the various tribes upon large tracts of land, held for them collectively by the United States Government, under Federal jurisdiction and wherein all interests were communal.

It must be remembered that the Anglo-Saxon lust for land, broadly speaking, is unknown among our original Americans. In the inevitable conflict between the races, they were bound to be submerged, and the system which grew up had some analogies to that to which they were familiar before the European invasion. In many instances the treaties with the tribes and in consideration of which they renounced their claims to enormous tracts of land over which theretofore they had roamed at will, obligated the United States to see that they were undisturbed "as long as the grass grew and the water ran."

It may be a grievous fact, but it is nevertheless the fact, that in too many instances the locations of the reservations were arrived at by trying to discover land which it was supposed at the time would never be of any value to the whites. In many cases this intention has signally failed. The stupendous expansion of our country was unforeseen, oil or other mineral wealth was undreamed of. So some reservations have been shifted, and the poor owners beaten about from pillar to post when we greedy whites coveted their possessions.

I am not one of those who believe that either in law or in morals the Indians were entitled to claim as owners vast domains over which they were accustomed to roam and hunt and fish while they were yet strictly nomadic in their habits. I contend that civilization has a claim of a higher order. But full provision for the red man should be made, and having been made he should be protected in his ownership of that provision.

By the middle of the last century the reservation system was a part of the policy we had adopted. With all its manifold and manifest weaknesses it is not improbable that in the then condition of advancement towards civilization of the Indians, it had as much to commend it as any other plan that could be devised. Probably, too, but for human frailties in administration, much better results could have been attained than those that have been realized. One has but to look at such men as our own revered Jonathan Richards, who served as an Indian Agent for so many years, to be convinced of the truth of this statement.

But with the education of the Indians and their advancement in civilization something more was needed. A communal system of government and of land tenure, whilst a justifiable makeshift during a period of transition, is not compatible with American institutions, and cannot long endure in a land of freedom. Far-seeing men and women became convinced of the necessity for a radical change. Foremost among these was the late Senator Henry L. Dawes of Massachusetts, whose sagacity and experience in the United States Senate for long marked him as a foremost champion of the cause of the Indians. The important piece of constructive legislation known as the "Dawes Act" and passed by Congress in the middle eighties has been the foundation for all recent enactments having for their object the elimination of the reservation system and the absorption of the Indian into the American body politic.

The gist of these laws is primarily to make up a definite roll of each tribe which shall include the name of every individual entitled to be considered as a member of that particular tribe or band. Following this the land is divided so that each individual shall have his share. For this a "trust patent" is issued which describes the particular tract of land as belonging to a specified individual, but the title thereto remains in the United States as trustee, so that there may be no encumbrances placed on it, nor any alienation for a prescribed period, say thirty years, unless in the meantime the Secretary of the Interior, who has the ultimate authority in such matters, should declare the individual owner fully competent to manage his own affairs and grant him a patent in fee to his land. Every man, woman and child is included in the trust; each receives a share of the land.

As the reservations varied greatly in size, and many of them were of prodigious area as compared with the number of Indians to which they belonged, the surplus was sold and the proceeds placed in the United States Treasury to the credit of the particular tribe involved, later to be doled out in per capita payments to those entitled to it.

There have been various modifications of this general plan to meet particular situations, but with the same underlying idea. Sometimes mineral and similar rights have gone to the owners of the surface; sometimes they have remained as tribal property. On some reservations the individual allotments have been but a few acres each, as in regions where the total acreage was very small, and where through irrigation only the most intensive processes of agriculture can be carried on and where five or ten acres are as many as any man can look after. On others again each allotment may be several hundred acres, as in grazing districts, where several acres are necessary to support a single sheep or steer. A quarter section of land, however, 160 acres, has very frequently been taken as the unit.

All this long explanation is to lead us to the point of my trip this summer into the Indian country. The reservations where allotments were first made, have now reached the point where all of the members of the tribes have been turned loose from every phase of governmental supervision, and have been left to put into practice what they have been taught. Hence there is a chance to appraise the practical value of this adventure in civilization, this endeavor in about two or three generations to make highly civilized "white men" out of savages. Wisconsin and South Dakota were chosen for this particular investigation, because here, side by side almost, were to be found all the various stages from an unallotted reservation, to those where there is nominally a superintendent, but where that official performs no functions of any kind.

To the east of central Wisconsin are two reservations of the latter class, that of the Oneidas, and that of the Stockbridges and Munsees. The first name recalls New York and the Six Nations, the second one Massachusetts and the Berkshire Hills; the last this very Pocono region where these notes are being written, Mt. Minni at the Delaware Water Gap being named for this same tribe.

The country is a rolling, agricultural one, and the Indian holdings are intermingled with those of their white neighbors. In many instances one could not tell by a superficial observation which was an Indian and which was a white farm, though as a rule the latter were better kept, had better buildings and more stock, and appeared as though owned by the more prosperous members of the community.

There are no longer any government schools for these Indians; the public schools are open to them seemingly without unjust discrimination. Local elective offices are held by Indians, and in many ways they seemed as though they had ceased to be in any way distinct from their neighbors, any more than would be men of English or Irish or French or German extraction. Yet we came away feeling that this did not tell the whole story and that there were among them too many failures, too many who through lack of experience or improvidence had disposed of their lands for a mere pittance, and were rapidly drifting into the same situation as the so-called "landless Indians" of California, for whose care our Government is making constant provision by the purchase of land on which to settle them. It is a racial characteristic for the Indian to take no thought for the morrow. What he has he spends or consumes, with no thought of the day when his slender resources dissipated, there will not be at hand even necessary bread. Taxes worry him. If he is a citizen and owns his land in fee he certainly should bear his share of the cost of roads and bridges and schools and governmental activities paid for from the public purse. So long as the patent in fee has not been issued and the title is in the United States in trust, no taxes can be levied or collected. It requires some degree of civilization for a man to want to pay taxes. White men are known on occasion to evade this privilege. The point is that in too many instances the Indians neither comprehend what is involved nor make provision to meet the pecuniary obligations and thus lose their possessions. But those who have emerged are certainly progressing. Near the Oneidas is a cannery factory. One hundred dollars per acre is a not unusual return from peas sold to the cannery and the season is long enough to still admit of fodder corn being raised on the same land. Many members of this tribe are employed in various capacities in the Indian Bureau, which gives occupation to some hundreds of Indians.

THE central passion of Christ's life was a passion to redeem men, but He never wished to give men an easy time. He believed in men, and assumed they had the capacity for heroic things. He wanted them not only that He might give them rest in Heaven, but that He might lead them through a life of great labor, which would be worthy of the Divine element in them. He was very explicit with them about the fact that following Him would mean a daily cross and much sacrifice. He insisted that to keep faith with Him men would have to give up their other plans in life, and relinquish all their purely personal ambitions.—HERBERT GRAY.

BECOMING A FRIEND.

There has recently come into our hands a communication addressed to a Monthly Meeting's Committee from a person who was seriously considering joining the Monthly Meeting. We do not feel that we are abusing any confidence; names and dates are withheld, the only statement we feel any liberty to make is that the writer is not a citizen or resident of the United States and we believe never has been.

The honesty of intent commends the letter and we believe others than ourselves will find more than mere satisfaction in its perusal.

The individual was granted the privilege of full membership.—[EDS.]

DEAR FRIENDS (the Committee):—

Your letter of ——— regarding my application for membership to the Society of Friends has been received and I have carefully reconsidered the matter in the light of the book (concerning the Principles and Practices of Friends) which you sent me.

In order to answer your questions I must first of all say that I have never been a member of any religious organization. When I left school in London, I was a constant attendant at a Congregational Church in London and I missed very few meetings for about four years. When I left London I continued for a short while at a similar church here, but then the war broke out. As I did not become a soldier my presence at church was embarrassing. The pulpit was a recruiting station and I felt happier away. Since the war ended my attendance at any religious gathering has been spasmodic. I have from time to time felt that I should join some religious body, but I always found that there were certain sacraments to take and creeds to subscribe to. I could never bring myself to the point of wanting to be baptized in water, and I would not do so merely to be a church member. It may have been that I could have joined a church without being baptized, but so far as I am aware all the different sects believe in an outward baptism, and either it is essential or not essential. If it is essential I could only say that as yet I was not ready for it, if it is non-essential then I felt that it was wrong to submit to it. On the other hand, there is a baptism spoken of in the Scriptures which always appealed to me to be of importance —namely, the baptism of the Spirit. I have been waiting for that for fourteen years, and I have not got it yet. I would like to experience the true meaning of the life led by the Spirit. It may be that the Spirit of God has been leading me even when I was blind. Looking back I must confess that such is the case. But I cannot truthfully say that my life is "filled with the Spirit."

I now come to the point as to why I wish to join the Friends. You believe in the Inward Light. This seems to me to be the true answer to all my queries. It seems to me that the Spirit-filled life is one in which the Light is very strong. I believe that the one true baptism will come as I follow the light and that the light will grow stronger as I am true to the measure which I have already received. All this may come even were I not a member of any church, but I feel the need of the help of the church as a body, and it will be a testimony to others of my beliefs by the mere fact that I am openly identified with a body of Christians.

We all know even in our daily life that it is easier to accomplish anything when we are with others who are thinking the same way, and I believe in the spiritual life the same holds true. On the other hand, to be a member of the Society will confer certain obligations on me, and the very fact that I will strive to live up to those obligations will be helpful and will increase my Christian character.

This briefly is my personal reason for applying for membership. There are other features about the Society which appeal to me. The Society has applied to political and family life the principles of Christ's "Sermon on the Mount" in its fullest and broadest application; but all this appears to me to be the natural outcome of "walking in the light even as He is in the Light." The various truths which Friends stand for, such as opposition to war, are merely examples of the fact that no man can walk in the light and hate his brother.

I thank you for your letter and I am sorry that it is not possible for me to speak to you personally.

Yours very truly,

P. S.—This letter was written two weeks ago. After re-reading it I feel that it correctly but briefly states my case.

THE WIND ACROSS THE WHEAT.

Beat high against the headland, dash hard against the shore;
Break into surging, foaming spray with thundering roll and roar!
Boom, O Billows, in pitiless rage 'round the rocks off Highland Light;
Strike the triumphant note of power, the awful chord of might.
In the roll and the roar of your organ peal there's no note half so sweet
As the lighter, softer melody of the wind across the wheat.

Sigh soft, O Wind, through the hemlock bending its branches low,
Mean thro the murmuring pine trees in evidence sad and slow;
Sound in the leafless willow the dirge of what is past,
Strike the key of the yet to be in the highest note of your blast.
In the wail and the sigh of your plaintive cry, there's no note half so sweet

As the rhythmic undulation of the wind across the wheat.

Join in fantastic measure, O Rain-drops, flashing bright,
Wake the mountain streams to music beneath your touch so light,
Let the dripping leaves beat time to the melody you make,
Dance to your tripping measure on the polished silver lake,
In the liveliest strain of your gayest song there's no note half so sweet
As the rising-falling melody of the wind across the wheat.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

LOVE ONE ANOTHER.—I once read somewhere of a little girl who constantly followed her father around with this question, "Father, what can I do for you?" She was as happy as she could be when he gave her something to do for him. One day he said to her, perhaps weary with her asking, "Child, why do you ask that question so much?" "O, father," she replied, with tears in her eyes, "because I can't help it." She loved her father, and love delights to express itself in doing something for others. Love is always wishing to do everything in its power to help make others happy. A bare-footed news-boy was working his way through the crowded street car selling his papers. A white-haired old gentleman questioned him concerning his home and his earnings. He told him there was a younger brother at home who was a cripple and could not do anything, but had to be supported. "Ah, I see!" said the kind old gentleman, in a very tender tone, "that makes it hard for you; you could do much better if you were alone." The shabby little fellow was poor, but proud that he was able to do something for his brother, and standing erect, replied with indignation: "No, I couldn't. Jim's somebody to go home to—he's lots of help. What would be the good of having luck if nobody was glad, or of getting things if there was nobody to divide with?" Love always delights to serve. It is never satisfied unless it is doing something for someone. There is a story told by a popular author of a woman who decided to spend a legacy that had been left to her in making in front of her residence a beautiful garden that would attract the attention and admiration of her neighbors, and lead them to regard her as a public benefactor. She had never been popular in the village, and her heart was hungry for the respect and honor that had always been denied her. After purchasing the best seeds from the best seedsmen she instructed her gardener that none must be planted too near the fence lest the children pluck the blooms. The garden was a very great success. It was without doubt the most beautiful garden in the village, and everybody admired the flowers, but only from a distance. She did not win the admiration she sought. She missed the tender expression of gratitude from the villagers. Something was wrong, and she knew it. Then Commencement Day came.

The garden across the street was not to be compared with hers, but the girls went in crowds to gather blossoms from it for that important occasion. But nobody came to her garden. Then Memorial Day came, and children flocked to the same unpretentious garden and reached over the fence and plucked the flowers which they knew were intended for them. Then when the best loved man in the village died the very same neighbor's garden was again visited and many fragrant blooms were gathered to lay upon the casket. But nobody ever thought of asking the owner of the most beautiful garden in the village for even one solitary blossom. "Something must be wrong. They don't like me in the fixed-up place any more than they did in the old," murmured the disappointed woman. "What can be wrong?" she asked herself again. This question remained unanswered until the wedding day of the prettiest girl in the village. Every yard and garden was levied upon for fall flowers for the decorations, and the bouquets for the sixteen bridesmaids—every one but Eliza's. That evening Eliza got out the catalogue to order her fall bulbs. But she did not open it. She was too busy realizing what had been wrong. She had planted her beautiful garden all for herself; she had not given a thought to other people except as she desired that they might minister to her own glory. Then she said to herself: "I'm going to plant in with my fall flowers something I left out in the spring. It is not in the catalogue, for it is more important than the plants on the biggest color plate. It's love." She had tried to be happy without love, and the result was that she had made a miserable failure. We need more love; there is a lack of love in the world to-day. Someone has said:

"Do you know the world is dying
For a little bit of love?"

A little boy had a singing bird of which he was very fond. It was his only pet. His mother was ill, and the singing of the bird annoyed her and upset her delicate nerves. The bird was much loved by the boy, but with a brave heart he carried the bird and cage to a distant part of the house, hoping that it could not be heard by his sick mother, but still she could hear the thrilling sound. One day without telling anybody he took the bird with its cage and gave it away. His mother missed the sound and was much touched when he told her he had given it away. Then she said to him: "I thought you loved the little bird?" "So I did, mother," was his reply, "but I love you more." Do you love Jesus more than pleasure, or pets, or toys, or anything else? Do you? Jesus wants your love, and He wants you to love one another. This is His commandment. Love one another as He has loved you.—ALFRED BARRATT.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The illiteracy rate for Negroes ten years of age and over throughout the country is 22.9 per cent. as compared with 2.0 per cent. for the native born and 13.1 per cent. for foreign born whites. Although the figure for Negroes is less by 7.5 per cent. than in 1910, it still presents by far the gravest educational problem of the population.

A distribution of the 22.9 per cent. Negro illiteracy however, is interesting and ranges from 5.0 per cent. in the Middle Atlantic States, which includes New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, to 27.9 per cent. in the East South Central States, which includes Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, the District of Columbia, North and South Carolina. The lowest Negro illiteracy, 2.9 per cent., is found in New York State and the highest, 38.5 per cent., in Louisiana.

Illiteracy among Negroes is practically in direct proportion to the amount spent per capita for their education. New York spends $45.32 per child and Negro illiteracy is 2.9 per cent.—the lowest rate among Negroes in any State; Pennsylvania spends $36.20, and Negro illiteracy is 6.1 per cent.;

Maryland spends $6.38, and Negro illiteracy is 18.2 per cent.; Mississippi spends $2.26, and Negro illiteracy is 29.3 per cent.; Louisiana spends $1.31, the lowest amount spent by any State, and Negro illiteracy is 38.5 per cent., the highest illiteracy rate among Negroes in any State.

The most convenient units for measuring the facilities provided for white and colored children are:

- a. Expenditures for Education.
- b. Length of School Terms, and
- c. The number of Pupils under the care of one teacher.

a. Expenditures per child for white and colored children in Southern States are as follows:

State	White Child	Colored Child
Alabama	$ 9.41	$ 1.78
Arkansas	12.95	4.59
Delaware	12.61	7.68
District of Columbia	38.53	42.21
Florida	11.50	2.64
Georgia	9.58	1.76
Kentucky	8.13	8.53
Louisiana	13.73	1.31
Maryland	13.79	6.83
Mississippi	10.60	2.26
North Carolina	5.27	2.02
Oklahoma	14.21	9.96
South Carolina	10.00	1.44
Tennessee	8.27	4.83
Texas	10.08	5.74
Virginia	7.72	3.18

b. In standard Northern schools the number of days of schooling is rarely less than 170. The days of schooling provided white and colored children in the Southern States are as follows:

State	White Child	Colored Child
Alabama	132	102
Florida	142	102
Georgia	157	100
Kentucky	152	119
Louisiana	156	94
South Carolina	156	78

c. For 8,150,448 white pupils in the 16 Southern States there are 174,080 teachers, or 1 teacher to each 36 pupils. For 2,977,536 Negroes there are 36,920 teachers or 1 teacher to each 56 pupils.

COLLEGES.

It is estimated that the following Americans of Negro descent have been graduated from college:

1820-1829	3
1830-1849	7
1850-1859	12
1860-1869	44
1870-1879	313
1880-1889	738
1890-1899	1126
1900-1909	1613
1910-1919	2861

During recent years there have been the following graduates:

1914	250
1915	281
1916	338
1917	455
1918	384
1919	373
1920	364
1921	461

HEALTH.

The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, which numbers among its policy-holders 1,600,000 Negroes, one-sixth of the entire Negro population, announces that in 1921 the provisional death rate of insured Negroes had declined from 17.5 per 1,000 to 13.2 per 1,000, a drop of 25 per cent. "This marked decline," says the report, "on analysis, can be traced to improvements in the death rates from tuberculosis, pneumonia, heart disease, Bright's disease, malaria, typhoid fever and pellagra." "There are," the report further states, "obviously a great many factors at work which are operating favorably on the life and health of our Negro population. The last decade has seen a very encouraging development of health activities in the South and Southwest. At the same time, the economic status of Negroes has risen both during the war period and thereafter."

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE French Chamber of Deputies has postponed action on the Washington Treaties, pending the arrival of complete documentary material from Washington.

THE famous English battle cruisers Lion and Princess Royal, and the battleships Orion, Monarch, Conqueror and Erin, have been ordered to be scrapped in accordance with the terms of the Washington Treaties.

WORK AT THE FAIRS.—The campaigns at the West Chester and Wilmington Fairs are over, and the work at the Mt. Holly is under way. The work at West Chester was under the leadership of the Women's International League, but all the women's organizations of Chester County co-operated. Augustus Cadwallader gave a talk to the crowd one day on the next step toward permanent peace.

At Wilmington Friends of both branches and the recently-organized council for Reduction of Armaments co-operated in peace work at the Delaware State Fair. A series of lantern-slides continuously exhibited, presented some of the facts of the futility of war and the better ways of settling international difficulties. In addition to large quantities of other literature, nearly six thousand fans were distributed, each one bearing a peace message.

PROFESSOR ALLEJANDRO ALVAREZ, a Chilean delegate to the Institute of International Law, which met at Grenoble, France, during the latter part of Eighth Month, presented at one of the sessions of the Institute plans for a "world association of states," to link together the Pan-American Union, the League of Nations, and the nations at present members of neither. The association proposed by Professor Alvarez have the primary purpose of co-ordinating the nations of the world, not of forming a super-state. The League of Nations as now constituted was felt by the Institute to be inadequate largely because the United States, Germany and Russia are not members.

JAPAN has spent 500 millions of dollars in Siberia in carrying out the military plans there which have now been abandoned. Japanese troops are now being withdrawn. This expenditure, a burden on Japan as heavy as an expenditure of six billions would be for the United States, has reaped nothing but the ill-will of the far-eastern republic of Chita. Not a single concession or commercial advantage has been gained.

THE MEETING OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.—The Council of the League of Nations met in Geneva on the thirty-first of Eighth Month, and the Assembly four days later. The Council corresponds roughly to the Senate, the Assembly to the House of Representatives, except that the Council has a much greater share of the authority of the League of Nations than the Senate has of the legislature of the United States.

Three problems in particular are likely to engage the attention of the League: the problem of Austria, the problem of the control of trade in arms and ammunition, and the question of the admission of Germany to the League. First place on the agenda has been given the Austrian problem.

Austria has been for a long time on the verge of a complete collapse, and her difficulties have become even more serious with the steady rise in prices and decline in value of the krona this summer. To prevent utter demoralization Premier Seipel has been investigating the possibilities of alliances with Germany, Italy, or Czecho-Slavia. Any one of these arrangements would be "viewed with grave concern" by some influential European nation, so upon the League of Nations falls the task of finding a solution for this serious problem.

The refusal of the United States to ratify the convention of St. Germain-en-Laye of Ninth Month 10, 1919, for the control of private trade in arms and ammunition leaves that question as it was at the end of the war, and some action will probably be taken by the League. Aside from the obvious danger of private firms drawing large profits from this trade, it is considered unsafe for the first products of western civilization which get into the hands of the numerous uncivilized tribes of Africa and Asia to be weapons of war.

The Swiss delegation has been instructed to vote in favor of the admission of Germany to the League, if that is proposed, so that matter may come up for discussion. There is some feeling in Germany that the League is the tool of France, and that Germany can gain little by membership.

The British delegation to the Assembly contains a woman alternate; she is a close political friend of Lloyd-George, who expects to be present himself to take part in the discussion of the Austrian question.

TWO VIEWS OF FRANCO-GERMAN RELATIONS.—The two quotations which follow, the first two from the ultra-conservative German daily, the Deutsche Zeitung, and the second from Premier Poincaré's speech at the dedication of the war-memorial at Thiancourt, in the Liberated Regions, near the border of Lorraine, show two similar views of the question of Franco-German relations.

The Deutsche Zeitung says: "One thing has become clear. The period of Germany's assumed rôle as a passive sufferer must end. It is impossible to reach an understanding with France. Germany must be active and must carry out a policy which will prepare grounds upon which she can demand her rights.

"Neither violence against Germany, nor France's 800,000 bayonets, can hinder the ultimate doom of France. In an upheaval against France, or on an open battlefield against her, Germany, with the exception of Poland, which is also decayed, will have all Europe on her side.

"We have no more obligations toward France. The Treaty of Versailles is impossible to fulfil, and therefore does not exist."

At Thiancourt, Premier Poincaré said: "You citizens, who have seen your parents, wives, children and friends fall before your eyes because of German barbarity, can you comprehend that today, after our hard-won victory, there are certain people in the world who are blind enough to advise us to leave unfinished the authors of this outrage against civilization and relieve Germany of indemnities to which the families of these martyrs are justly entitled?

"Germany violated all of the recognized rules of warfare, she burned, pillaged and laid waste without justice or reason, she bombarded unprotected towns and used poison gas, all in an effort to win by terror a war which she despaired of winning in the field. It does not suffice that since their defeat a certain number of Germans have weakly repudiated their crime and destruction. When it was being used and thought practical all Germans encouraged or at least tolerated it.

"All Germany is associated with the sacking and burning of the devastated regions, and all must therefore equally assume the terrible damage we have suffered, and we know how to exact reparation for it."

The Deutsche Zeitung is a very conservative paper that does not speak for a large section of the German people. The action of France in approving of the reparations compromise recently shows that Poincaré does not necessarily mean all that can be inferred from his words. But the spirit shown by both utterances is one which makes difficult the permanent solution of the problem of Franco-German relations.

The attitude of the French government is based on the hypothesis that Germany is alone responsible for the war, and must therefore be punished; if those who see clearly that this theory is untenable, that the war was the logical outcome of the policy of military preparedness being followed by all nations, would express clearly their conviction that a different policy, not the punishment of the defeated party, is what is needed, the French government would speedily notice the voice of the world's opinion, which it cannot afford to ignore.

"Friends realized, too late to help form moral and spiritual forces that might have prevented the last war, that they had a responsibility for showing to the world a new way of life, a way of life, that would take the place of the old method of force, now almost universally recognized to be a mistake of overcoming difficulties between nations. However, it is not too late to prevent future wars, and the responsibility is still ours."—A. F. S. C. Bulletin.

REPARATIONS COMPROMISE ACCEPTED.—After struggling for a month on the verge of a serious disagreement, after Lloyd George and Poincaré "agreed to disagree" as the only outcome of their conference in London early in Eighth Month; the Inter-allied Reparations Commission has reached a compromise agreement, acceptable to both England and France, whereby the reparations payments Germany was scheduled to make during the rest of this year are postponed. The question of a moratorium of two or three years is to be discussed after Germany has balanced her budget, reduced her foreign obligations, and made other reforms in her finances.

The compromise is the result of the determined efforts of the Belgian representative on the Reparations Commission to prevent a break between France and England. Reports from Berlin indicate that the first German reaction to the arrangement is one of satisfaction.

FREE SPEECH PRISONERS.

Though it is nearly four years since the close of the war, seventy-six political prisoners are still held in Federal prisons under war-time free-speech convictions. The majority are serving sentences of ten and twenty years, and their aggregate sentences amount to upwards of eight hundred years. A number of church, civic and labor organizations have been trying for a long period to secure the release of these men, and hundreds of thousands of citizens have signed petitions for a general amnesty such as that which at the close of the Civil War freed even Confederate prisoners who had borne arms against the Government, but all amnesty efforts have failed. The Espionage Law, under which the men are serving, was suspended Third Month 3, 1921.

None of the prisoners had any German sympathies. All the German spies and special agents were freed long ago. In every instance where the cases have been reviewed by a superior court the men have been exonerated of any charges of violent acts. All that remains is the charge of speaking or writing against war, and in some of the cases there is even no record of this, and mere active membership in their labor organization was deemed sufficient, in those days of public excitement, for conviction for being a party to "a conspiracy to obstruct the war effort." In all but five scattered cases the men are workmen, who were employed in basic industries and were members of the Industrial Workers of the World. They were convicted in three groups, in Chicago, Sacramento and Kansas City, Kansas.

Recently when a committee representing individuals and organizations interested in upholding the American tradition of freedom of opinion called on President Harding with a request for a general amnesty in these cases, the President replied that the cases would be considered individually. Later, however, the Administration took the view that only cases where the prisoner had made individual application for clemency could be considered. Inasmuch as fifty-four of the men have steadfastly refused to make such applications the situation is difficult. They take the view that as they were imprisoned in a body they should be let out together. They declare that their sense of solidarity and loyalty to one another will not permit any of them to be a party toward securing any advantage over his fellows. With the prisoners this is a burning moral issue from which nothing can move them. They feel that it is a matter of personal integrity.

Efforts are being made to get the President to consider the cases under some general classification, or at least to take up the matter of reducing the sentences to a reasonable peace-time basis, but so far no progress has been made. During the latter days of the previous Administration some two hundred war-time long-term sentences were reduced to a nominal basis, but so far the President has shown no inclination to follow this precedent.

For nearly three years the United States has been the only country that participated in the war to retain prisoners incarcerated under war-time emergency laws restricting freedom of speech. In England the maximum sentence for such offenses was six months, and the other Allied countries released prisoners of this character under a general amnesty before the close of 1919. In European liberal and labor circles there has been much criticism of the attitude of our Government in its treatment of these war dissenters.

A "LOST" BRITISH SECT IN RUSSIA.

RELIEF WORKERS DISCOVER NATIVE QUAKERS

Since undertaking relief work in Russia during the war, the Society of Friends has continually had news of the existence of groups of so-called Quakers, but has never been able to make any contacts with the sect, although they have been well in touch with not dissimilar bodies, such as the Doukhobors and the Molokani.

Better fortune, however, has met two of their most recent workers who are now fighting the famine in the Buzuluk area. One of them, a well-known Norwich journalist, describes how they came upon one of those groups as they were picking up all their worldly possessions preparatory to migrating for a more fertile region in the Caucasus. "In the rain the men folk were busy taking their little wagons to pieces and three dromedaries (whether their own or borrowed) looked very miserable and thin."

A meeting was arranged with them before their departure and a correspondent writes:

"As they sat on boxes and benches on the other side of the table one could not help being struck by their fine faces—especially the face of a matronly woman who sat silent with folded hands. Whether it was her headgear or what I don't know, but I couldn't think at the time whom she reminded me of, but it has struck me since that she was a little like Elizabeth Fry as pictured.

The answers they gave to our questions were extraordinarily interesting—especially the fact that according to tradition they had been started about 300 years ago by other people. They looked, I should add, remarkably clean, considering the conditions under which they had been lately living.

They told us that although they refused to register for military service they do register in the Commune for agricultural work. In the Czar's time 609 of them refused to bear arms and were most of them imprisoned, the leader who told us this being one, but was pardoned owing to ill-health.

Kerensky at the beginning of his régime knocked off their chains in Third Month, 1917, and told them to go and register. They, however, refused and said they would rather stay in prison. After nine days further imprisonment they were then released. The Soviet Government had excused them from military service on the grounds of their beliefs, but one had, however, been sentenced to five years by local authorities, ignorant of the decree of the central Government or else actuated by spite. As soon as the Soviet Government discovered the fact (after a year and a half) he was released. The Government had also excused them from some of the requisitions for corn, knowing that they led a communal life and were true to the Government in not hiding any supplies as many other peasants did. Unfortunately they had been thrice raided by brigands and because of this and the famine were being forced to move.

Questioned as to oaths, they said that they did not believe in them but in brotherly words. As far as marriage went they registered their marriages with the Government when requested but believed that in marriage they were guided by the spirit and that registration or oath is unnecessary. They hold a meeting for the purpose of marriage when "the brother declares to the sister that they will be married." If matrimonial troubles arise another brother says, "brother, you are doing wrong." They do not believe in funeral rites, but if anyone dies a meeting is called to settle the practical details of the burial. In all they consider that (apart from other slightly different bodies) they number one million, but as they do not have any form of organization or any test for membership apparently, they said it was hard to say. As far as the Social Order goes they seem to be very near to Communism—but they seem to desire to be moved entirely by the Spirit and to have no set forms. When a meeting begins they sing together or talk, or sit in silence, and believe that "the same brotherly feeling runs through them all." God is always with them, they said, but they gather chiefly to express themselves and for fellowship.

These primitive Russian Quakers are vegetarians, and their life and religion is of the simplest nature. They say there is no need to pay kopecks to the priest for everyone has equal access to God. They have no special times for their meetings for worship, and at these meetings one and all have liberty to take part. Some of the hymns they sing are marked by a deep spiritual insight and fervour.

The following is a prose translation of two of them:—

"Hark! Speech is growing, the hour is coming, the voice of God is calling us to stand up for the truth. Be ready with free words, or with deeds at your post, be ready to confront a menacing death and cross. Since long ago we waited for the dawn, for long we lived in slavery, for long we waited for a beam of light to break the chains of darkness. But it is enough for us to wait for freedom; we shall go to meet it, fearing not the thorny way, nor the menacing of the powers. The earthly power shall not rule over our conscience. Be ready to openly stand up for your convictions.

Do not give your oath, and do not use force and yet be not a slave to any one; return good for evil, caring not for military honour, respect only the law of love, and reject killing; do not soil your hands with blood.

A cruel fight was fought against slavery to gain freedom. Most unmerciful enmity has been born everywhere but we deny force, we go about a different way, and wrestling we conquer darkness by light and evil by good, not by force, not by blood, and with prison. Only with truth and love we shall overcome the reign of darkness.

My friend, in a moment of irritation do not bury enmity in your heart; you must forgive and like a fog let it all blow away.

My friend, to those who do evil to you return only good; remember they themselves regret perhaps and suffer for thoughtless acts; we all are subject to mistakes; we all are men not only "they."

With noble hearts and mind are those who forgive with simplicity of soul; you also forgive, and learn to show your high gift, and be not ashamed to be the first to stretch your hand."

SOMETHING FOR SOMETHING.

Nancy Babb, who supervises the work of the American Friends' Mission outpost at Totkskoye, Buzuluk County, Russia, says she is in entire agreement with the Soviet Government when it says: "He who does not work shall not eat." Of course, this policy does not apply to a famine district, but it applies very fairly to a village that is reconstructing itself after a famine. And it applies pretty generally to all able-bodied people under any circumstances where there is useful work to be done.

It was this principle, coupled with that carefully developed fear of the charity worker, that giving without asking a return is to pauperize, that guided Nancy Babb in her efforts to provide the Children's Homes of her district with sheets, linen sheets, washable sheets, the kind that can be made in Russia, for practically none have come from America. So when she had given away all the children's clothes to the children in schools and institutions and passed out fifty per cent. of the adult garments, she thought she would use the remainder of the clothes to purchase that needed linen. She also needed some wool for valenki (felt boots).

She made a price schedule (and the Soviet officials were not displeased with her terms, nor the Co-operatives either). She would give a woman's green outer coat for 3 funts of wool (most of it is coarse black wool) and a pair of trousers for a half a funt, a man's overcoat for 4, a woman's blouse for a quarter, and so on. That covered the wool situation. For the linen for the sheets her schedule lumped together certain articles of apparel. For 15 arshins (an arshin is 28 inches) she would give a woman's coat or if the trader were a man an old coat, a vest and a necktie. Or for 2 arshins she would hand over a cap, or for 5 arshins a pair of men's drawers, a vest and a shirt. That brought her the linen.

The whole transaction was carried on through the Co-operative store in Totkskoye, and its branches. It was backed by the Government officials, who issued a joint statement with the Quakers that none of the clothing secured in this way was to be sold on the market. And no family was to be allowed to buy more than enough for its own needs.

Enough wool was secured to make 1,500 valenki; enough linen to put sheets on the beds of the 13 Children's Homes in the District with over seven hundred children. In less than three weeks 4,500 arshins were delivered and in addition the people brought their few remaining bolts of linen to contribute freely, not in return for clothes or any payment. Over 2,000 arshins were given in this way. So the "dangerous" principle of "something for nothing" worked the other way. Or might have—except for the fact that every arshin was given to the Quakers and delivered over to the Women's Communist Sewing Circle and thence it went to cover the beds of the children. It was in part a gift of the more fortunate Russian peasants in the famine volosts to their own orphaned children comrades. And it was in part an ingenious scheme to turn the odds and ends of the bales from Philadelphia into a self-help enterprise for the Russians in the five volosts.

So Ivan Chuganov took a half funt of black wool to the Co-operative and carried home a pair of moth-eaten American breeches. He was very greatly pleased, as was the malchek who sleeps between the new sheets at the Children's Home.

A POLISH "CHILD OF THE LIGHT."

The following remarkable letter was written by William Tysz, a Pole, in regard to a visit to a little community of seekers after truth. It speaks well for the possibilities of spiritual development.

WARSAW, Poland, May 16th, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

At the beginning of the month I spent a week in Raczkany. It was for me again a time of spiritual rest and satisfaction—a time when one feels that one is near to God. We had many meetings; on the last Sunday there were two. I had two meetings also with the young Friends, who all put in an appearance. There are among them some very promising youths, serious, pure, aspiring. I urged them to hold regular meetings, which they promised to do.

My visit to Raczkany was not only on account of the Friends, but also in connection with a dispute about a piece of land, which concerned three villagers. It is characteristic that the peasants, as soon as they have any difficulty, turn to the Friends. I helped these people, and shall do the same again if necessary. Very many of the neighbors hold with the Friends, but have not sufficient strength to throw in their lot entirely with them. They cannot adopt for their own the strict mode of living.

Again and again I learned from the Friends (who are very sparing of words) of fresh indications of their disposition. A father pardons the horseman who has trampled his son nearly to death—to the astonishment of all neighbors, who has expected stern legal retribution. The belligerents (Germans and Russians) allow the Malevantly, who for a time lived in "No man's land," to cross the front line without hindrance. For, as the soldiers say: "We know your programme. It is true you will not tell us when the enemy is in the village, but neither will you tell the enemy if we are in the village."

Some soldiers, who had been stationed in the village, laid down their arms after they had observed the life of the villagers. And so sincere were their faith that they were not punished for it, but only transferred to labor colonies. Malevanny appears from many accounts of the Friends as a true seer. . . . He often stated in the years 1906-1913 that "destruction will come out of the west."

But in spite of the spiritual fellowship that I found at Raczkany, notwithstanding the firm conviction that in this remote little village of White Russia spiritual Christianity shines in its purest light, in spite of a number of personal friends whom I had unexpectedly gained, my joy was mixed with drops of bitterness.

The reason is this: There is too little life in the community, too little fresh blood. Whereas at the beginning almost the whole village came to the truth, now only 200 persons remain. In late years also a number of families have fallen away—a condition to which they hold fast. And the most questionable; the missionary spirit is entirely non-existent. They are comfortable in their "splendid isolation" and think of no other. And the others are beginning to regard the Friends as a kind of new aristocracy.

The reasons for this sad circumstance are obvious: the isolation of the small group, which the years of war have increased to a large extent, since they have been separated from the Ukraine also; the lack of literature and educated people among them; the numerous military requisitions have made the struggle for existence more difficult, etc. I know that Quaker-like communities in Russia have fallen into religious errors—left to themselves in their village nests. When one just thinks that for the entire twenty-one years their religious literature—apart from the New Testament—consisted of two copies of the letters and speeches of Malevanny, shockingly copied, teeming with mistakes, often entirely incomprehensible!

Raczkany must be helped and that can only be done through a school, which will be a spiritual-intellectual centre by which the new generation, who did not have the benefit of intercourse with a saint of God, may be educated in the spirit of truth and instruction. Otherwise I fear that the flower in Raczkany will not be renewed and in twenty years we shall perhaps only have a sorry, dying remnant. As regards the contact with modern culture, one can see that the life in Raczkany is throbbing more vigorously thereby.

My earnest prayers are that God may help us to carry through the great work.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING was held on Eighth Month 29th. Smaller though the attendance was than that of last time, it was an occasion of great favor to all those attending. Only one visitor from other Quarterly Meetings was present.

Vocal ministry in both the religious and business sessions was clear and acceptable. Christ's words, "Be of good cheer," were dwelt upon as a summons to all who felt the weight of worldly care, and Christ's terms of salvation were freshly presented by another minister. The growing need of a Christian life in these days of world misery, and the saving grace of His word in hours of crisis was the timely subject of another communication.

The strong feeling of harmony throughout the four Monthly Meetings of the Quarterly Meeting, as was expressed in the answering of the Queries, was a cause of great satisfaction.

An account by James M. Moon of his visit, in the company of Allen Clement and Mary B. Moon, to the New England Yearly Meeting of Western, R. I., and also that of Indiana, held in Richmond, gave evidence to the strength of other Friends' testimony to the Truth. Max I. Reich spoke of his journey with his wife and Francis and Anna Walton through Ohio, and with Albert H. Votaw, to Indiana. The finding of a united group of once-scattered Friends in Detroit, Mich., by our friend on his visits, was a satisfying feature of his journey.

J. F. R.

HICKORY GROVE QUARTERLY MEETING, Iowa, was held Eighth Month 26, 1922, at Whittier, and was well attended and was thought to be a time of favor, especially on the First-day following, which was attended by several of our neighbors who are not members as also by some Friends from Indiana, Fairhope, Ala., also from West Branch and Stavanger. Several lively testimonies were delivered inciting us to active worship when met together and also to be actuated by our religious duty when about our temporal business, to be awake from dead works to serve the living God. There were present quite a number of young Friends who by their quiet and interested demeanor were a strength to the Meeting. We in this Quarter having lost by death and removal several of our older members within a short time, some within the past year, feel the loss of their consistent lives and conversation. We hope the younger members will come forward to take their places.

JOSEPH S. HEALD.

THE following was taken from an English paper and sent us. We have no reason for doubting its correctness as to fact:—

In a recent sermon Edward S. Ninde, of the Methodist Episcopal Church of West Chester, Pa., gave interesting data on the Quakers of Rhode Island and Germantown. For five years he preached in a pulpit on an historic spot in Germantown and he told of the gathering of Quakers at the home of Daniel Pastorius in 1688 when the first protest against human slavery was made by a religious body. The early home of Pastorius was a large log house, which was succeeded by a stone house erected on the same site. The property was bought by the First Methodist Episcopal Church, which, realizing the historic significance of the building, did not demolish it, but built the new house several hundred feet to the rear. When the new church was erected the pulpit occupied the identical spot where more than two centuries before the room was located in which the early Quakers formulated their protest against slavery.

SOME interesting figures concerning bodies of Friends in North Carolina have recently been sent us. Between 1700 and 1800, sixty new meetings were set up, from 1800 to 1885, thirty-two were set up, between 1885 and 1895, fifteen were set up. Between 1700 and 1885, sixty-two were laid down, and between 1885 and 1922, twenty-one have been laid down.

DURING the past year Guilford College, N. C., has had enrolled 230 students, a larger percentage of these have been Friends than ever before in the history of the college.

ONE in attendance at the recent Bluffton Conference makes this significant statement:—

"The only women to break the silence and indeed the only women delegates in attendance were those representing Friends. The fact was noted and commented upon by representatives of the other bodies and who knows but what our women Friends may have 'started something' in our sister denominations."

FREDERICK J. LIBBY is preparing in booklet form for the use of Bible Classes and study groups the course of lectures on preparation for peace work presented by him at the Earlham Conference.

THE old meeting-house at Richmond, as recently noted in THE FRIEND, is a thing of the past. A correspondent writes that an interesting feature of the late Yearly Meeting week was the presentation to the Presiding Clerk of the Meeting, of a chair made from black walnut, which had been taken from the old house built more than a century ago. The chair was the handiwork of a man who was grandson of one who had assisted in the erection of the meeting-house.

THE Social Service Committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting, held at Richmond, has its membership divided into six groups. (1) Educational; (2) Charitable; (3) Americanization and Good Citizenship; (4) Law Enforcement; (5) Recreation; (6) Community Building.

We are told that over six hundred applicants for the freshman class at Swarthmore College have been received this year and only 85 men and 85 women can be entered. During the summer the following letter, we understand, was sent to the applicants:—

"Dear Friend—Simplicity and modesty in the dress of its women has been a tradition at Swarthmore. It is the very earnest desire of the authorities of the College that this tradition should in no way be affected by the trend of modern society. Women students and their mothers are requested to co-operate in upholding and preserving this standard. We hope especially that the mothers of our girls will agree with us that extremes or eccentricities in style of the dress and coiffures are not indicative of the good taste which college women should preserve."

The letter is signed by the President of the Women Students' Government, the Dean of Women and the Chairman of the Household Committee of the Board of Managers. A similar letter is being sent to the men.

WE are informed from Copenhagen through the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches that "one of the most noteworthy addresses" before the International Conference of Churches in session this month at the Danish capital was made by our friend, Prof. William I. Hull, of Swarthmore College on the subject, "The Reduction and Limitation of Armaments." In emphasizing the present deplorable world situation our friend cited the careful estimate that there are one million more men under arms in Europe to-day than just previous to the beginning of the war in 1914, and this in spite of the fact that the armies of Germany, Austria and Hungary have been greatly reduced. The two baneful elements in the situation he pointed out to be those of fear and imperialism. "It is time for some one to break through the vicious circle," he declared, and pressed the urgent necessity of organized and immediate action by the churches of the world to guard the world's peace. The World Alliance has widely distributed Prof. Hull's address through the press of the country.

ACCORDING to the Public Ledger, Philadelphia, Oxford debaters are coming to the United States to contest with several Eastern College teams. In the list are Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Cornell, Columbia, New York University, Bates, Swarthmore and possibly others.

The two subjects chosen for debate are America's abstention from the League of Nations, and the effect of trade unionism on the industrial development of the two countries. The Americans have agreed to adopt the English system of debate, in which extemporaneous speeches are substituted for set addresses.

The following tallies exactly with a report from Wm. Bacon Evans, recently published in THE FRIENDS:—

Tanius Cortas, Clerk of Mount Lebanon Three Months' Meeting, writing from Ras-el-Metn on the 16th ult., says that the meetings on First-days are well attended and that an encouraging number of young people come to them. The village is very quiet compared with Brummana and other centres where there are summer visitors. Very few people have come from Egypt "owing to rumors of trouble which are not true about the greatest part of Lebanon, where peace rules and there is need only for activity and employment."

DR. HENRY T. HODGKIN has contributed the following account of his late experiences in America. It is taken from a much fuller statement which was sent us:—

We went straight from Richmond to Haverford, where we spent two nights with Rufus Jones and had a Fellowship of Reconciliation meeting that evening which was very well attended. As usual, one felt very much at home among Friends of both branches in Philadelphia, and we were struck with the growing sense of mutual understanding and the determination to do all that is possible together for the Kingdom of God. The situation in Philadelphia seems to me to have developed most favorably since I was there in 1915. The Yearly Meeting has just appointed a strong Committee to try to bring the foreign mission work into relation with the Yearly Meeting itself. We met with this Committee and discussed with them the work in Japan and problems raised by the foreign mission effort.

We spent several days at Moorestown with Walter Borton and his family, greatly enjoying a night in their log-cabin among the pine trees. We did not attempt any meeting while at Moorestown, but met several Friends, and one day I went to New York for an executive meeting of the Board of Governors of the West China University, and combined that with several other important interviews. We spent the last of the week at the Woolman School, where a special week-end conference in regard to the F. O. R. and its future work was being held; I gave an address there and attended the meeting next morning where I had some service, and I also spoke that afternoon to an interested group of about 100 people, after which we had quite a little discussion. In the evening, William Harvey came and took us over to Westtown, where we spent the night. The following day we had a meeting at West Chester and were entertained for the night by the Brintons, parents of those we met in Berkeley. We had a good meeting, and a number of Friends from both branches were present besides others. The following day, Henry Scattergood came and took us to his own home, and in the afternoon to visit a Young Friends' camp where we had the opportunity of talking over things in China. The next evening was our last in Philadelphia; we had a joint meeting of Friends at Twelfth Street, where I spoke about the situation in the Far East and the call to Friends. We also had the opportunity that day of meeting one or two people at the home of Charles Rhoads. It was quite difficult to leave Philadelphia.

I cannot begin to tell you of all the kindness we received from one and another and the many expressions of sympathy and appreciation with regard to our work in the Far East and our visit to Philadelphia on this occasion. We had only two nights in New York, but during that time we managed to see quite a number of people. We saw a number of our old Chinese Friends, especially in the Y. M. C. A., and had opportunities in meeting with the F. O. R. committee and individual members. I addressed a good-sized meeting at the Twentieth Street Meeting-house, and we met a number of Friends.

We feel that our time in America, though short, was very well worth while. We do not feel that we have accomplished at all as much as we should like to have done in America.

"'HAVE courage,' says the sun in the evening. 'Have faith,' say the stars all the night long. 'You see, I rise again; you will rise,' says the sun in the morning. 'This way, this way,' he says till noon, and 'Follow, follow,' all the afternoon, and then once more, 'Behold! I go. Have courage!' he says in the evening again. And that sets young hearts a-beating, that kindles the poet's flame and enlarges the spirit and makes the way of the world."—STEPHEN GRAHAM.

HOME AGAIN.

The First-day trips to outlying meetings this summer have made many of us think over again about our responsibility to our home meetings as well as to any that we may be visiting for the first time. It is comparatively easy to get "under the weight" of a strange meeting. The unfamiliar faces, the fact that we have come as a group to worship with another group, the thought that we may either help or hinder any message in the meeting—all these things make us thoughtful.

But our home meetings are different. We see only familiar faces around us—faces that we know so well that we are a little afraid of them. People are like that—the better you know them the more you realize their positive individualities, and respecting those individualities and loving them, you still stand in awe of them. But that is a digression.

The second reason why we are less impressed by our home meetings is that we feel less responsibility for them. We say that others are older, someone else has had more experience, we couldn't speak in meeting because—oh, there are a thousand ways to finish this sentence. It is useless to go over all the excuses we make to ourselves for being a little less than our best in our home meetings.

The whole trouble is that we are satisfied to give a little less than our very best. We are contented to sit still and let others carry the burden of the meeting. The time has come for us to shake off this attitude in our home meetings.

A home meeting is a gathering of friends (little "f") who should love and trust each other so much that they can worship together in unity. One day in the week they should drown the differences that beset any intimate group, in the higher ideal for which they are all working—the common desire that in the meeting God's presence may be felt and His message may be delivered in its purity.

We do not, I think, feel the responsibility for this message sufficiently. We leave it to some one else to say the things that may be meant for us. We don't surrender ourselves entirely for the good of the whole meeting. If our tramps this summer have taught us anything—it should be that each one of us is needed in any meeting. Not everyone can speak, but every one can help by a deep eager desire to have the message delivered. That is the real secret of the two or three—the advantage of group worship over the individual—one can speak while the others support him by their prayers. But the support must be very real and come from a loving consecrated desire to serve our Heavenly Father. If this is our attitude in our sometimes difficult home meetings they will cease to be formal times of sitting together in a meeting-house and become times when our spirits grow and are refreshed.

SUMMER CONFERENCES.

IMPRESSIONS OF EARLHAM CONFERENCE OF ALL YOUNG FRIENDS, 1922.

On the morning that we arrived in Richmond, the Philadelphia delegates gathered in one end of our special car and there Frederick J. Libby told us that the object of the conference was to make us a little more spiritual-minded and able to do our part in the world's work a little better. He reminded us that outsiders are expecting great things of Friends, but that we are not ready for callers from abroad to see how we live at home until we develop a unity of spirit.

With this suggestion in mind, we were soon meeting young Friends of all types from thirteen different Yearly Meetings and a wonderful unity of spirit did grow throughout the Conference so that each member at the closing meeting was impressed with his or her task of carrying that spirit back home.

The outline for the devotional Bible study was entitled "Extending the Area of Good Will," and that was indeed a keynote of the Conference. Is it not the important mission for the Society of Friends to-day? In our morning groups we discussed such topics as "Good Will Within Oneself," "Good Will at Home," "Good Will in the School," "Good Will in the Community," "Good Will Within the Church," "Good Will in Industry," and "Good Will Among the Nations." We realized that we must have good will in the smaller units if we wish true good will among the nations.

In the two morning class periods, ten classes on subjects of vital interest to young Friends were conducted by as many competent leaders. Unfortunately, no one person could attend more than two of these classes. Clarence E. Pickett led a class in the study of Friends' History, using a little book just published by Agnes L. Tierney. Young people of almost all degrees of Friendliness were in the group and very real discussions arose, but we found that a good way to extend the area of good will among Friends was by wholesome fellowship and a better understanding of each other.

The largest class of the Conference was Frederick Libby's "Training Class for the World Peace Movement." It was a real privilege to study under a man so consecrated to a great cause. He called the World Peace Movement the "Crusade of the Present Age" and said that it is the task of Young Friends to be leaders in that Crusade. To accomplish this ultimate extension of the area of good will, we must have faith and then we must create faith that the thing can be done. A study of the sources of war; of the futility of its cost in life and money, and its disastrous effects upon morale and spirit of peoples; and of a constructive program for world organization, education and agitation, gave us all material to use at every opportunity to spread the vision of a warless world in school or community.

The morning open lectures by Miles H. Krumbine, of Dayton, Ohio, were a very important part of the Conference. They were attended by everyone and Dr. Krumbine's message on "Religious Leadership" made a lasting impression. A young man himself, with all the enthusiasm of youth, an unusually forceful personality and a commanding delivery, he made us all realize the need for religious leaders to-day and the value and defects of youth in such a need. Leadership is necessary because of the small number of persons who reach the high stages of mental development and at present pleasure and power are the dominant aims in modern American life. For this reason we need to revive the Puritan attitude and spirit minus its vices. We need not more Christians, but better Christians. We need the faith of Jesus applied to present-day problems. Jesus showed us that the human heart responds to good will and sacrifice, that the universe is on the side of a loving will and that the cross is essential and must be borne. If we want the success of Jesus we must apply the faith of Jesus in the methods of Jesus.

If we wish to Christianize the world, we must put the social aims of Jesus into our lives; we must improve the time freed by scientific inventions; we must have men of different capacities working together for the improvement of the social order; and we must inculcate Christianity in the coming generation by adding religion to readin', 'ritin' and 'rithmetic.

Finally to be true religious leaders we must find out through the Inner Light what our job is and then have the courage to do it.

The open Forum discussions made us from the East better acquainted with the history and management of the Conference and with the pastoral system. We found a growing desire among the young people of the western Friends for an unprogrammed meeting. The two First-day Meetings during the Conference, which were held after our manner were greatly appreciated by them while some of the eastern Friends better understood the pastoral system after attending the West Richmond Meeting.

The evening addresses by such men as Alexander C. Purdy, Murray S. Kenworthy, recently returned from Russia, Frederick J. Libby and Kirby Page were also very worth while, but to me the times of deepest fellowship and good will were the Vesper services held directly after dinner, when everyone gathered under the big trees on the western slope of Earlham Campus for a sunset hour of prayer and thanksgiving and praise.

This account does not tell of the splendid spirit and social fellowship which pervaded the Conference at meal time and in the sports, but they, too, are lasting impressions and I believe that the experience at Earlham did make us "a little more spiritual-minded and able to do our part in the world's work a little better."

SARAH R. HAINES.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE AT FALLSINGTON, PA.

As most Friends are aware, Young Friends have for some years past made organized effort to take part in the spirit and the work of the Society of Friends. In several communities they have met at regular intervals in groups known as Fellowship groups, that they might, through discussion and worship, receive guidance and strength to perform well those tasks which they found before them. From the comradeship and the common purpose within the group, its members have derived added earnestness and eagerness in keeping up a high standard of worship in our meetings, and in taking part in the activities of the Society. It was felt, however, that even greater strength and enthusiasm might result if Young Friends from several communities came together to talk over and pray over their problems.

Accordingly a small Conference was arranged for, to be held at Fallsington, over the week-end of Eighth Month 13th, to which were invited several Young Friends from different neighborhoods, who were interested in promoting the fellowship and the spiritual power of their meetings.

On Seventh-day afternoon a small group of about thirty people met at Fallsington Meeting-house. After an hour or so of games and general social time, and a camp supper indoors, a meeting was held, addressed by Alfred Lowry.

He impressed us with the necessity of our keeping a "narrow mind," that is, of sticking firmly to what we believe to be right, and bearing testimony to that effect; to live near to God, to do His will in whatsoever He may ask of us, and not feel obliged to sanction every popular idea which arises, merely that we may be called "broad-minded." He did not try to paint the way to Heaven with the bright colors of spectacular achievements and glaring triumphs made easy as a result of our Christian faith, but rather showed us the quiet way in its ungarished, everyday aspect, void of all pomp and splendor and rich reward. The meeting closed with a few moments of devotion, in which fellowship between ourselves and our Heavenly Father was strongly felt.

On First-day morning we scattered to various small neighborhood meetings. It was felt by all that our smaller meetings need to be "appreciated" by our genuinely interested presences, and that this duty does not rest only on the visiting committee, although, as Alfred Lowry subsequently pointed out, those of us who belong to small meetings must not yield to discouragement if we are not so "appreciated."

On First-day afternoon we held a Fellowship meeting, in which we discussed subjects relating to our responsibilities for the increased spiritual power of our meetings, and for our communities.

The trend of the discussion was very consistently in line with Alfred Lowry's talk of the previous evening. It seemed to us that what we need most is not to concentrate our efforts on big projects such as community reforms and social evangelism, but rather to draw closer to God, and to our Saviour; to make Him our Friend, our Father, in a much truer sense of the words than we are usually apt to do; to really apply Christ's doctrine of love in our work; to find out God's will for us in our every-day life, and to do it hour by hour and day by day, so that we really live His will. Of course, there are big needs in the big world, but if, instead of rushing impetuously to right earth's wrongs, we listen to the still, small voice within us and do the little things just as they come along, God will give us the bigger things in His own good time. Perhaps we shall find, in the fulfillment of the smaller tasks, the accomplishment of many a larger one.

Aside from discussion, we had times of deep and helpful devotion in which our Saviour's presence seemed very close indeed.

Those of us who attended the conference feel a very distinct sense of gain, both in spiritual courage and strength and in the confidence that through our Fellowship groups with our common purpose and united efforts to draw nearer to God we may grow in value to the Society of Friends and to the cause of Christ.

SARAH BISHOP.

THE COLORA CONFERENCE.

We wish all of our Friends could feel the fine spirit of devotion that characterized the Colora Conference. The weekend of Eighth Month 26th we gathered and were entertained in the hospitable Balderston and Lippincott homes.

Two definite points were emphasized at our meeting. The first was our loyalty to our Quaker ideals; the second, our call to service. One said: "I am glad, proud and humble to be a Friend." Another spoke from his experience abroad. Both French and Germans, he said, are discussing Friends and wondering whether our way of Love is not after all the only way of Life.

Many people, we were told, are eager to serve, but often they hesitate because the task is small and insignificant. It is always a temptation not to do anything because we cannot do the thing we like most. The goal of our lives should be that great ideal of consecration—"It is not I that live but Christ that liveth in me."

There is work for us to do at once in Public Education. If we demand a "guarded education" for our own children, we have work to do in the Public Schools to make such an education possible for all children.

Following this call to service, we were told of some work that has been done this summer in one of the colored districts of Philadelphia. Every First-day evening Vesper services have been held on one of the playgrounds. These were arranged for by a conference of ministers and social agencies and they include colored and white people alike. Each week a different denomination conducts the meeting.

Most of all we must remember our fundamental principle—If God is indeed the Father of us all then we are all His children and brothers one of another.

NORRISTOWN AND HATBORO.

On Eighth Month 6th an automobile load of Young Friends visited Norristown Meeting. Norristown is counted one of our smaller meetings, but, after all, it is the spirit of the meeting that counts and not its size.

In the afternoon the group attended the Monthly Appointed Meeting at Hatboro. Quite a number of the neighbors were present as well as several Friends from Germantown. A desire came to the meeting that our personal differences and prejudices might be submerged in an effort to carry out God's greater plans for us.

FORTIFICATIONS.

They had planned for almost a week to make the fort right back from the edge of the sea, with the tide coming in. With fine independence they ignored what others might think of two big girls playing in the sand and with shovel and shell they set to work.

It was fun to scoop out great handfuls of the warm, wet sand and pile it up, shaping it carefully so that the wall would be wide at the base. The task became allegorical. "This is the way a wall was begun around our lives," said one. "This is the way we have reinforced it by our own experience," said the other, beginning to dig inside the fort. "We must make our wall both high and wide to withstand the rush of the waves," they both said.

One place they made the moat too close to the outside wall and the water filling the ditch washed away a little place in the fort. "Those are little temptations," they said, and filled in the moat.

Even their method of work was symbolical—one worked slowly and painstakingly, patting and smoothing the walls. The other impetuously scooped up great handfuls of dripping sand and piled them higher and higher like massive rocks. "We need both methods," they said, and worked together.

At last the wall was finished and with quiet contentment they sat back in the sun to wait for the first wave to wash against their fort. Even then they were not idle. There were many little cracks on the inside that they reinforced while they talked out their fancy. The moat—they said—had been made around their own forts by friendship and understanding. But the real strength had come from within, an upbuilding of the wall by prayer and quietness. And then the waves, there were always waves—fear, spiritual laziness, the temptation to be satisfied with the second best. It kept one busy, they agreed, piling up the reinforcements.

Then noon came and they left the beach and the tide washed away the little fort of sand. But the walls around their own lives remained.

BOOK REVIEW.

[All good followers of "the long trail, the trail that is always new," will welcome this new book of Stephen Graham's, for the review of which we are indebted to The Atlantic Monthly.]

"TRAMPING WITH A POET IN THE ROCKIES," BY STEPHEN GRAHAM. NEW YORK: D. APPLETON & CO.

Perhaps the title of this book will repel more persons than it will attract. It is likely to suggest to many a reader outpourings of ecstatic rhapsody, conversation as rarefied as the mountain air that the wayfarers breathe—together a work more "precious" than valuable. If such is the impression, the reviewer's immediate duty is to undermine it. The book is not one that the virile, red-blooded reader to whom publishers so earnestly address their wares is bound in self-respect to shun. Indeed, he, no less than the old-fashioned gentle reader, should enjoy it. He should admire the adventurous spirit and the light-hearted courage of the two heroes in plunging into the wilderness of the Rockies, following no trail, not knowing where or when they would come out, provided with food for but a few days and with neither rod nor gun wherewith to replenish their supply—or does that admission disqualify them from all claim to a red-blooded American's interest and sympathy? Well, anyway, the old-fashioned gentle reader, who believes that poets are the best company in the world, will like this book; and it will strengthen him in his belief.

The poet who accompanied Stephen Graham is Vachel Lindsay—Vachel pronounced to rhyme with Rachel, not with satchel. We get from Graham some picturesque description—not too much—of scenery, and a most delightful portrait—still incomplete—of Lindsay. After reading the book one wishes to have the complement to it—a book by Lindsay passing lightly over the scenery and the adventures and presenting a full-length portrait of Graham.

"My companion has two voices," writes Graham, with the candor that tramping through the wilderness with one other man ultimately compels. "One is that of a politician, harsh and strident; the other is that of an Homeric harper and ballad-chanter of the days of old." And he cannot refrain from quoting—not too literally:

Two voices:
One was of the deep,
The other of a poor old silly sheep.
And . . . both were thine!

And this after Graham in his preface has asserted that Lindsay is almost inarticulate!

Come, Lindsay, fall to and lay on; let us have your book on Graham; it will be as interesting as his, though it can hardly be more amusing. And let us hope that when it does appear it will not be disfigured, like this, by innumerable misprints. When we read of Johnny Applesed "going ahead of the pioneers of Ohio and Indiana and painting apple orchards," we marvel yet again at the inspired compositor.

ARTHUR STANWOOD PIER.

LETTER FROM WILLIAM C. AND ELIZABETH
C. B. ALLEN.

SOLO, Java, Seventh Month 3, 1922.

HADDONFIELD and SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING:—

Dear Friends:—To avoid duplication of writing we will address you, hoping thereby to also include our Monthly Meeting in our message.

We have to date covered over ten thousand miles of travel, most of it being involved in reaching our general field of labor. Our sea voyages have been remarkably pleasant. We have the past few weeks been close to the Equator. In Java, at the high altitudes, we have been relieved from the very trying humid heat of the coast cities. Everywhere we have met kind friends among ministers, missionaries or other people.

I had several meetings in Tokio, during the three days our ship called there, also delivered an address at a dinner, where I met some prominent Japanese. Gilbert Bowles had arranged the program previously. Excellent opportunity was afforded to endeavor to correct some of the difficulties between Japan and California and much work in this line has made me somewhat familiar with the situation. At Kobe I met with students of the large Methodist Church South College. Dr. Matsumoto, Acting President, in the course of conversation remarked: "The churches of the world must unite their spiritual forces to abolish war." At Nagasaki, in the Japanese Presbyterian Church, I had opportunity to speak on behalf of our Master.

Before leaving America, the Executive Committee of the California State Church Federation, of which I am a member, gave me letters addressed to the Christian Churches of Japan, China, New Zealand and Australia. The administrative Committee and the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America—I am a member of the latter Commission—also charged me with a message to Church bodies abroad. When our ship called at Shanghai, for a few hours, the National Council of Christian Churches of China was in session in that city, with an attendance of over 1,100. This gave an extraordinary opportunity for presenting the Christian message from America. I had previously left the message for Japan with Christians in Tokio. The feeling of unity and sympathy carried in this manner from one country to another must in some measure assist in bringing about the oneness for which our Lord prayed.

At Canton Christian College we regretted not meeting with Dr. Cadbury and family. But we there met with other Friends, including Morris Wistar Wood, grandson of the late John B. Wood. All these Friends helped us gladly. I held or addressed five meetings around Canton, one being on International Peace in the beautiful Y. M. C. A. building.

At Singapore I was afforded opportunity to meet with the students of several large schools attached to the great educational and mission work of our Methodist brethren. These were times when the presence of Christ was felt. Possibly about half of these young people are non-Christians. We, too, had helpful times with Church leaders in that city when partaking of their hospitality. I especially remember there, Bishop Bickley of the Methodist Church and Bishop Ferguson-Davies, the Anglican Bishop of Singapore.

When some of our acquaintances and friends asked us why we contemplated going to Java, and seemed to think it strange for us to do so, I could only reply that I felt I should do so. We knew nothing about Java nor the name of a single person there. But it may interest my brethren to hear of how way has been made for us.

Before leaving home I felt it right to particularly ascertain the name of the Bishop of the Methodist Church at Singapore, although he had, as far as I knew, no connection with Java. A well-known minister of the Pacific Coast accordingly gave me a letter of introduction to Bishop Bickley of Singapore. Our astonishment upon reaching Singapore was great when we discovered that he and his family had at one time lived at Olney, Philadelphia, and had been on terms of friendship with our late Friend, Samuel Morris. Bishop Bickley immediately proceeded to open our way around Singapore and to give us letters of introduction on to Java. These letters led to further introductions after reaching Java; and as but little is known in that country of the Society of Friends they proved to be especially valuable. We became acquainted with the intricate religions and missionary situation in Java, the relations of the established church to other sects, and the conservatism which, with language difficulties, makes it extremely hard for a stranger to operate. We through these channels became acquainted with the "Mission Consuls," who as government officials could close or open my way. One of them had met Dr. Rendel Harris of England, and knowing something about Friends was most cordial and helpful. Thus barriers have, from place to place, been removed and, often after many trials, opportunity has developed to perform service for our Master. One of these circumstances was, that in Bandoeng there has recently been held the annual conference of the Dutch Reformed Church for all the Dutch East Indies. Here were gathered a group of the very sort of men I had traveled so far to see; but I had known nothing about the conference until I stood on the doorsteps of the building in which it convened. After almost one hour's conversation with some of their leaders during which I pleaded for the privilege of addressing them, until I was almost ready to leave from sheer weariness, they most courteously surrendered their program for a season whilst I addressed them. My appeal seemed acceptable and has further opened my way among these brethren. In two cities their leaders have since invited us into their homes for a few days, and this evidence of hospitality has not only been very acceptable, but afforded opportunities for conference and forwarding the objects of our visit to Java.

It would be impossible to speak in detail of our experiences. We hope to sail for Australia on the ninth of this month. Our address there, we apprehend, for some time will be care of our Friend, Wm. Cooper, 267 George Street, Sydney, N. S. W., Australia.

With a message of our love,
Your friends,

WM. C. ALLEN,

MORE NOTES OF INDIAN TRAVEL.

The Stockbridges are so far advanced that they are hard to find at all. They have always been a progressive people, and have been in contact with the very best of the white settlers, whose influence these Indians reflect. They seemed to have no problems. Here the experiment appears to have been a success.

But a comparatively few miles away from these closed out reservations, in fact adjoining one of them, is the Menominee Reservation. Its upwards of 230,000 acres of land comprise one of the largest tracts of virgin pine and hemlock timber now standing east of the Rocky Mountains. Its 1733 Indians have never been allotted, though all the younger ones speak English and all dress in citizens' clothes.

There are mission schools as well as both a boarding and a day school maintained by the Government, so that there is an opportunity afforded for most of the children to go to school.

This is a typical "closed reservation." No whites are allowed to settle on it or to take up land. Its vast extent is traversed, however, by a number of roads, some of them included in the highway system of the State of Wisconsin. Gradually the white man is forcing in his way. Some of the land is fertile and admirably adapted to agricultural pursuits. Here the Indians are encouraged to clear up farms, funds that they have in the Treasury being employed to erect buildings. The trouble is, however, that although by tribal custom when a man has done this he has a reasonable assurance that he will not be disturbed in his holding, yet there is no legal assurance that should he die his widow and children will succeed him. He is in jeopardy that the results of his energy and enterprise and the expenditure of his share in common funds will pass to strangers. The incentive to this kind of activity is much reduced. Just why this reservation has not been allotted no one seems to know. An act of Congress is necessary to start the work. So far Congress has done nothing. There is a habit in relation to all matters Indian to blame Congress for what is done and what is left undone. Too often—though not always—the blame is correctly attributed. This is one of the instances where there can be no doubt as to where the responsibility lies.

Some years ago a unique enterprise for the Indian Service was inaugurated on this reservation. A great modern saw-mill was erected with Indian money, together with all of its necessary accompaniments of logging railroads and camps. In all over $1,000,000 have been invested in this enterprise. Congress limited the total cut to 20,000,000 feet board measure per annum. At this rate it is estimated that apart from any reforestation program, these forests will last for from sixty to one hundred years.

A ride over the fifty or more miles of logging railroad on a small gasoline propelled hand-car to the distant camps gave us an excellent idea of these superb forests, as well as of the modern cutting methods employed, by which every merchantable stick is secured, whilst the tops and branches are piled for burning, leaving the ground clear for the young growth to come on, while risk of fire is reduced to the minimum.

Dinner in a logging camp is an interesting experience. The equipment was crude, but spotlessly clean, whilst the food was more than abundant both in quantity and in quality. But few men were about the camp, as the cutting is done in winter. The rest of the year in the woods is devoted to building extensions of the railroad, of landing stages and other similar constructions, so that no time may be lost in the cutting seasons. The logs are loaded on cars and hauled to the mill, where they are unloaded into a dam, whilst they await being floated into the "hot pond," to be hauled into the mill, where the great band saws quickly convert them into boards or other lumber, the refuse being cut into lath, or if too small for that conveyed to the great furnaces to generate the steam power necessary to run the plant.

The financial returns from this enterprise, especially under recent very efficient management, have been very gratifying, the net profits after charging all manufacturing cost, as well as stumpage, running over $200,000 per annum. This sounds like a great success. Yet I query if it is. The scheme was to give the Indians remunerative employment and instruction in important methods of labor. Every endeavor is used to get them to work. The results have not been altogether flattering. There are numerous exceptions, to be sure, but in the main Indians do not make reliable employees. So soon as they have earned a little money they want to spend it. Or they want to go and visit friends or relatives, perhaps on some other reservation a hundred or two miles away. Without any warning they fail to report for duty and will be gone for days or weeks at a time. If the position held is an important one, a "rider" say, it will mean that one saw and its crew must remain idle till the place is filled. It cannot be wondered therefore that with this serious lack of continuity of effort there are comparatively few Indians employed in really important positions in their own enterprise. In the woods they do better than in the mill. The experiment has not gone on long enough, however, to prove just what it will amount to as a civilizing influence on the Indians. If it shall prove that it is not successful there, no matter what its financial returns, it can scarcely be viewed as a justifiable governmental enterprise.

From these vast forests we have taken away memories that will last for long—those of trilliums of wonderful size, and of acres of lupines, blue and lavender and pink and white. Here and there brilliant hued columbines would add their beauty, whilst moss and ferns in great banks provided verdure in plenty. Over all towered the great trees arching far away into the sky, soon alas, to be ruthlessly destroyed to fulfil the purposes of man.

On these three reservations could be seen the results of the operations of the governmental policies in handling the Indian problem. To me both told the same story. Where character had been built up, where the individual had been developed, there was success. I am convinced that allotment is necessary for any real progress, just so soon as the Indian is ready to make an effort for himself. Doubtless there has been far too active an attempt made "to set the Indian free." He has been declared competent and given a patent in fee in hundreds of cases just because he had gone through the eighth grade in school, or for some similar reason, when he was yet but a child in many ways and by no means qualified to take care of himself or of his property.

Naturally the question comes up, in the light of experience, as to whether he will ever be competent. The answer must be unqualifiedly yes, but not till after the expenditure of many patient years.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

IN NAZARETH.

The olives girdle Nazareth,
And far away the great sea shines.
The night wind when it whispereth
Bears in its heart a dream of pines.
And nearer with their blown perfume
Are rosy drifts of almond bloom.

But the hill town of Nazareth
Lies dully sprawling in the sun,
And all its round of mortal breath
Is meanly said and meanly done.
(Oh, never, so the Prophet said, Messias comes from Nazareth!)

The Elders quarrel in the street,
And there is cruelty and pride,
And save for one low cot and sweet
"Tis even as the world outside.
But there, "Thon't weary, mother mine;
Use thou my feet instead of thine."

Old Joseph, toiling manfully
At joiner's tasks from day to day,
Looks up with work-worn eyes to see
Strong hands that bear those tasks away.
"My yoke is done, thine soon shall be;
Take thou thy rest and trust to me."

The swarming chi dren strive and cry,
And one falls hurt, a puny thing
Unmarked save by His pitying eye
And eager hands that rene bring.
"Like as a mother comforteth," Issoothed that child of Nazareth.

Blind Reuben sits outside his door
And lifts his wan face to the light.
"Shall he go darkly evermore?
Father, let me give back his sight!
Not yet? Even so then let it be,
But speed the day for him and me."

Thus pass the slow years one by one
Beneath that lowly thatch of brown,
Till all the tender tasks are done
That lit the squalor of the town.
Incarnate love more strong than death,
The Christ fares forth from Nazareth.
(God helps us all in Nazareth.)

THE AUSTRALIAN PEACE ALLIANCE.

To THE FRIEND:—

In this letter we bring forward for your consideration a suggestion concerning this most vital matter and all that it involves for the welfare of mankind.

It is obvious that the peoples of the world pay the price of armaments and war in many ways, and that the price is a heavy one, even in time of "peace," when the next war is in preparation. We therefore suggest that the peoples should have an opportunity to state definitely whether they wish to retain this ancient system, and that the question should be put to them apart from any other political issue.

Let simultaneous referenda be held, after negotiations by international conference or otherwise, putting before the men and women of each state this or a similarly-worded question:

Are you willing that this (Republic, Kingdom, Duchy, Dominion, Commonwealth, Federation, or as the case may be) of _____ should disarm completely, on condition that the other states specified below do the same?

Here would follow the names of the other states, with a memorandum to the effect that each of them was putting the same question before its people at the same time.

In the event of a universal reply in the affirmative, governments could at once abolish all preparations for war. Should there be any negative answers, friendly persuasion could be brought to bear on the peoples so voting, with the object of inducing them to fall into line with the rest of the world.

Certain objections must be considered:

THE COST OF SUCH REFERENDA.—If each state paid for its own referendum, the cost would be fairly distributed, while, if the result were complete disarmament, the cost would very quickly be saved.

PEOPLES UNDEVELOPED POLITICALLY AND TURBULENT BORDER TRIBES.—If a people were not sufficiently developed to understand a referendum, they would not be likely to be a serious menace; it might be necessary for a time to have some kind of local police, under international control, to keep order.

We believe that the suggestion made in this letter is sound in principle, and should be adopted at the earliest possible moment, in the hope of thus ending the awful scourge of the war system by a decisive act on the part of the peoples of the world. It may be impossible for a time, but if it be eventually adopted, much preliminary thought and discussion will be necessary, and cannot begin too soon. We therefore bring it under your notice now, and, if your consideration be favorable, we would ask your advocacy of such referenda.

Yours respectfully,
E. M. MOORE,
Secretary.

P. S.—More than a thousand copies of this letter are being sent to many parts of the world, and a summary of replies will be published.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN'S PLEA FOR PRAYER.

HARRY M. CHALFANT.

One of the most significant incidents connected with the Disarmament Conference at Washington was the plan of President Harding in arranging that the first session should be opened with prayer by the President's pastor, Dr. Abernethy. This act of the President has been a source of great encouragement to all those American people who are sincere followers of the Prince of Peace.

In view of this conference and its purpose it has seemed good to me to recall a motion which was made by Benjamin Franklin in the Constitutional Convention in the summer of 1787. Representatives of the thirteen colonies were assembled in Philadelphia, laboring earnestly to formulate a constitution which should become our fundamental law and which should bind the thirteen colonies into one nation. Day after day these men talked and planned for the future of the republic.

One of the greatest difficulties encountered was the provision to be made for representation in the senate. The larger states were determined that representation should be in proportion to population. The smaller states contended for equal representation in the upper branch of the legislature. As the end of June drew near, it seemed that the convention was hopelessly deadlocked. A number of delegates had quit the convention and returned to their homes. New York had but one sole representative left, the young man Alexander Hamilton.

These were some of the conditions existing in the convention on the day that the venerable Franklin arose and read his reasons for a motion that the sessions be opened with prayer. The average American can never know how much his country owes to the great character and unsurpassed diplomacy of Benjamin Franklin. In his youth, unfortunately, he had not been as strict in his morals as the standards of either that age or this age require of a young man, but with the arrival of his mature years he seems to have come into a faith that proved a mighty factor in shaping his conduct and which has left a lasting impression on the republic which he helped to form.

The motion which he made relative to opening the convention with prayer did not prevail. But without question the effect of his words was very great. Because of infirmities he rarely spoke extemporaneously in that convention. It seems to have been his habit to write out in full what he desired to say in order that he might be very exact in his language. After reading his addresses they came into the hands of those who were keeping records. James Madison made the full set records of the convention, and it is evident that the sayings of Franklin recorded in his journal are full and exact.

It is from Madison's journal that we quote Franklin's motion and the speech which preceded it. It is worthy of the most careful study of every thoughtful American. There are some sentences in it which are classics within themselves. It is as follows:

"Mr. President: The small progress we have made after four or five weeks close attendance and continual reasonings with each other—our different sentiments on almost every question, several of the last producing as many noes as ayes—is, methinks, a melancholy proof of the imperfection of the human understanding. We, indeed, seem to feel our own want of political wisdom, since we have been running about in search of it. We have gone back to ancient history for models of government, and examined the different forms of those republics which, having been formed with the seeds of their own dissolution, now no longer exist. And we have viewed modern states all round Europe, but find none of their constitutions suitable to our circumstances.

"In this situation of this Assembly, groping as it were in the dark to find political truth, and scarce able to distinguish it when presented to us, how has it happened, sir, that we have not hitherto once thought of humbly applying to the Father of light to illuminate our understandings? In the beginning of the contest with Great Britain, when we were sensible to danger we had daily prayer in this room for the divine protection. Our prayers, sir, were heard. And they were graciously answered. All of us who were engaged in the struggle must have observed frequent instances of a superintending Providence we owe this happy opportunity of consulting in peace on the means of establishing our future national felicity. And have we not forgotten that powerful Friend? Or do we imagine that we no longer need His assistance? I have lived, sir, a long time, and the longer I live the more convincing proofs I see of this truth—that God governs in the affairs of men. And if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without His notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without His aid? We have been assured, sir, in the sacred writings that 'except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.' I firmly believe this; and I also believe that without His concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel; we shall be divided by our little partial local interests, our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and by-word down to future ages. And what is worse, mankind may hereafter from this unfortunate instance, despair of establishing government by human wisdom and leave it to chance, war and conquest.

"I, therefore, beg leave to move—that henceforth prayers imploring the assistance of heaven, and its blessing on our deliberations, be held in this Assembly every morning before we proceed to business, and that one or more of the clergy of this city be requested to officiate in that service."

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by Benjamin F. Whitson.

"Forward," then, but still remember how the course of time will avenge, Crook and turn upon itself with many a backward streaming curve.
—TENNYSON.

THE time is gone for discussing how and why the Eighteenth Amendment became a part of the organic law of the nation. It is the law. It must be enforced. If not, the name of the Federal Government will become a by-word and a mockery.—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE GENERAL SITUATION as to the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the United States constitutes an interesting study in mass psychology. It is not more discouraging than ordinary human nature. In many respects the behavior of the group is not different from that of an individual under like circumstances. Consider the similarity. Many a drunkard has been ashamed of himself at lucid intervals and has resolved to reform. Many a moderate drinker has seen the danger and wastefulness of his habit and has for a time abandoned it. But only the man whose change of action springs from deep-rooted, religious convictions is likely to hold firmly to a decision to reform. Those actuated by motives of policy only have yielded again to appetite, believing they could limit their practice to "moderate" drinking and quit if they want to. The saloon-keeper, the advertiser, or some one otherwise interested financially, has often been the seducer, but the work of "sobering up" has never been an easy task for individuals. Have we any good reason to think it should be different for organized groups of individuals?

WE SEE THE COUNTERPART in a nation not grossly inebriate, but sufficiently addicted to the drinking habit to become, through the awakening influence of prophets, seers and sages, in good measure ashamed of itself—ashamed of being a beneficiary and accomplice in debauchery and crime through the system of licensed saloons. We have seen this nation, after thirty years of education on the subject, considering seriously the visible effects and the probable future effects of continuing it. In a time of testing we have seen our country, aroused and vehement in denunciation of the economic waste of the liquor traffic, opening the way for the people to legislate against it to the extent of making it an outlaw in industry and commerce. In a sweep of sentiment, full of indignancy rather than love of righteousness, we have seen the States ratify the Eighteenth Amendment by a majority unequalled in the passage of any previous amendment to the Constitution.

Uncle Sam had resolved beyond a doubt to put away this reproach. He meant what he expressed, and he believed that the way to quit a bad habit is to quit completely. The result was unparalleled in benefits to society. Every child in the family, even little, recalcitrant Rhode Island and Connecticut, and impudent New Jersey, began to receive advantages from the new rule in the household.

THE SUPPLY IN THE SIDEBARD, however, had not been emptied into the sink. Uncle Sam's convictions were not so deeply grounded as to impel immediate self-renunciation to this extent. But the test of spirit has come. The stock in the cellar as well as the sideboard is nearly exhausted. Old chummies have been "hashing it over." The dealer has been around saying there was no need to be so radical; it was wrong to make a rule so drastic; it had been wiser to be a moderate drinker; one's "personal liberty" is a Divine prerogative and should be asserted to prevent its being forgotten. Uncle Sam has listened and is listening to these seductions. His old thirst has a hold on him. He is half sorry he signed the promise. He is tempted to break it defiantly. He has more than once chuckled when some of the boys connived to break it secretly. The prophets and seers and sages seem to him rather sanctimonious. He needs the bracing effect of a courageous and optimistic helper with a strong backbone and genuine religious conviction.

MEN HAVE BACKSLIDDEN, NATIONS MAY.—The history of sixty years ago affords numerous illustrations of States that adopted one or another form of prohibition and abandoned it later. Massachusetts was one. It decided on a five per cent. alcohol limit, but discovered very soon that the unscrupulous character of the dealers in liquors made impossible any halfway rule like that. Such an attempt at regulation would be as futile now as it was then. Men do not cease to be drunkards in that way. They must leave off entirely. So with States. All compromising with the liquor traffic is sure to fail, for many of the men engaged in the business refuse to submit to regulation. Success is possible only along the line of complete elimination of the supply. Not in modification of the law, but in enforcement is there hope of satisfaction to the people. This chatter about "light wines and beer" will all cease and be forgotten as soon as the red liquors are properly disposed of by suppression of supply and expression into the gutter.

THE REAL ISSUE IS NOT "light wines and beer" as some would have us think. Back of this screen is public indifference to the enforcement of the law against the heavier drinks and an organized, underground traffic without interference in every kind of intoxicant that men can be induced to buy at a money profit to the maker and vender.

We hear much about "bootleggers," "private stills," "brewery thieves," etc., but the "hooch" that is back of all is no low percentage drink. Suppose we allow light wines and beer. Is not the red liquor with us still? Can it be any easier to eliminate the disreputable, unscrupulous, underground maker and vender of "hooch" if we license saloons for the sale of beer? Saloon-keepers and their kind are not noted for piety and respect for law, especially since the Eighteenth Amendment suggested to the law abiding class that the only creditable thing to do was to shut up shop. Those remaining represent the most unscrupulous of their class. The real issue, therefore, is whether or not the police power of the United States shall admit defeat and surrender ignominiously to this lawless element or whether it shall continue the conflict until respect for this law is as noticeable as respect for other laws.

WE ARE BETTER OFF NOW than before we enacted prohibition. A friend of mine, formerly much opposed to prohibition, has returned recently from a business trip to the Pacific Coast with numerous stops along the way from Atlanta, Ga., in the south to Toronto, Canada, on the north. I asked him to tell me frankly if the country over is any better off under prohibition as at present enforced than in the old days of license. His answer was prompt and decided: "We are much better off," he said. "Rotten as the condition is, it does not equal the days of the open saloon. We are making progress toward better things."

"WHEN I am feeble as a child,
And flesh and heart give way,
Then on Thine everlasting strength,
With passive trust, I stay,
And the rough wind becomes a song,
The darkness shines like day."

—A. L. WARING.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE C. O.

SOME INNER WAR HISTORY.

T. Edmund Harvey, in the last number of the Friends' Quarterly Examiner, throws valuable light on some of the inner history of the Government's dealing with the problem of the conscientious objector during the war.

"Only a few know all that went on in the Cabinet and the part played by individual ministers and the Civil Servants who advised them. Even the part of Parliament is not easy to describe. What went on behind the scenes in the great offices of Whitehall cannot be told to-day and probably never will be. Some of those who cared deeply and gave much thought and effort to secure that justice should be done will never be recognized as having done what they did. They did not do it for any reward of thanks or fame, and it is so that history is made.

"I believe that it was Minister Asquith who, when the Act was being framed, insisted that the definition of a conscientious objector to military service should not be narrowed down to include only those whose objection was definitely religious in its character. In this respect the British Act contrasts favorably with the American one, which insists on membership of a denomination or society whose tenets preclude acts of warfare. . . . We owe a great debt of gratitude to the strenuous efforts of Walter Runciman to prevent a general misarrangement of the intention of Parliament in making provision for the Conscientious Objector. In particular, when the majority of Tribunals had shown their ignorance of the Act by ignoring the alternative of civilian 'work of national importance,' and the Cabinet had been persuaded to set up a Committee to assist them in arranging for this, Minister after Minister refused or found himself unable to take charge of the unpopular task, until at last Walter Runciman attached this unwelcome Committee to the Board of Trade.

"As time passed, the injustice and irrationality of the working of the Military Service Act weighed heavily on the minds of many who did not share our point of view. Individual members of both Houses of Parliament made repeated private efforts to get redress. In particular the Chairman of Committees, J. H. Whitely, and with him Lord Hugh Cecil, spared no pains to this end.

"At this stage of the war the one member of the Cabinet who had most understanding of the Objectors and who most desired to alleviate their position was probably Lord Milner, who had been deeply moved by the case of Stephen Hobhouse and took the trouble to read Scott Ducker's account of his experiences, though he was far from sympathizing with his views. But Lord Milner was in a minority in the Cabinet, and so the Government's policy underwent no fundamental change. Lloyd George never understood the position of the Absolutist.

"We read in J. W. Graham's book ('Conscription and Conscience') the story of the men to whom just treatment was not given and who could not secure redress. I have sometimes gone away from a Government office burning with indignation at failure to secure the reversal of an unjust decision. But there were other times when immense pains were taken to get justice done.

"Even the War Office was not without its better side. Heartless as the military machine must necessarily be, it is never wholly a machine, for it is worked by men who must be sometimes more than cogs in a wheel.

"If the man in the street did not understand the 'C. O.' still less could the men of the old professional army. I well remember one occasion when I had gone in the early days of the Act to the War Office to attempt to secure redress for some case of injustice. It was a holiday, but the war and the War Office went on as usual. The great man into whose presence I was finally taken was evidently puzzled by the strange beings with whom he had now to deal. But he had just found a new and unexpected weapon. 'I've got a little book here,' he said, taking down a small New Testament from his desk, 'and I've been looking in it to see if I can't find something to settle with them. And I've got them! Look here: "Fear God and honour the king.'" How can they believe that, if they won't obey the King's regulations? He paused a moment with a pleased smile, and then added: 'And I dare say, when I can find time, I shall be able to find a few more things here for them.' I am afraid that the need for getting on with the war did not leave him much time for a prolonged study of the little book."

NINTH MONTH 12, 1922.

TO THE EDITORS:—

I hope that you will find it possible to publish in your next issue the appeal for Vienna. A letter from Dr. Hilda Clark received to-day states that conditions are worse than at any time since the winter of 1918. It will, therefore, be necessary to expand the relief program.

Sincerely yours,

SYBIL JANE MOORE,
 Assistant Secretary,
 American Friends' Service Committee.

IN VIENNA NOW.

Kronen at 66,000 to the dollar have caused among the Viennese an amount of suffering difficult to exaggerate. What Chancellor Seipel said at Geneva—"I am knocking from door to door for bread"—is true not alone of the government, but of the people.

This summer did not bring the customary relief from acute misery. The rapid depreciation of the krone produced an unprecedented rise in prices, a scarcity of food and an appalling amount of unemployment. Mothers found it impossible to purchase milk for their babies and proper food for their children. Everywhere the financial collapse brought hardship. There were empty beds in the children's hospitals because parents could not meet the cost of hospital care. Holiday homes in the country for sickly children, and welfare centres, could not pay their staffs. The government had to discontinue its help to the land settlements.

The Mission was overwhelmed with calls for help. With only twelve members it did its best to meet the situation. It cabled for additional personnel and funds, and large consignments of clothing. It promptly subsidized the milk supply; it issued numbers of kitchen dinner tickets; it stretched its resources to the utmost to meet the emergency that has become almost a fixed condition. The hope that it would not be necessary to appeal for further relief vanished. There is nothing to indicate that Vienna does not face a winter of perhaps as severe suffering as Russia. All the departments of the Mission will need to be continued on the largest possible scale; and every effort will go toward building up the constructive side of the work.

The Agricultural Department will endeavor as its first object to increase the milk supply. Most of the cows previously placed with the farmers have been paid for, so that there is not a sufficient quantity of milk coming to the Mission to provide a daily allowance of a pint of milk for the 10,000 children who have been receiving it. It is estimated that it will be necessary to purchase 350 cows and 50 tons of oil-cake to insure an adequate supply during the winter. Unfortunately, the hay crop was poor because of drought; and its consequent high price made another problem for the farmers and the Mission.

The most promising means of giving permanent help is through the land settlement movement. Two hundred and sixty houses have been built by the settlers, and it is expected to bring the number to 500 by the end of next month. All is not hopeless when children are active and healthy and gardens are yielding remarkably well. But this fortunate condition applies only to a few hundred people, and there are literally tens of thousands of people in Vienna who again face a winter without fuel, or clothing or adequate food.

The Mission is appealing for funds for the fresh milk scheme, children's institutions, anti-tuberculosis work, clothing and the land settlements. If the depreciation of the krone continues, starvation must result; and the government has no resources with which to avert it. It is to be hoped that such fears will not be realized. It cannot be that Vienna will knock in vain at our door for bread.

HORSELESS RUSSIA.

We are wont to boast of our horseless age; but in Russia the disappearance of the horse is a tragedy, not a matter for pride. As the Russians say: "A peasant without a horse is like a bird without wings." Without horses famine is inevitable, and there are now few horses in Russia. From the outbreak of the war the number steadily decreased until in 1921 there were only 84 per cent. of those in 1914. The last year has seen a further decrease of 70 per cent. Many died from the lack of fodder, most were killed for food. Agricultural villages of 2,000 people have perhaps 50 horses. The Unit is convinced that the only way of giving permanent relief is through getting horses into the districts in greatest need. Every cable urges that money be appropriated for the purchase of horses. With the present dearth of animals the same dreary, awful round of no planting, no bread, starvation stares every peasant in the face. Bread must be bought until there are horses, and unless there are horses from somewhere, there must be bread from somewhere for a long, long time.

Robert Dunn writes: "Every day I think about horses. I think of the horses of a dozen centuries and a dozen lands. Maybe I am asking too much; but I wish all these horses could be in the Russian famine area now. I want them in Russia now because we need them in Russia now. We need them for a number of purposes:

"To cut and transport hay and rye and wheat and barley and oats and millet and other grains.

"To haul wood to burn and wood to build and repair bridges and homes and schools and hospitals and factories.

"To stamp round and round in a hole full of mud and straw making kisikee to be burned in the big white Russian stoves next winter.

"To carry the Quaker food from railway warehouse to village warehouse and to carry medicines and clothes over the same route.

"To carry people, particularly the sick, the weak and the aged and those stricken and swollen by the famine. To carry them from home to hospital, from hospital to home.

"To plow the hard, weedy land for next summer's grains. To harrow and sow this land. To turn and tame it again into fruitfulness.

"I never realized what a horse means to a peasant until I saw:

"Six milch cows trying to pull a plow.

"A peasant spading two dessiatines (5.4 acres) of earth to be sown for next year's rye.

"Women carrying in sheaves of wheat on their backs, two at a trip, two miles.

"Men who owned six to ten horses last summer cutting wheat with a scythe in the blazing sun while mowing machines stood idle in their sheds.

"Twenty thousand dessiatines of good hay standing uncut in one volost.

"Hundreds of Russian farmers sitting helpless in front of their houses wondering what is going to happen to them next winter and the winter after that, if they dare to think that far. Without a horse there is no use of thinking at all.

"If I had a million or two I think I would put it into horses,

I might set aside a part of it for tractors and trucks, but the most of it would go for horses. These horses I would give to the peasants on a loan basis, payment to be made over a period of years through the government banks in products or their equivalent. I am sure such an enterprise would pay if you wanted it to. It would certainly break even. Nothing would go farther to reconstruct agriculture in Buzuluk County.

"Perhaps the Quakers or their friends in England and America can show me the way to that one or two million."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—The School opened auspiciously on the 12th, with a full enrollment. The total number on the list is 230, 111 boys and 119 girls. Of these, 140 are members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, while 12 are "children with one parent a member." As usual, other sections of the country are well represented, especially the South and Middle West, while it is interesting to note that there are two students from Maine and three from California. The Senior Class numbers 44.

The faculty changes are few this year. Emma Mae January, an old scholar, comes to us as Physical Director on the girls' side. She is a graduate of the Sargent School of Physical Education in Boston, has been a Physical Director in the Cleveland, Ohio, Schools, and this past summer held a similar position in the School for Women of Industry at Bryn Mawr College. J. Ruth Kellum takes charge of the Sixth and Seventh grades. She graduated from Westtown in 1914, from Earlham College in 1919, and for three years has been teaching at Cambridge City, Indiana. Marian E. Thatcher, Westtown, '10, returns to the school in the new position of Executive Secretary of the Alumni Association. It is hoped that through the work of this position an even closer relationship may be developed between the school and the alumni, especially those living at a distance.

Several of the teachers spent the summer in study or travel; Lauretta P. Jones and Eugene R. Raiford were at Columbia, Cebren W. Joyner at the University of Pennsylvania, Jessie A. Wood, at Chautauque, while E. Grant Spicer and Marian B. Rustedt were in Europe.

As has been their custom for several years, the officers of the Students' Volunteer Movement, together with the young men and women who will this winter be presenting this work in the various colleges throughout the country, have been holding a week's conference at the school. They board at the Farm-house, but hold their conference meetings in the committee room at the School. It is a pleasure to have the group with us, and an inspiration thus to get a little in touch with one of the great religious movements of this country. On First-day evening the school was addressed by one of their number, S. Ralph Harlow, who has just returned from Smyrna, where for ten years he has been on the faculty of the International College.

Mildred Joyner, the wife of Cebren W. Joyner, a graduate of Earlham, who has had two years of teaching experience, has one of the classes of Third Algebra. Barclay L. Jones, who has been on the faculty for five years, is this year taking advanced work at the University of Chicago.

TUNESSA NOTES.—Summer vacation is always a busy time at the School. Repairs of various kinds have to be made and competent workmen are not always available. The boys' quarters are sadly in need of renovating and furnishing, but how to meet the expense is a concern to the Household Committee. A play-shed is also greatly desired.

To provide a variety of fruit for the table is one of the Matron's problems. Huckleberries have been scarce and poor this year. Blackberries and apples have to be the main dependence as most other fruits do not grow in this section. Gifts of fruit, fresh, dried or canned, will be greatly appreciated by all of the School family. Send: Care of Henry B. Leeds, Friends' Indian School, Quaker Bridge, N. Y.

The new Allegheny State Park, about five miles east of the School, brings many visitors to look over the buildings and to inquire about the work of the School.

The larger camps in the Park are the Buffalo Science Club Camp, a Boy Scout Camp, a camp for newsboys, maintained by the Buffalo newspapers and the Presbyterian Camp for Girls. The last named has had two Indian girls as guests for each fortnight during the summer.

Henry B. Leeds gave a talk about Friends' principles and the founding of the School to one group of girls, at the request of Marguerite Groves, the manager. Later, he was asked to repeat it for the benefit of another group.

William C. Cowperthwaite had an appointed meeting at the Girls' Camp to which the other campers were invited. This was thought to be one of the most interesting of the four meetings which our friend had during his recent visit to Tunenessa.

"WILTSHIRE ESSAYS," by Maurice Hewlett, contains a tribute to Friends which the New York Evening Post published some months ago. It is in part as follows: "I have said that Christ's teaching has never been followed. His way of life never attempted. That is true of nations, with which so far I have been dealing. Obviously, it is not true of individuals, nor altogether of groups of individuals. Groups have attempted it: Cathart, Patterini, Franciscans, Hussites, Wycliffites, Albigenses, Friends of God, Port-Royalists, Doukhobors and such-like. Most of them have failed owing to internal weakness, the nature of men; some, like the Albigenses, have been crushed out or worn down by the hostility of governments. One only, English in origin, has endured for three hundred years. That is a group large enough to be called something else. It does not claim to be a Church, and calls itself the Society of Friends. By a term of mockery, now become one of affection, men outside it call it the Quakers.

"Founded by George Fox, an unstructured man illuminated by close and literal reading of the Gospels, outliving both a time of persecution and one of moral collapse, that Society has presented to the world for three hundred and more years the nearest approach to the Christ-like way of life which has ever been known. It is based upon neighborly love, it is strictly pacifist; in the face of government it is quietist. So far the likeness is exact. It does not, however, observe the counsel of Poverty, and is in no sense Communistic. In those two points, and in the fact that it has not been zealous to proselytize, it falls short of the teaching of Jesus Christ. But essentially it resembles that teaching in being an enthusiasm, an illumination and a Way of Life. . . . Its doctrine is idealistic and undogmatic.

"What is now extremely noteworthy is that since the late war began the Society of Friends has broken down the defenses which screened it from the world, and definitely ranged itself in Europe as a Christian body with work to do corresponding with the faith which it holds. With no bridge-making to be done, with no gulf between Belief and Conduct, the Quakers of America and Britain, ever since the Armistice, have been steadily at work throughout Europe, and particularly in Germany and Austria, mending the fortunes of broken people, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, showing forth good-will among men who of late years have shown forth none of their own."

"These figures, referring to money spent by Friends in European relief work, tell their own story; and if we call the work which they represent 'loving our enemies,' as we well may, it is not what they would call it; for they say that it takes two to make a quarrel, and that Quakers quarrel with no sons of men. The matter for the concern of Christendom, is that it is a work which I believe I am right in saying no other Church, no other society of Christian people, as such, is doing."

A COMMITTEE of London Yearly Meeting is wrestling with the problem of co-ordinating the various literary activities of the Yearly Meeting. In a report to the recent Meeting for Sufferings they stated that the principal Committees connected with the literary side of Friends' work are four: (1) The Library and Printing Committee; (2) The Book Shop Committee; (3) The Central Literature Council; (4) The Friends' Tract Association and the various groups responsible for the publication of The Friend (London), Friends' Quarterly Examiner and the publications of the Yorkshire 1905 Committee.

The problem involves much and American Friends whose situation in some of these respects is quite similar, should follow the discussion with intelligent interest.

"AND HE SAT DOWN WITH THEM."

A minister—not a Friend—speaking at a summer hotel to a group of the guests, gathered for a morning service, called their attention in these words to the story told of the prophet Ezekiel and his visit to the people "who dwelt by the river Chebar." (Ez. iii: 15.)

He went on to express his conviction that the world to-day sorely needs the sympathetic understanding of conditions which the Prophet gained by sitting down with the people "where they sat," for seven days, after which "the word of the Lord," came to him, giving the message which he was to hand forth to the people. With the most sincere desire to help, we may fail because we have reached a hasty conclusion, not waiting to "sit down with them," and gain a real understanding of conditions. A homely illustration of his meaning was given by the minister, in the story of a strayed horse, which was hunted in vain by various people, and finally found by the village "innocent," a man not credited with ordinary intelligence. When asked how he, of all men, came to find the strayed animal he answered, "Well, you see I sat down and thought about what I would do if I was a horse! And then I started out and when I came to a meadow with fine trees and plenty of grass, I thought if I was a horse I'd go in there. And I went in, and there he was!"

Not long after being told of the minister's simple sermon, and the impression it left on the mind of one of his hearers, I happened to see in a journal looking toward a new social order, an article entitled "How They Got In," and found the same subject approached from another angle.

"They" were two young women, who, having finished their college courses, came to "settle down" at home. But they soon wearied of home life, and one reason was "the servant question." "The familiarities . . . that are taken with servants" (to quote from the article), "calling people Ellen and Sarah the very first moment you are introduced to them,"

They left home, and went into Y. W. C. A. work, in which they felt they would be useful, and "feel too that somebody was dependent on them," but "these satisfied sensations did not come, as expected;" they felt "all the time somehow on the outside."

So they moved on to recreation work only to find that they were "no further in." Then they worked for awhile in housing, and hoped that "helping to furnish comfort and space for home life, that heart of all life would surely land them in a warmer fellowship with the big family of Folks—but no, it didn't!"

Finally, after consulting two wise men, the "seekers" went into a silk mill, and are still there, learning the condition of the workers, getting to know their trades. Sometimes out of work, and "charting a low luxury line." "And what are we headed for?" they write, "We aren't sure. But it seems as if only that is helpful which is expressed in action. Of course one of our aims is to stand on the dignity of manual labor, by doing it," etc.

It is an interesting story, and we respect the honest desire of the two young women to "get inside." We only question their method.

Suppose, for his example, they had "sat down" with the conditions of home life and "the servant question." It was not an old-time Quaker home, to be sure, where "Mother" washed the breakfast cups and silver, and the girls of the family took their share of daily household duties along with the "girls" in the kitchen, and no one thought about titles of address, but were "Mary" or "Sarah" as the case might be.

Yet in all of our homes there is great need of a right getting "inside" the question of household service. So much of reform legislation with regard to hours of work contains some such clause as "this is not to include domestic labor." Why do not our household helpers claim the thought of our best young women as well as the mill-workers?

Thinking along these lines two instances of what may be done came to my notice. Leaving a fine old country home where we had been calling, our hostess said to a cousin who was with us, "Grace is going to come home, so we shall have extra help next week. She says she is homesick and asked if she might come. We expect her to-night. But she is doing very well at S. & R.'s (a large department store), and I really think she has learned some of the things we tried to teach her." Turning to me, in explanation, she said, "Grace is a girl who has lived with us." Her brief words told more than she realized.

The next week a family letter contained this message: "By an entry in an old account-book I chanced upon the other day, I find that K—— has been with us just twenty years on the seventh of next month. I want to make it an anniversary, and am asking all of the 'clan' who feel like it, to send her a message, or a card." What a testimony to both parties! Twenty years of faithful service on one side; on the other "the understanding heart," marking the anniversary with pleasant messages, calls from friends, a cake with twenty candles, etc.

"Little things?" Yes, but so was the mustard seed that grew into "the greatest of all trees;" so was the leaven that "leavened the whole lump!" "Seekest thou great things for thyself? Seek them not!" Only seek the spirit which sees the great outgrowth of the small. The spirit that pauses to consider, rather than that which hurries by to something promising great results.

The restless young women felt that all good lay in action. But is this always true?

Stephen Graham, in "The Way of Martha and the Way of Mary," says, "Progress itself, the whole modern reform movement as far as it associates itself consciously and verbally with Christianity, identifies its inspiration with that touching of Christ's soul which did not permit Him to pass one suffering man without healing him." . . . "But it is often forgotten that the good which He did was spiritual good. The true way of Martha is not so much giving money to the penniless, clothes to the ragged, medicine to the sick, homes to the homeless, decent dwellings to those who live in slums . . . as it is to touch their hearts, and give them a new outlook upon life."

Can such work as this ever be done without a measure of His Spirit who "knew what was in man?" And can this Spirit be ours without the times of "sitting down," as well as the times of action? If Friends, as a body of Christian believers, have more faith in this than others, are we being faithful to our testimony of "waiting in the quiet," in a day when it is greatly needed? Of "sitting down" until we see clearly the way to press forward?

IN THE FAR EAST. JAPAN.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

One of the privileges of foreign travel is found in meeting interesting people. In Tokio I met with Ito Kojima, a beloved Christian of Japan, who is believed to be the oldest Christian in that country. He is of very striking appearance, with his venerable face, and long white beard, and attired in the old-time silk kimono of Japan. He was born in 1844, and when eighteen years of age became interested in Christianity. This required no small courage. The houses of the few-known Christian teachers were watched by the police, so he took the novel course of being secretly instructed in the Bible by those engaged in that work. In 1874 he was put into prison, where, for two-and-a-half years, he was kept part of the time in stocks, and suffered much physical distress. He was subjected to the tests of allegiance to the Emperor and of disavowing the Gospel. These at that time consisted in demanding of Christians that they first honor or salute an official, next salute a Buddhist priest, and finally tread upon a cross. This last he refused to do. It was most absorbing to hear through an interpreter reminiscences of his youthful experiences, as the old man, with flashing eyes and earnest gesticulations, narrated the story of the official efforts to destroy Christianity at that period. But with the year 1868 a change had already commenced, and in due course his trials diminished. He is a devout member of the Episcopal Church, but holds all Christians as his brethren, and among other enjoyments, delights in the quiet method of worship of the Society of Friends.

While in Tokio, I addressed a called meeting of the Japanese Christian workers of Japan, held in the Y. M. C. A. A serious-faced group greeted me, and I spoke to them on the question of international peace, relating numerous stories revealing conditions during and since the Great War, and pleaded that they do all possible to promote a better order in the world. The matter of the Anti-Japanese Legislation in California was uppermost in their minds. They had been much disturbed by alleged utterances from Governor Stephens of that State, to the effect that he had not long before declared that now, as the Washington Conference has secured peace for ten years at least, the people of California could do all they desired to annoy or make unbearable the residence of their countrymen in the United States. I had no means of knowing the accuracy of these telegraphic reports, but met a good many anti-American arguments, and am very sure that good developed from the Conference. We parted in an excellent spirit of sympathy and fellowship.

Whilst in Tokio, I participated in a dinner at the Bankers' Club. It is a beautiful building and one could easily imagine oneself in a club-house in New York or London. On this occasion I met many eminent men of Japan who are dedicated to and feel the great economic and moral necessity of the maintenance of international peace. The venerable Viscount Shibusawa presided. I had full opportunity to enlarge on the possibilities associated with the spirit of internationalism, as it develops from a genuine conception of the Christian faith. I enlarged on the attitude assumed by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and its activity associated with concentrating the millions of Church people of America in request to Congress, on behalf of the success of the Washington Conference. I ventured to call attention to the fact that by Japanese admission many dangerous questions had been cleared up at that Conference, leaving only what they call the "California Question" unsettled to their satisfaction. This I declared was a great gain. As to this relatively local matter I could see no other course to pursue than that of patience on the part of all concerned. I concluded with suggesting some practical ways in which we could all assist in promoting international welfare with an appeal for the application of the Golden Rule all round, reminding them of our common heritage as children of the one great Father of us all, Christians and non-Christians alike. This address was favorably received and replied to at length by some of the leaders present.

When in Kobe, I addressed the theological students in the Kwaesei Gakkuin (Methodist College). Dr. Matsumoto, the Vice-President, in conversation remarked: "The Churches of the world must unite their spiritual force to abolish war." Then the question arises as to how much spiritual force the world Church organizations possess; and, is the fact that the Churches generally support war, when their support is demanded, an indication that their spiritual power is limited? Some think so.

Whilst in Kobe, that city was glorying in the visit of the Prince of Wales. The Japanese gave themselves over to much joy on this occasion. The sides of the shops were uniformly decorated for many blocks with red and white bunting, draped in long lines for hundreds of feet at a stretch. Big, gay lanterns were hung from the roofs and doorways of the shops, often at regular distances apart, for many blocks at a time. Many windows had big signs painted on the glass with these words, only in English: "Welcome, Prince of Wales." The whole effect was extraordinarily effective.

Two things I have particularly observed since my visit to Japan eight years ago. First, one sees in the big ports that fully two-thirds of the business men wear European clothes. They were well-dressed, but somehow or other, to my mind, did not look altogether comfortable or as well in them as in the graceful garments of the preceding generation. Second, the manners of the ordinary people on the streets and in the crowded tram-cars did not seem to have improved within the past decade. Whilst the cultured people seemed to be quiet in their manners, the general public pushed and crowded one another, or the foreigners, more than they did a few years ago. Have they acquired the Western assertiveness and are they forgetting their rare courtesy of the past as a result of adopting our Western push and business methods? I hope not. Meanwhile, I see but small difference in the gentle ways and smiling countenances of the little women of Japan, as, in kimonos and shod with getas, they thread their ways through the crowded streets.

Between Kobe and Nagasaki our beautiful ship cleaved through miles of jelly-fish in the Inland Sea. As evening fell upon us the soft greys of the misty ocean, backed by the mountains of lovely tints and forms, at whose bases were picturesque villages and faintly seen barley fields, made a lovely picture. Then the moonlight became very radiant over the dark water. Most impressive were the lights of the fishing nets, which for miles were distributed over the sea in all directions about five hundred feet apart. They danced and swayed on the surface of the water in a fascinating fashion, whilst near them were the sampans, with the fishermen in them, keeping watch.

So is it given to God's people to put out the Gospel nets in all waters and with simple faith watch over them by day and by night.

WANTED—A MOTOR CAR.

[Any one interested in the matter alluded to in this note should address Walter W. Haviland, Chairman of Philadelphia Friends' Foreign Missionary Association, 140 N. Sixteenth Street, Phila.—Eds.]

S. S. Houtman,

SEVENTH MONTH 16, 1922.

We have had opportunity to visit numerous missions within the past three months and have been impressed with the care exercised by most missionary societies over the physical condition of their workers. This is very important because if health is not maintained, and if an unnecessary expenditure of the physical forces is not minimized, the means through which spiritual and educational work should be accomplished is likely to be curtailed or lost. Every ounce of strength that can be husbanded, every hour of the day that can be saved, allows just that much more energy or time to be applied to the primary objects of missionary enterprise.

When we were in Tokyo we discovered that our friend, Minnie Bowles, often was compelled to make long and physically-tiring trips in the close and fearfully over-crowded street cars of that city in connection with her missionary duties and necessary household concerns. Her husband, Gilbert Bowles, often consumes even much more of his very valuable time in the same way during his visitations going around the city. Tokyo has a population of say 2,000,000, and extends over a great area. The time and strength of these dear Friends, as well as that of other members of the staff of the Tokyo Mission is all too valuable to be wasted in this manner.

It has been a pleasure to us to observe how many missions in the Orient are equipped with motor cars. These cars are more important to their users than they would be to them in America. No doubt our people in the United States, who gladly contribute to foreign missions and who are accustomed to using cars for business or pleasure, little appreciate how much more important such facilities are to their workers abroad.

Gilbert Bowles and his wife have not even suggested anything in this line. Their faithful, patient labor has nothing self-seeking in it. But the need is so apparent that, quite outside of the Mission Board which has so many financial burdens to carry, we venture to lay the subject before their friends in this way. A group of Friends around Philadelphia could easily give them a motor car, and, what is equally necessary, guarantee the expense of a chauffeur and maintenance of it. Their health, time and ability to perform the service of our Master would largely be increased thereby. The money so applied would yield a larger proportionate return than if expended for them in almost any other direction.

THE MEETING HOUSE.

[Written by one who in his boyhood attended the Friends' School at Haddonfield.]

In Quaker Lane, elm-shadowed and alone,
In solitude apart from time's demands
The Meeting-house in aged quietness stands,
Surrounded by a spirit all its own.

Within the silent building more and more,
As each newcomer enters from behind,
The stealing calm enveloping my mind
Is startled at the creaking of the door.

Oft did the creaking of that door beguile
The weary hour for me, a little boy,
And often have I heard in secret joy
A late arrival rustle down the aisle.

Now gratefully I see on every part
The sweet simplicity of garb and mien,
The downcast faces, thoughtful and serene,
Of worshippers who worship from the heart.

'Til the walls around my senses outward roll
And vanish in the silence,—I alone,
Far in the firmament, face to face with One
Reveal to Him the secrets of my soul.

A few inspiring words from golden Psalm
Or Proverb, followed by an earnest prayer,
And re-descends upon all gathered there
The silence of the contemplative calm.

The sacred silence may no longer be,
About the door they linger yet a while Exchanging neighbor greeting, nod and smile,
Discussing village gossip pleasantly.

Chastened in spirit and refreshed in mood,
By groups they vanish down the quiet lane,
'Til First-day or 'til Fifth-day come again,
The Meeting-house stands in its solitude.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE FIVE YEARS' MEETING.

These can be but "Impressions." To present here the complete picture would require too much space; for those of us who have not seen the Five Years' Meeting assembled can scarcely comprehend all that it covers.

A delayed train kept most of the Philadelphia delegates from participating in the reception to visitors given on the Campus at Earlham by Richmond Friends, on the afternoon of Second-day, Ninth Month 4th.

At the opening session that evening the presiding Clerk said: "Shall we not begin this Meeting with reverent silence, waiting upon God, through whom alone can this Meeting be what it should?" And the large assembly settled into a deep and living stillness.

The roll-call of delegates was followed by the seating of the fraternal delegates—English, Irish and Philadelphia Friends—on the platform (for this session only), when each one was asked to rise and answer to his or her name.

A pleasing feature at this time was the seating, one on each side of the Clerk's desk, of the two men who have so faithfully and long served this body of Friends—Timothy Nicholson of Richmond, Indiana, and James Wood of Mt. Kisco, New York, both of whom are actively helpful with their wide experience and Christian courtesy.

Routine business largely occupied the first session.

The services of the group of English Friends were shown in various ways, and at different times, and their happy and helpful social contact, and cheerful endurance of the trying weather, endeared them to us all.

Herbert Corder had brought with him from England a remarkable set of etchings by Robert Spence, illustrating passages from the Journal of George Fox, which were on view and for sale in the Girls' parlor at Earlhams; and in another room were shown some beautiful water colors done by M. Catherine Albright on her recent journey through California and the Canadian Rockies. These gave much pleasure, and groups of Friends were often found enjoying them.

T. Edmund Harvey's address on "The World Outlook and the Open Door for Friends" stirred us with what he termed "the great ideal of friendship." He told of the dear old English Friend, a power for good in his own community, who, when the question of the building of a certain wall was under consideration, said: "Friends, if there must be a wall, let it not be so high that we cannot shake hands across it." He felt that we must return to the spirit of our early Friends and to their "confidence in the truth"—"every one of us!"

Speaking of Europe as "bankrupt in every sense of the word," and of his feeling that in our own country the trouble though not so apparent "is there," he said that the civilization of the world seems to have broken down in some places, like a watch that will not run for lack of something in its mechanism. The Great War has brought this home to us all and has shown, too, "our own little group"—the Society of Friends, "standing for the way of love," and by that service of love having opened before us many doors of opportunity that once were closed. He pictured the man who builds walls about his own life and his own possessions and shuts himself away more and more from his fellows, and contrasted this with the personality of one whom he knew, who said: "I seem to have passed my life in opening doors."

In the afternoon session the report of the American Friends' Service Committee, given by Wilbur K. Thomas, was heard with much interest. Rufus M. Jones followed, giving "The International Aspects and Vitality of Our Message," and recalled the advice of the peasant to Francis of Assisi: "Try to be as good as men think thou art." In speaking of the love for Friends awakened in the hearts of the war-wearied people whom it has been our privilege to help. It is not only those who need help themselves who turn to us, but some who seek the way to help others. This Rufus Jones illustrated by telling us that the largest single contributor to Service Committee work is a wealthy man, not a Friend himself, but one who believes in the work as a manifestation of Christian love.

George M. Warner, who acted as chairman of the Philadelphia delegation, here spoke of the power of the press and our duty in "discouraging the war mind."

The evening of Fourth-day was devoted to a consideration of Friends' work for peace, and Allen D. Hole, Chairman of the Peace Association of Friends in America, urged us not to be misled into any slackening of our work because others than Friends are taking it up, but rather to feel the need of making every effort. Frederick J. Libby gave an inspiring address setting clearly before us our duty to end war; and William B. Harvey presented the paper, "Christianity for a Warless World," already indorsed by several Yearly Meetings. This was approved, and later indorsed by the Five Years' Meeting also.

Reports of Christian work in foreign lands were briefly given by returned workers from the various fields at a special meeting held early Fifth-day morning. It was evident that the sacrifices made by these men and women were an offering joyfully made to our common Father for the sake of his less favored children. An earnest address on Christian stewardship and the right use of our money by Dr. Tweedy of Yale was given in the afternoon. But earlier in this session the report of the business committee brought before us a question on which a serious division of opinion had been expected, and the greatest spiritual height of the whole conference was reached in the degree of harmony and brotherly love in which it was settled. "A unity of spirit which will bind us together more closely than any uniformity of thought can do" seemed indeed realized. And the deep feeling throughout the meeting was well summed up by the clerk, John R. Cary, in the words, "Friends, we have taken part in a moment which will live as long as we do."

In the evening the subject of religious education was presented. And the morning session on Sixth-day was devoted to the subject of prohibition. S. Edgar Nicholson, whose untiring work for temperance is well known to readers of THE FRIEND, earnestly asked of us not to consider prohibition as an accomplished fact, but to remember that even now with the law "but poorly enforced" drunkenness has decreased 65 per cent. in our own country while it has increased 60 per cent. in England. "Until the enemies of prohibition have ceased their activities," he said, "not only every Yearly Meeting but every Monthly Meeting should have its committee and be actively supporting the Eighteenth Amendment." An Indiana Friend told us that since the Amendment went into effect there are not enough prisoners left in one jail to do the usual work. Our English Friends took a keen interest in this discussion, and J. H. Barlow reminded us that England looks to us as "the star of hope" in this matter.

In the afternoon session Sixth-day we listened to "An Interpretation of the London Conference." John Henry Barlow spoke of the pleasure of renewing friendships then made. "We began to learn to know one another," he said, referring to the time of the London Conference, "and as we began to know we began to love." "There a great dream was realized, we separated feeling that we were nearer together than we had sometimes believed."

The Young Friends' Movement was made pleasantly vivid by a group of them seated before us on the platform; and as they spoke to us of their activities and their hopes we felt that they are (as one of their number himself descended from pioneer stock well said) "new pioneers of the new day." In the evening after the usual routine business Elbert Russell and Edward W. Evans addressed us on "Christ in Our Life To-day." The former spoke of the future of the world as largely bound up in three comparatively unknown peoples, the Russian, Chinese and East Indian, and asked how are we to bring Christ into the lives of these peoples. Edward Evans emphasized the fact that "Jesus Christ created not things but personalities and fellowships," and that "the simple, single, unclouded Gospel of Christ" is the need of our world to-day.

On Second-day the 11th, the afternoon and evening sessions were devoted to the work of Friends for the Indians and Negroes. Rayner W. Kelsey made a stirring appeal to the "children of Onas" (as the Indians called us) to be true to their heritage and responsibility to these people for whom the civilization of the white man has often brought anything but good results.

Hollingsworth Wood pictured the crowded and unwholesome city life, which has followed the exodus of Negroes from the South to our northern industrial centres, and the increase of racial antagonism of late years not only toward them but toward the Jews also. The noble poem by Leslie P. Hill pointing to the remedy for this was read, and "the way of love" and sympathetic understanding shown to be the only way for us; "working with rather than for them."

No attempt has been made here to chronicle the routine business, appointment of officers, and so on. A message to the President on behalf of men imprisoned for no other crime than that of their opinions was framed and sent; also a message of sympathy because of the serious illness of the President's wife.

If one asks what was the significance of these days to the Philadelphia Friends who attended the Five Years' Meeting, we may answer that it was largely in the personal contacts; the opportunity to know one another. The living together in the halls of Earlhams College, taking our meals in the dining-room, sitting about under the fine trees on the campus, traveling back and forth to meeting on the kindly provided special cars—all this opened the way for that mutual understanding, which we felt was helpful to us all. The Philadelphia Friends had also opportunities for more public service in the meetings and used them faithfully. George M. Warner acting as chairman for the Philadelphia delegates voiced for us in his greeting our desire to come as we were sent by our Yearly Meeting "in a spirit of brotherly love; to help and not to hinder; to build up and not to pull down," and quoted these words of Dean Stanley with the desire that Friends may be among "the healers who bind up the wounds of the age in spite of itself. The good physicians who knit together the dislocated bones of a disjointed time—the reconcilers who turn the hearts of the children to the fathers and of the fathers to the children."

F. T. R.

THE following from a letter written by a Philadelphia Friend who attended the Five Years' Meeting will add interest to the foregoing article:

"In response to thy question, I feel like referring to what seems to me most interesting after that day when the Spirit so gained the ascendancy over the will of man; truly that seemed a real spiritual triumph.

After that, I love to think of the faces of those beautiful young Christians who sat before us on the Missionary Day, and the Young Friends' Day, and the forceful and direct messages of their leaders, as being indicative of a great principle in their young lives.

I am so thankful that, in great measure, the way is made open before them, in a way some of us were not favored with, at a like period. I build much hope on their earlier surrender to the call of the Spirit, and it gives me courage also to witness and to love them for it."

MORE NOTES OF INDIAN TRAVEL.

One of the greatest of our Indian families is the Sioux. There are many sub-tribes of these people and it was to the Sisseton Agency that we next turned. We crossed Wisconsin, had a quiet First-day at Minneapolis, and the next afternoon dropped off the transcontinental train of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad at Millbank in northeastern South Dakota. Here was awaiting us a cheerful Indian in charge of the Agency Ford, and we had a run nearly north for about fifty miles to reach the Agency. It is an old military post, apparently located originally with the object of resisting attack, and not with any thought of the present uses to which it is put. Now there is a branch railroad within about eight miles, not available for us because the trains did not connect, and some point on it is where the Agency should be located. Then, too, the site can only be approached after descending and then ascending again a long, steep, winding hill. The buildings are old and dilapidated and not suitable for their present uses, whilst above all there is no water supply, except some precarious rainwater cisterns, and a spring a mile-and-a-half away, from which till recently the water was hauled in barrels. Now a tank wagon is employed. There is not a bath-tub in the whole neighborhood.

Here in this isolated spot, without suitable schools for their children, with no opportunities for recreation or social intercourse outside of the very limited group, are living the men and women who are educating and civilizing these Indians. In summer it becomes intensely hot; in winter this is the home of the blizzard, with tremendous winds and temperatures forty or more degrees below zero, whilst the snow buries the poor little spring under fifteen or twenty feet drifts. There is real devotion and self-denial, for the salaries are pitifully small. It is notorious that compensation in the Indian Bureau is the lowest of any branch of the Government service. Seeing what I have seen in so many different parts of our country, I contemplate with the utmost respect and admiration those who are thus devoting their lives to a great missionary effort.

The Sisseton Agency is an excellent illustration of an "open reservation"—that is, the Indians were allotted many years ago, many of them have been declared competent and have their patents in fee, whilst others are still under governmental supervisions. Their surplus lands have been sold and there are to-day living on the reservation many more whites than there are Indians. When the character of the latter is good their example is a splendid one for the Indians, and there is probably no better civilizing and uplifting influence.

The country at Sisseton is a rolling one, with some high bluffs, often forming the shores of the series of "finger lakes" running north and south, teeming with fish and water fowl. Prairie chickens abound. It is a hunter's paradise.

We drove some hundreds of miles up and down across this reservation, stopping to talk to the people and trying to arrive at their real conditions. The recent endeavor has been to try to get them to live in neat four-room bungalows instead of in their old time one-room shacks. Good barns and out-buildings are also erected. As in Wisconsin there were the same differences. To instill thrift and the necessity for continued application and labor—these are the difficult lessons to teach, the still more difficult ones to learn.

It is a roundabout route from Sisseton to the Cheyenne River Agency, also in South Dakota. First one goes further on the C. M. and St. P. as far as Aberdeen, a bustling western town, full of life when we reached it, with its activities much enlivened for the moment by the State Bankers' Convention, then in session, putting all hotel accommodations at a premium. A short night and early start brought us to the station of the Northwestern R. R. to find the scheduled train was a local freight of uncertain movements, which went and came as the moment's exigencies might dictate, and which was now reported as making a connection some sixty miles to the south only about twice a year, though there was an hour and a half to spare! However, for once a circus stood us in good stead. It was being unloaded in the railroad yards so the freight had been made up the night before and we were soon rattling along at the rate of about fifteen miles an hour, with the vantage point of the cupola on top of the caboose from which to view the landscape. The conductor tried to entertain us with observations as to the comparative grandeur of mountain scenery and that of the prairies. He much preferred the latter, whose cloud effects in his estimation more than compensated for the flatness of the landscape. We enjoyed the countless wild flowers; the sweet songs of the larks, recalling memories of the Canadian plains of thirty or more years ago; the groups of brilliant Chinese pheasants, which have become acclimated here.

At Redfield we made our connection after all, and another hour or two brought us to Gettysburg. Here another faithful Indian, equipped with a Ford, was awaiting us, and we drove the twenty-five miles to the Cheyenne River Agency. Our route took us over a freshly graded State road for about one-half of the way. There we soon reached the tops of the bluffs down which we wound through thickets, acres in extent, of the most fragrant wild roses I have ever seen, till the river bottom, overspread with enormous cottonwoods and box elders, was reached. The Missouri is here a muddy, swift-flowing stream, approaching a mile in width. It is crossed by a small ferry boat, which battles hard against the current. The Agency comprises about forty buildings, picturesquely grouped, on the west bank of the river. There are here a large and imposing, though most illy contrived hospital, and a government boarding school, in addition to the offices and store-rooms and employees' residences.

This is the headquarters for 2785 Indians, mostly Blackfeet and Sioux. They all wear citizens' clothing and about one-half of them speak English, but as a whole they are backward and unlightened. The reservation is a domain in itself, over twelve hundred thousand acres, of which about four-fifths have been allotted. Its extent may be understood when it is realized that about a quarter of this Indian population lives over one hundred miles distant from the Agency headquarters.

Whilst there is some farming, this is a grazing country, and much of the reservation is leased out to large cattle companies. Thousands of head of stock are feeding on the range. The rental money being collected by the Superintendent and expended for the benefit of the Indians.

Our stay at Cheyenne River was cut short by weather conditions. After several successive seasons of drought, the early parts at least of the present summer were unusually wet. This was fine for the crops, but almost prohibited travel. This is the home of real "gumbo;" not what is sometimes called such, but the article as to which there can be no doubt. After rain the ground becomes of a peculiarly pasty consistency, which makes it at the same time adhere to everything, and also to become exceedingly slippery. In but a few revolutions the wheels of an automobile fill in solid, and there is no moving them till they are dug out. My friend General Hugh Scott, who in earlier times was on military duty in this same country, tells me it was not by any means unknown for freshly shod mules employed in army transports to have their shoes pulled off their hoofs, the adhesion of the mud was so great.

Reluctantly, therefore, as it rained every night, we were forced for the time to abandon our trip of some three hundred miles by Ford to the more distant parts of this reservation. As we retraced our steps to Gettysburg, we stopped long enough to see the "picture rock" lying on the side of the bluffs on the left bank of the Missouri. It is a flattened slab of sandstone several feet across, in which have been carved by some prehistoric historian two or three imprints of a bare human foot, and also several of those of an animal resembling a large dog. One of these latter is super-imposed over one of the others. The workmanship is so excellent it is hard to be convinced that these tracks were not impressed there when this piece of stone was still soft mud. There is no legend as to its origin. We only know that such carvings were often employed to record events of importance to the inhabitants of our country of the long ago. The imagination can picture a fleeing woman, perhaps protecting her baby, closely pursued by a wolf. Did he catch his prey? Or perhaps some happier theme is commemorated when a faithful dog in some way rescued his master. No one can say.

A few hours' run from Gettysburg brought us to the pretty little city of Pierre, the capital of South Dakota, and located at its geographical centre, where diagonal lines drawn across this rectangular State would intersect.

It was a delight to contrast the well-built, neat, appropriate and well-kept group of buildings of the Government Indian Boarding School here with some of the dilapidated ones which we had seen elsewhere. Once more we felt proud of our great nation, which is sound at heart, and which when thoughtful, and making a real effort, affords so much to stimulate us all and spur us to what is true and noble and best in life.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A VILLAGE IN A CITY.

There was a fine old meeting-house in Philadelphia at Sixth and Noble Streets, where, fifty years ago, the Friends gathered in great numbers, and the galleries were filled with ministers and elders. Then foreign people came to the neighborhood, and Friends moved into the suburbs, as train and trolley made easy travel. So their new meeting-houses grew and the old one was sold. It was so well built of brick and had such a large yard, with a fine wall around it that people said, "Oh, what a pity to pull it down or turn it into a factory."

But their fears were groundless. The men who bought it had a wise plan—a rich gentleman, named Richard Smith, had made a will, leaving many thousands of dollars in memory of his son, to be spent in children's play-grounds; one at Strawberry Mansion in Fairmount Park, one at Front and Lombard Streets, and one at Sixth and Noble. So the old meeting-house was emptied of benches and basket-ball and other games take their places. If you want to look down on this, you can walk upstairs and view it from the galleries. I would like you to go with me and see what a busy place it is when public school is out; five hundred children daily, bright-eyed, dark-haired, alert, having an election, choosing their own mayor and officers for self-government. If the rules are broken, such as fighting or spoiling the shrubbery, a judge and jury sentence the offender, and he is not allowed to play there for awhile.

These children are Russian, Polish, Jewish, Roman Catholics, and Negroes, yet they all are on good terms.

Let us go in on Seventh-day morning at ten o'clock or on Third-day at three-thirty. Then we see the "village," as our lady guide calls it. The boys are store-keepers in the middle of the room, one a baker, one a milk-man, one a toy-seller, one a grocer, and they have imitation loaves and bottles and boxes of food. The girls go to house-keeping in compartments made by benches around the walls, each older girl given four little tots as her family, and they have tiny tables, dishes and beds, that have to be properly arranged. In a back room is a school taught by older girls and to this the house-keepers take the younger ones, and then go to market. As we enter the door, we see the bank and post office to our left, here every child must obtain three dollars in "mock money" for buying and selling, and paying rent, and then at the end he puts back what remains. There is a landlord, a postman, a street-cleaner,—all very diligent. At the opposite corner of the big room is a hospital compartment with little nurses and doctors. These are really given weekly lessons in first aid to the injured so that they secure diplomas, and the parents come to see the "graduation," taking the matter seriously, and saying, "This is fine! My child shall go to a real training school some day!"

A back room is a miniature laundry where maidens are washing the white caps and aprons from the hospital and the grocery store.

Down in the basement is a carpenter shop, where at each bench a boy is making useful articles for home; bird boxes, stools and toys.

Close by are shower baths, marble lined; baths for boys and girls; five minutes are allotted to each one, the towels are brought by them.

Out in the garden we see much excitement in summer—a wading pool filled with happy little folk, also a large sand-pile, see-saws, slides and swings.

Now it is the noon hour and every child is excluded, for no eating is allowed in the building. In comes a great crowd from an adjoining electric factory, six stories high, where one hundred employees gaze out of the windows and cheer one hundred more in a new enclosure, for a base-ball game is in progress—the women wear their factory uniforms, grey knickerbockers, and play on an equality with the men, often doing good work, and being heartily cheered when a hard hit is made. A tumble in the dust makes little difference—the player jumps up and runs on again.

Hark! the whistle blows—their relaxation is over. They cross the street to resume their toil.

On First-days the grown-ups of the neighborhood come to this old "Settlement" house for lectures on Health and Safety. Penny pictures are shown in order to guide them as to worthwhile art.

Can we not all rejoice that the house is a bright spot, a "model village" in the midst of a great city?

HANNAH P. MORRIS.

Is it true that the supreme asset of our Christian life is the story of Jesus? Are we justified in demanding that men tell "the old, old, story of Jesus and his love," and then substitute for that personal story a theological explanation of the story? If we insist that some theological explanation of the story is the foundation of our faith, then we shall be everlastingly trying to close up the gaping cracks as they appear by some improvised theological formula. But if we are convinced that the real spring of inspiration is that life of Jesus itself, we shall be content to promote an intense realization of that life, leaving it to find fresh explanation in the terms of our own age.—ERNEST THOMAS, in The Christian Guardian.

HADDONFIELD AND SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING.

Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting was held at Medford, New Jersey, Ninth Month 14, 1922. A good attendance was encouraging, especially of many of the younger members. The presence of visitors from other Quarterly and Yearly Meetings was acceptable and refreshing. During more than two hours of worship, the promise was realized that, "When two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

The solemn query, "Have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known Me?" was feelingly quoted, and the belief expressed that we need to more fully realize that our Lord, who is "the way, the truth and the life" is ever present, and as our eyes are open to behold Him and our hearts ready to receive Him, He is able and willing to carry every burden and to solve every problem.

We need to recognize Him also in those about us, and to look for the good in them rather than to criticize.

Petitions were offered for the salvation of souls, and for the gift of the Holy Spirit, which our Heavenly Father is longing to bestow on those who seek and for the power which He will give to those who "tarry at Jerusalem."

A recess of more than an hour afforded opportunity to enjoy a bountiful lunch and to mingle with fellow members and visitors on the beautiful lawn under the fine old trees or in the bright autumn sunshine.

When we again assembled the first four queries claimed attention. More zeal in the attendance of meetings and greater watchfulness in fulfilling the requirements of the second query were encouraged. We were reminded that we must "not only love one another, but we need to learn how to differ from each other, and to trust one another."

A visiting Friend reminded us that the Queries originate from a heart love to our God, with a purpose to be obedient to His Spirit and to follow Him, whithersoever He leads.

The reading of the letter from William C. Allen, written in Java, brought Friends into sympathy with him and Elizabeth C. B. Allen, in their Gospel labors, and impressed them with their faithfulness to their Heavenly Father's leading, who has gone before them and has opened the way so remarkably.

A minute was received from Haddonfield and Salem Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders introducing a concern which Nathaniel B. Jones had laid before it, that a meeting might be held for the younger members of our Quarterly Meeting, and others who are interested, at which some of the foundation principles of our Religious Society might be clearly placed before them in order to explain why we, as Friends, maintain some of our distinguishing views and practices. This concern was fully approved and was referred to the members of this meeting who are on the Yearly Meeting Visitation Committee with the name of Nathaniel B. Jones added as Chairman.

In connection with this concern, the responsibility of the Meeting for its younger members has been keenly felt, also the need for deeper reverence, silent worship, and spirituality in our everyday lives. True prayer and exercise of spirit are needed by parents on behalf of their families.

The right kind of homes is the fundamental need of our children, where their best life is the first consideration.

"Do we appreciate what we have in Quakerism?" We cannot expect our children to have ideals which we ourselves do not exemplify.

An interesting and stimulating letter from our friend Elizabeth Abbott Christ was received and read. This related to the meeting held each winter in Orlando, Florida, which was started more than twenty years ago by George and Elizabeth L. Abbott in their home.

Those most interested in the meeting emphasize two points. First, that the holding of such a meeting is just as truly a "State of Society" as the laying down of a meeting. Second, that such a meeting is a real Friendly outpost needing the sympathetic interest, wise counsel and fostering care of the parent organization. A minute was also received from Chester

Preparative Meeting of Ministers and Elders, containing a suggestion that the meeting at Orlando should receive the thoughtful consideration of the Quarterly Meeting. Much unity was expressed with the concern thus laid before us, and the Committee already referred to was asked to take the subject under consideration and report to our next meeting possible ways of assisting the Orlando Meeting.

An interesting report of Moorestown Friends' School was read, showing that the high ideals with which it started are maintained under the wise leadership of W. Elmer Barrett, the Principal, assisted by the School Committee and an excellent corps of teachers, and the scholarship of the pupils ranks in the first order.

The Friends appointed to co-operate with the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Christian Labor in Foreign Lands reported that their chief work during the year had been in connection with two conferences. One was held at Haddonfield and was addressed by William Wistar Comfort, President of Haverford College, on the subject, "Preparation for Service, a Quaker Duty," and by Janet Payne Whitney on the subject, "Individual Responsibility for the Meeting for Worship."

The other conference was held at Atlantic City and was addressed by Alfred C. Garrett, who spoke on "Cardinal Principles of the Society of Friends." There was a good attendance of Friends and others.

The new appointees to co-operate with the Yearly Meeting Committee on Christian Labor in Foreign Lands are Arthur L. Richie, Elizabeth A. Roberts, Charles D. Barton, Emily B. Stokes, Georgianna Buzby and Mary H. Jones.

A minute was received from Canada Yearly Meeting, held at Norwich, Ontario, in the Sixth Month, stating that the Gospel labors of our Friend Alfred Lowry had been strengthening and encouraging.

During our sessions at this time the presence of visitors from other Quarterly and Yearly Meetings has been acceptable and refreshing. As we have met together, our Lord has been present and has been lifted up among us.

We have each been entreated to make a whole-hearted surrender to Him, who came into the world not to condemn, but to save the world; whose blood cleanses from all sin, who, as He dwells within our hearts, fills us with His love, enables us to have fellowship with one another, gives us strength for every time of need, and will empower us to go into all the world and preach His Gospel, the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever," who has promised to be with us until "the end of the world."

REPORT OF F. O. R. CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Fellowship of Reconciliation held this year at George School is remembered as a time of deep searching of heart for the fundamentals. Fellowship brought forth good will and an active effort to really understand each other. "Creating the Co-operative Life" was the general topic and time was given to Education, Social and Industrial Conditions and International Situations. We heard from workers in various schools and experimental colonies; the President of Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor placed vividly before us the situation of the coal miners and we all felt his attitude of brotherhood towards them; while those wartime prisoners at Leavenworth were spoken for by one of their number recently released. Internationally we had first-hand reports from the Christian International at Geneva, and from the co-operating forces of Europe today, also some word pictures of Russia by one who was there at the time of the Revolution. Many big things were brought before the Conference, but that which remains brightest is the feeling that there was real toleration. The group of over two hundred contained those of widely differing convictions. Instead of antagonism there was an earnest longing that there might be a drawing together by Christ's love.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

"WHEN THE PEOPLE WANT PEACE they will have peace; when they want war, they will have war. And they are likely to want that of which most is sung and written and spoken. The more we talk about peace, the less our chance of war."—REAR ADMIRAL GOODRICH.

THE THIRD ASSEMBLY OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS met at Geneva early this month with forty-four governments represented. The Council of the League assembled a few days earlier.

Reports of the Council of the League indicated that in more than twenty countries which furnished figures there has been some reduction in military outlay. Great Britain reported a reduction of 55 per cent. in naval tonnage; France 36 per cent.; Italy 49 per cent., and Japan 59 per cent.

THE DISARMAMENT COMMITTEE of the League of Nations introduced a resolution with the present session of the League Assembly, asking all countries to reduce their military expenditures to the 1913 figures.

BRAZILIAN DELEGATES TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS object to the proposal to extend the Washington Naval agreements to all nations, on the ground that the two battleships which would be Brazil's quota under those agreements would be insufficient to protect her long coastline. Meanwhile, Argentina is proposing mutual land and naval disarmament in South America.

AT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS MEETING this year, as in each of the previous meetings, a fundamental cleavage is again evident between the liberal and the strict constructionists of the Covenant. The former, led by Lord Robert Cecil, would have the Assembly enlarge its powers at the expense of the Council, the Conference of Ambassadors, and the conferences of premiers; the latter, led by Lord Balfour, deplore any radical enlargement of the Assembly's functions, fearing that it could not stand the strain. Lord Robert proposes that the Assembly, as a result of this meeting, lay before all its constituent governments a draft treaty for universal limitation of land and naval armaments based on the precedents established at the Washington Conference. He would have the Assembly intervene to bring peace in Asia Minor. He urges his colleagues to work for the re-establishment of normal relations with Russia. Lord Balfour would leave all these difficult and dangerous questions to the League Council, or preferably to the regular diplomatic and political channels. It is too early to tell whether Lord Robert will be more successful this year than previously in overcoming his colleagues' hesitancy to venture on experimental paths.—Foreign Policy Association News Bulletin.

AN EFFORT TO SUPPRESS the singing of "Deutschland Uber Alles" in the Rhine Provinces occupied by French troops was met with criticism in the French press which indicates that the war-time hatred of everything German is ebbing. The editor of L'Oeuvre went so far as to compare it with the "Marseillaise" and "Rule Britannia," and found the German song "singularly pacific and reasonable."

RALPH M. EASLEY, Secretary of the National Civic Federation, some time ago printed a large sheet attacking the National Council for the Reduction of Armaments. Chief Justice Taft, who was an honorary vice president of the National Civic Federation, resigned from that organization when he was shown the document, saying that he did not wish to be a member of any controversial organization.

THE RESULTS OF THE NEAR EAST SETTLEMENT are thus characterized by William T. Ellis in the Philadelphia Public Ledger:—

Enough has been told to indicate that the Allies in the Near East, by letting selfish ambition take the place of simple righteousness, have brought upon their own heads a swift and terrible retribution. They have been punished in the very particulars wherein they did wrong. All, or nearly all, that they sought to gain has been lost to them, as well as their own priceless accord and prestige. Instead of enriching themselves by their recency to a high and sacred trust they have impoverished civilization.

Providence, or Nemesis, or whatever one chooses to call it, has overtaken a wicked and foolish diplomacy in the very paths of its transgression. The "little peoples" of Asia are jeering in derision at the "Great Powers" today—because the latter were not great enough to be trusted with a simple task of justice.

ITALY IS ILLUSTRATING how a country may provide for its surplus population by peaceful methods. She has sent her General Commissioner of Emigration to Canada to arrange for a huge colonization scheme to settle Italian emigrants in the Dominion. Canada seems willing and glad to receive hard working and thrifty colonists of this kind.

LIONEL CURTIS, ONE OF THE BRITISH REPRESENTATIVES at the Institute of Politics at Williams College last month, said that when the next war came and national safety was at stake, international rules for making war less horrible were bound to be swept away. "It is the wildest folly to imagine anything else," he said. "Some nation will enlist every latest discovery of natural science in order that it may save itself, and then every other belligerent will do the same in self-defense. You cannot humanize war, you can only abolish it."

THE PEACE COMMITTEE is circulating a reprint of Frederick J. Libby's valuable article for teachers, "What Can I Do for Peace?" and during the summer distributed through the Directors of the Summer Schools more than 8000 copies to students in ten of the Pennsylvania Normal Schools, in seven summer schools in Pennsylvania and in one in Delaware. Copies for distribution or personal use may be had on application to the Peace Committee, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

THE RUSSIAN WINTER PROGRAM.

The American and English Units met in conference at Buzuluk on the twentieth of last month. The report shows that the most important problem was the winter feeding program. Robert Dunn writes:

"Again the English and American Quaker Relief Missions of Russia meet in conference in Buzuluk. Again the thirty delegates from the two Missions are faced with a situation tremendously different from that of two months before. 'On Seventh Month 1st we were talking and planning 'reconstruction in place of relief; we were considering how to organize peasant industries and to feed only that small portion of the population that would probably need food, we actually voted to cut the feeding program 75 per cent! Indeed at that time we considered everything in the light of the prospect of a more than an average harvest. Now, Eighth Month 21st, we are talking Jamine relief again; we are estimating the greatly increased number of people who must be fed immediately—wreck or no wreck; we withdraw from the lines that we called 'reconstruction,' we think again in the urgent terms of the terrible winter of 1921-22. The reason for this, of course, is the drought of from four to six weeks which came at the critical season of the summer when the grain needed most rain. That drought changes our plans by hundreds of thousands of dollars, by tens of thousands of metric tons of food.

"First, we consider the number of people in the 56 volosts of the uyezd that are in actual need of food either immediately or sometime before the next harvest.

"After discussion it is decided that, taking into consideration both the answers to the Government questionnaire and the recent investigation of crop conditions carried on separately by the Friends, approximately 45 per cent. of the population of the whole uyezd will be in need of Friends' food (if the Government or any outside agency is not prepared to provide any) in the course of the next ten or eleven months. This is an average figure for the year. But one thing is clear in the minds of the members of both Missions, e. g., we are again facing a famine condition in Buzuluk. Its severity will increase with each month of the coming winter.

"The American workers met the next day to discuss in more detail both the reports from the District Supervisors and the Government figures. The darker of the two reports—that from the Supervisors—shows that the percentage of people considered as in need of food during the year varies from volost to volost. The highest run 99, 98, 97, 90, 88 and 87 per cent.; in only four volosts, fairly prosperous ones, does it run below 60 per cent. . . . As at the Joint Conference we decided to strike a mean between the Government's earlier and more optimistic estimate and that of the District Supervisors, and we arrive at the same 45 per cent. as an average of the number that will need feeding in the course of the year. To feed that many—or an average of 72,000 souls over eleven months, it will take just as much food each month as the American Quakers have been bringing into the East Buzuluk area during the peak of the famine last winter and spring. It means, in other words, feeding as many this winter as we did last, and still more, for ours is now a greater responsibility since we shall not, after two months more of corn issuance, have the A. R. A. support for the hungry adults. All that burden will now fall upon the Mission. So it really means, in point of the number of pyoks issued, a more extensive Quaker feeding program than at any time up to date. . . . Until you realize these facts you do not begin to appreciate the current famine and the relation to it of the Friends' Mission in Russia."

The question of the future organization of the work came in for serious consideration. It is the desire of both sections that an early and complete union be effected. A new agreement will be negotiated with the Soviet Government covering the entire work carried on by Friends.

The problems of reconstruction have not been laid aside, even though emergency relief work must still be carried on upon a large scale. It was thought that horses met the agricultural needs of the peasants better than tractors, which can be used only near the railroads because of the difficulty in transporting fuel and making repairs. A plan for the purchase of horses similar to the one used in Poland was recommended. The horses would remain under the control of the Unit and be loaned to individual peasants or local organizations. The English have already devised a scheme for trading flour for horses. The Russian Government takes the flour for use in its own relief work in the famine area, giving credit in roubles. With this credit horses are purchased costing about £7 to £9 apiece. In the course of this transaction flour to the value of £1 acquires a purchasing power of £2½.

The crop failure makes it necessary to modify the policy of "No adult feeding except in exchange for work;" yet on the whole it will be adhered to. People are anxious to start constructive work and are requesting help in building mills and bridges, repairing schools, setting up blacksmith shops, etc. They will be given rations in payment for such work. Every effort will be made to give continued and increasing support to the home industries. Wool and flax will be provided for spinning and weaving, and felt for the making of valenki (boots).

Clothing is still needed in all the villages. Arrangements are being made to exchange clothing for wool and raw materials as well as homespun to be used in the children's homes. In the villages sewing-circles have been organized to make over garments for the children. The women have shown much interest and have willingly given many hours to this work. The homes and hospitals still need equipment of all kinds—clothing, beds, bedding, medicines and adequate food.

The medical program is under the direction of Dr. Mackenzie, who is working out a plan for the medical reconstruction of the entire country.

And finally the fall sowing. Everywhere peasants were asking, "Shall we sow our little rye or shall we eat it?" If the Friends can promise a ration—anything to keep soul and body together during the winter—they will sow and, sowing, they will have some courage to carry them through the winter and some hope for next year. The conference agreed to tell them, "Sow, and we will do our best to feed you when your food is gone."

FRIENDS' AGRICULTURAL SHOW IN POLAND.

On Eighth Month 15th, an Agricultural Show was organized, says W. Carleton Palmer, one of the Friends' workers at Holoby, Poland. The place chosen was an old platform and buildings formerly used as a rail-head by the German army during the war. A report from the field reads:

"Part of the proceedings consisted of a long procession of villagers from the different villages in which Friends' Mission help had been given and of the horses in the ploughing columns. These horses were ridden by the peasants who were being helped and for one village several women were riding. The whole scene was very attractive and reminiscent of the wild west, very stimulating when one knew of the work lying behind it all,—the special help which was given to returning refugees. There were special exhibits of vegetables, grain and flax, much of it grown entirely from Mission seed. A Government official was present and warmly thanked the Mission for the work which has been done. It is said to be the first agricultural show which had ever been attempted in the agricultural districts of Poland. We think it very probable it will not by any means be the last. Between 2000 and 3000 people were present and great interest was taken in the sports, ploughing competition, etc. All the places where alcohol was sold were closed for the day. After the show I visited some of the outlying districts where people are still crowded into unhealthy dugouts and at present have no prospect of being able to build houses for themselves next winter. If only more money were forthcoming what extremely valuable work could be done. Everyone who sees it is indeed struck by the need and terrible situation of these innocent victims of the war."

A NEW EMERGENCY IN POLAND.

No country better illustrates how the evil that wars do lives on than Poland. Here is the eighth harvest season drawing to a close and still the Polish peasant can not feed himself, to say nothing of providing food for hungry Europe as he did before 1914. Tens of thousands of acres lie untilled and thousands more which the Mission has aided in putting in condition may not be planted this fall. This means that the 1923 harvest will be as short as this year's. . . .

On Eighth Month 24th Florence Barrow wrote:

"We are of course leaving no stone unturned to get as much help as possible from the Government; but with the value of the mark dropping every day and the many political difficulties in the country, it is doubtful if much will be forthcoming, and meantime the fate of 7,000 families including many children, hangs in the balance. Will they have to remain destitute and without bread to eat for another two winters; or can they hope that they may again become self-supporting, self-respecting citizens?"

"We who know something of what this means to many of the individuals concerned earnestly desire that it may be the latter."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WE had fully expected to give an account of Ohio Yearly Meeting in this issue, but nothing for publication has been received. We hope to have it in hand in a few days.

FRIENDS AT STATE COLLEGE, PA.—Friends at State College, Pa., met for their first meeting this fall in the living-room of the Friends' Union on Ninth Month 17th. There was an attendance of nearly forty persons, the students and town Friends representing both Eastern branches and coming from a large number of "home meetings." A chairman was chosen to have general charge of the meetings throughout the College year, and a committee was appointed to arrange any necessary plans and to invite out-of-town Friends to visit the meetings. This year there are seven Friends who have come to Penn State as new students, who have already gotten in touch with the group.

The Friends' Union has made a promising start this fall. Twenty-three students who were at the house last year have returned and seven more have recently been added to the number. Ground at the rear of the house is being leveled for a tennis court, and will probably be ready for use in a short time. Everett Dewees, of Media, Pa., was elected last spring to be president of the Friends' Union for the present semester.

THE "CCL Book," which gives a full account of the 250th anniversary of Baltimore Yearly Meetings, is ready for distribution. Orders for these books should be sent to O. Edward Janney, 825 Newton Avenue, Baltimore, Md. The price is $1.00 a copy.

IN writing of the recent Bluffton Conference, the reporter to The Mennonite says: "It is surely a memory to cherish with a feeling of gratitude to have been privileged to sit in a conference in which Mennonites and Quakers and Dunkards together with representatives of other Christian bodies talked and prayed together for a closer touch and fellowship in promoting the prevalence of the spirit and teaching of the Lord in the world. And it was a reassuring thought that our praying with and for each other would not stop there."

THE Friends' Intelligencer refers to two closed meeting-houses in New York State as follows:—

At the close of an annual meeting held in the old Quaker Springs Meeting-house near Saratoga, New York, eight concerned Friends in the neighborhood requested that the building, which has been closed for years, be opened again on First-day the 27th for regular meetings for worship, and promised to attend. The faithfulness of two Friends in the locality is thus rewarded in seeing their devotion bear fruit; one of them has cared for the grounds and opened the doors many times when no one came, and the other has planned and kept alive the annual meetings.

A similar experiment will be tried in Amawalk, Westchester County, on Ninth Month 17th, when three devoted families will again open their meeting-house to the community, even though it is small, for regular meetings for worship, through the pleasant weather at least.

ERNEST H. BENNIS, writing from Limerick, Ireland, to The Friend (London), Eighth Month 22nd, alludes to having seen but little in that publication in regard to affairs in Ireland and says: "Your readers may be interested in knowing that Friends in Ireland, though passing through a terrible time of danger and anxiety, have been mercifully preserved, though I think it cannot be said that we took as firm a stand as in 1798. In Limerick conditions threatened to be worse than elsewhere as the whole city was divided into two armed camps about equal in numbers, equipment and entrenchments, and rifle and machine gun firing continued day and night for nearly a fortnight. Yet when fighting was at its fiercest, we literally experienced 2 Kings vii.

During the whole time the Roman Catholic priests were indefatigable in their efforts with both parties to avoid bloodshed and in bringing the people together for intercessory prayer for Divine deliverance.

Was the saving of the city due to the finding of ten righteous men, or an answer to prayer?"

W. HEFFER & SONS, Cambridge, have in the press a volume prepared by Dr. Rendel Harris and Stephen K. Jones entitled, "The Pilgrim Press: a Bibliographical and Historical Memorial of the Books Printed at Leyden by the Pilgrim Fathers," with a chapter on the location of the Pilgrim Press in Leyden by Dr. Plooiij. In the whole story of the Pilgrims, there are not many passages more dramatic than those which occur in the account of the fortunes of their Printing House in Leyden, where for some three years the fight for freedom was fought from under the cover of secrecy, and King James and his advisers, civil and ecclesiastical, were bombarded by unseen hands, and by persons who were at once anonymous, and for a long while undetected. It was a short-lived but splendid campaign. The close of this part of the struggle, when after three years' steady work, the printers were chased away, and their types seized by command of British emissaries, is a fine chapter's ending in the history of the Puritan revolt; no dramatic representation of the Pilgrim movement can afford to ignore it. The purpose of the volume, at first sight wholly bibliographical, is to exhibit to the eye, by the method of facsimile, the work of the Leyden printers, and in that manner to supply criteria for the detection of works that may be, with greater or less probability, attributed to them.—The Friend (London).

BUT THE LORD LOOKETH ON THE HEART.

These words may be more familiar to some of us than is the account in which they occur. In Samuel i: xvi we find the story of the prophet's commission to go to the household of Jesse, carrying with him a horn filled with oil, so that he might anoint from among the eight sons one who should be a king to reign over Israel. "And it came to pass, when they were come, that he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the Lord's anointed is before him. But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." And it was only after the seven stalwart sons had passed before him and the boy David had been brought in from the fields, that the word came to Samuel, "Arise, anoint him; for this is he."

Depending upon the state in which any of us may find ourselves, there may be for us in these words either stirring condemnation or inexpressible comfort.

Perhaps we have been too critical of some one. All appearances may be against him. He may not even be able to say anything convincing in his own defense. We may feel that our judgment is perfectly justified, based though it may be upon an imperfect understanding of all the facts in the case, or of the really underlying motives. We do well to remember that fine French proverb, Tout comprendre, c'est tout pardonner, and if we have perchance condemned too hastily and too severely, shall we not feel still more condemned ourselves as we consider our action in the light of the caution spoken to the prophet: "For the Lord seeth not as man seeth."

Or suppose that we are trying to make one kind of impression, covering an inward condition that is something quite different from the favorable effect that we may be skillful enough to produce outwardly. We may "get by," even with our most intimate associates. We may get all the credit we desire, commendation and appreciation for our upright, noble lives and even the approbation of godly men and women, who think that we have been willing to surrender everything, when only we ourselves know that we have held back a part of the price. But "Be not deceived, God is not mocked!" Let us remember, though it be to our shame and confusion, that "man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." It is a dread warning, when we are tempted towards hypocrisy.

But it is the other side of the medal that makes this truth of wonderful comfort. If it condemn us for harsh judgment of others before we know all the facts, or for any tolerated insincerity in our own lives, by the same token it can bring us consolation when we are the victims of circumstance, the innocent sufferers from unfavorable appearances. Have we inadvertently, or it may be even through some palpable lack of discretion, laid ourselves open to the censure of those who are always more than ready to pass judgment? Have we somehow been placed in a compromising situation, where to say the word that would clear ourselves might involve someone else whom we should feel unwilling to have dragged into the affair? Or have we, it may be through our very longing to be completely honest with ourselves and with our God, been obliged to pursue a course that causes even our most loyal friends to question our sincerity of purpose? Then it is that we find unspeakable solace in the realization that all things are indeed "opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do," who is "a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

Then we can take fresh courage in the midst of all our sufferings and anguish, assuring ourselves with joy—that joy which, it has been said, is measured by its ability to triumph over suffering—that man may indeed, if he will, look upon the outward appearance and base his judgments on that, but that there is One who does not judge on circumstantial evidence; One who is able and willing to see deeper; One who searches out the underlying motives, however obscure; One who, in very truth, looketh on the heart.

IN THE FAR EAST.

CHINA.

WILLIAM C. ALLEN.

Let us for a moment take a look at Nagasaki, the port of Japan that we called at before sailing for China, as it appeared in 1922. At Nagasaki our ship took on coal. About eighteen lighters appeared on either side of the vessel, each with a crew of thirty men and women. Scaffolds were quickly erected up to the coal bunkers—the distance from the coal to the bunkers being about twenty-five feet. Men and women clad in Japanese costumes dug out the coal and shoveled it into baskets which were passed from one pair of hands to another, up the scaffolds, with inconceivable rapidity. It took nine persons to lift the baskets from the lighters up to the bunkers, so that each basket went through nine pairs of hands. I saw nine men and women on a scaffold hand coal up the twenty-five feet, in this manner, at the rate of four seconds per basket, including dumping it into the bunker. I saw nine women consume only three seconds with the same operation. Our eyes could not follow the baskets—so quickly were they shot upward. But how some of us pitied those humble workers! They get about one-and-a-half yen, or seventy-five cents, for say ten hours of such labor. A lady looking over the railing of our ship, down on to the human machines under us, exclaimed, "Again, I am glad I am an American woman!"

At Shanghai I had the privilege of seeing the great Chinese National Church Council and leaving with it the messages given me to deliver abroad by the Federal Council and California State Church Federation. It was a wonderful assemblage of native and foreign Christians from all over that great country. The subject of internationalism to some extent claimed the attention of the delegates present. The Conference Bulletin reports W. P. Nei as declaring, "I believe that if internationalism is to be brought about anywhere, it is to be done in the Church. We have been all the time talking about the 'Chinese Church.'" The general attitude of American and English missionaries and native workers in Japan toward world politics and the obligation of the Church to create International friendship and good-will has always seemed to me more keen in that country than in China. The complexities of the International situation have possibly created deeper concern in the minds of the missionaries of Japan than has been the case in China.

We rode around Shanghai for an hour in rickshaws. By noon the Chinese city had almost entirely stopped business for the day. Flags and banners glaring waved in the breeze. A holiday was on. Why? It was "Anti-Japanese Day." It was the anniversary of the signing of the "Twenty-one Points," when, during the Great War, China had been compelled by Japan to practically sign away much of her independence. The result of the Washington Conference has to a large extent neutralized the reason for antagonism on the part of China, but the day is still remembered by the Chinese in order that the spirit of fear and hatred toward Japan may be kept alive. Bad business, we say! Meanwhile the change of policy on the part of Japan will doubtless tend to overcome the ill-effects of the pressure brought to bear a few years ago upon China.

We left the S. S. Shinyo Maru at Hongkong and, amid many shrill voices in a strange tongue, soon found ourselves at an English hotel, some distance up the mountain away from the seething streets close by the waterside. At that time of year the sun was almost exactly overhead in that latitude, and everything reeked with moisture. Once more we were in a corner of the British Empire, where things associated with living in hotels or private homes are different from America. Why is it that our good British cousins so enjoy old-fashioned discomforts when new methods and modern thought could so easily increase their happiness and efficiency? Here is a typical breakfast when the juice would ooze out of every pore whilst only sitting still: oatmeal porridge, fried fish, fried ham, bacon, eggs, fried potatoes, heavy hot cakes, tea, coffee, largely chicory.

I had many interesting experiences in Canton. There was a great deal of agitation in the city owing to strikes and political disturbances. The modern Chinaman is learning Western ways very, very rapidly.

Whilst in Canton I was invited to a Chinese feast given by the graduating class of the Canton Christian College to the faculty of that splendid institution. About eighty guests were present. The feast was held in a "Flower Boat," or rather, two such boats joined together. These house-boats had high ceilings and the interiors were elaborately decorated with handsome or grotesque carvings and paintings rich in colors and gold. Much of the furniture was black wood inlaid with pearl. Our courses were as follows: (1) Chicken, cut up; (2) Mushrooms; (3) Fish, cut up; (4) Crab meat and mushrooms; (5) Sharks' fins; (6) Bird's nest soup; (7) Lotus root; (8) Soft shell turtle, whole; (9) Avalone; (10) Fish air bladder; (11) Black-meated and black-bone chicken, with all the bones taken out (a trick of the skilful cook); (12) White watermelon boiled in ham and chicken soup; (13) Bamboo hearts and crab; (14) Fish, steamed whole; (15) Stewed pears and lichens, which fruit looks like big strawberries; (16) Gelatine, noodles, meat-cakes and cakes; (17) Tops of boiled milk cut into round, thin little pieces, chopped peppers, hard-boiled eggs and dried sun-fish; (18) Rice soup, ham flavor; (19) Rice in bowls; (20) Turnip soup. During the consumption of these twenty courses, there were sauces on the tables for each guest, and watermelon seeds to pick at beside fruits. Every article of diet was highly seasoned. The Chinese took almost all the courses. The foreigners were more guarded in their gastronomic efforts. Everyone used, or tried to eat with chop-sticks, but the novices soon discovered that many articles were too slippery to get hold of in that fashion. I did not attempt to tackle everything. It was a very merry company. Chinese and foreigners sat together, told stories, made fun of one another and discussed the mysterious flavors of the super-bountiful assortment of foods set before them.

The splendidly situated city of Hongkong with its 600,000 population impressed us more in 1922 than it did the first time we were there a few years ago. We were introduced into the possibilities of high humidity—the steaming air in a high temperature. The foreign business quarter and the foreign residential sections are beautiful with their excellent architecture and shaded streets. We particularly noticed the great difference between the living conditions of the white people and those of the Chinese—or, more correctly speaking, the relatively easy lives of the rich and well-to-do in comparison with the struggling existence of the poor. Of course there are wealthy Chinese everywhere. I have seen Chinese ladies, exquisitely attired in the richest silks, handle the finest of fabrics in the great shops of Hongkong with the nonchalance of American women of wealth and fashion. On the other hand, we have seen, say, six young Chinese girls pull on the ropes attached to a very heavy cart, loaded with possibly fifteen hundred pounds of timber such as two or four horses would draw in America, and as these girls strained at the ropes up a steep street for blocks, they would double up until their faces almost touched the ground. Thomas Cook & Son charged us six dollars, Hongkong money, for taking our baggage from the hotel down to the ship, a distance of about one mile, when we left the city. Two coolies hung our two cabin trunks and other pieces of baggage, aggregating possibly a weight of over three hundred pounds, on the ever-useful bamboo pole, between them and trotted off at a gait that made me swelter to keep up with them. No doubt, according to payment for such service in China, they received only a few cents for the job. Down in the busy streets every day of the year moves a grunting, seething, struggling mass of people. The chair-bearers, rickshaw-pullers and carriers of burdens on the busy docks are generally clothed only in loin cloths. These men steam with the sweat that pours off of them in the humid air. The streets of Hongkong are full of dirt, life, color, sound, laughter and song. The motor-cars of officials and of some of the foreigners took their way through the crowded thoroughfares whilst their white-helmeted occupants sit back and superciliously eye the half-naked coolies or the white people who are compelled to get out of their way. Young English soldiers, acting as police, peremptorily order about the freighted coolies who at times cringe under vindictive language and the threats poured upon them. You ride for miles in a rickshaw or on the second story of a tram-car and, glancing upwards, see the four floors of the houses wherein dwell the natives, mostly poor. What a horrible mess they live in! The business streets are gay with fluttering banners and marvelous signs and advertisements covered all over with the strange characters of their language. It is an extraordinary picture—it is unforgettable! This is Hongkong!

"MAN'S life is but a working day,
Whose tasks are set aright:
A time to work, a time to pray,
And then a quiet night."

OHIO FRIENDS.

MAX I. REICH.

Ohio Friends, whose sun-kissed hills
 And smiling dales invite me still,
 To breathe their purer atmosphere,
 Far from the restlessness abroad;
 Quiet scenes where heaven's timid dove—
 The ancient peace—still lingers on;
 I hail your charming old-world ways,
 As yet unspoiled by modern touch;
 Where rugged strength and gentleness
 Dwell in sweet concord, neth one roof.
 The changes of evolving life
 May leave you with untroubled mind.
 Cleave to the past, yet keep in step
 With Truth's advance, from age to age.
 The old must certify the new;
 The new rejuvenate the old.
 The Light has come, arise and shine,
 Extend the radius of light!
 And dare to follow where Christ leads,
 It may be into paths unknown.
 Live Christ, give Christ, losing to gain,
 Sowing to reap, dying to live.

FIFTH MONTH 16, 1922.

OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

The Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, on Ninth Month 8th, marked as usual the opening of Ohio Yearly Meeting, at Stillwater near Barnesville. Though there were five visiting Ministers in attendance throughout, and two more who arrived later, it was an unusual circumstance that all of these were men. They included James M. Moon, Arthur R. Pennell and Alfred Lowry from Philadelphia; Alfred Copeland and Jeremiah C. Allen from North Carolina; Robert L. Simkin from West China, and T. Edmund Harvey, from Leeds, Yorkshire, England. Six Elders were present, likewise all men, of whom one, Anderson Barker, was from North Carolina and the rest, Samuel S. Haines, William B. Kirkbride, Isaac Powell Leeds, Morris Linton and Thomas K. Brown, were from Philadelphia.

The public meetings on First-day morning and afternoon brought out many who were either descended from Friends or who had at one time been members themselves and still valued to a certain extent their connection with the Society.

Carl Patterson, who has served the Yearly Meeting so acceptably as Clerk for seven or eight years, was continued, but it was felt that the Assistant Clerk, Wilson Mifflin Hall, who is now the Superintendent of the Boarding School, was already carrying as much as ought reasonably to be asked of him. He was accordingly released and Oliver Binns appointed to succeed him. This appointment was peculiarly acceptable to a considerable part of the membership.

The Meeting for Sufferings was able to present certain concrete suggestions for a moderate revision of the Book of Discipline, which has been in force almost unchanged for over a century. Many would have been glad for a more drastic revision, but all were happy that what was accomplished could be done in such complete harmony. The new edition will be arranged topically rather than alphabetically, the marriage regulations have been rewritten (though there is little actual change, except that "passing meeting" may now be accomplished in writing, instead of in person as heretofore), and there are a great number of minor changes throughout the book.

The reports of the Boarding School Committee and of the Educational Committee (having some oversight of the Monthly Meeting schools) were of interest. A class of sixteen graduated last spring, and there are 311 children of school age the present year, representing about one-fifth of the estimated membership total.

A paper treating of the attitude of the meeting towards those who had violated the peace testimony in the troublous days of the war was felt by many to be unusually lively, and to carry with it a spirit of Christian love, sympathy and forbearance that were very beautiful. It is intended to be circulated among all the subordinate meetings.

Epistles were received and read from all of the Conservative Yearly Meetings with which Ohio is in correspondence, viz.: New England, Canada, Western, Iowa, Kansas and North Carolina. Letters were also read from Philadelphia, London and Friends in Stuttgart, Germany. It was decided at a later session to appoint a committee to aid the Clerk in acknowledging suitably these last three. This was in addition to the usual "Epistle Committee." The peace appeal, issued by the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings and endorsed by London, was likewise endorsed by Ohio. This step appeared to be a great relief to many minds.

A meeting for worship was held as usual on Fourth-day morning, and by request of two Friends, a meeting for younger members was appointed for the same afternoon. This was felt by some to be an impressive time. The usual evening readings at the School proved as in the past, to be, frequently, times of solemnity and earnest searching of heart.

The final session, on Fifth-day the 14th, was to some the most worth-while of the week, when the tide of spiritual life seemed to rise the highest, and the meeting to "loosen up," as a fourteen-year old boy expressed it. A spirit of outreaching love covered the assembly, and the Divine Presence seemed very near.

The social life, centering at the School, is always a feature of Yearly Meeting week. The two evenings when stirring addresses were made by Frederick J. Libby on working to make another war impossible, and by T. Edmund Harvey, who described Quakerism in England and also told about present conditions in Europe, will be long remembered by those who were privileged to be present. Another interesting evening was spent discussing informally yet earnestly certain problems of education. Questions which had previously been posted were assigned to certain ones to introduce, and the exchange of ideas was felt to be most valuable.

IMPRESSIONS OF A SCHOOL GIRL.

Ohio Yearly Meeting, 1922, was marked by unusual interest in many ways. The group of young people, perhaps larger than usual, seemed very slow to take any active part. Their deep interest was evidenced by the fact that there was little going in and out during business sessions. It seemed strange to have no women ministers with minutes. There was one vacancy in the gallery which seemed to speak to us more loudly than words. A voice (Esther Fowler's) that so often spoke a message of helpfulness we now heard only in memory.

The first business session began with the usual impressive silence. The main feature was the reading of epistles from other Yearly Meetings. If we had any doubts that such correspondence was worth while the message from Germany answered it. It was brought vividly before us how against all difficulties they were trying to follow the true faith.

The public meetings on First-day were attended by a large group of interested people other than Friends. Appeals were made to us to give up all and follow our Master. That wonderful saying of Christ—I am come that ye might have life and that ye might have it more abundantly, was quoted and illustrated most appropriately. A wish was expressed that we might, each one of us, carry away a higher vision, one that would follow and help us. On Fourth-day afternoon a meeting was held especially for the younger people. Two of the Ministers present very feelingly appealed to us for a more complete dedication to service in the Master's cause.

The reading of the Queries and Answers on Second-day, if it did seem like routine business, brought up several new thoughts. If we had true Christian love we would at all times be just in our dealings. Particular attention was called to our reading. Anything that tended to draw us away from Christ was harmful.

The vital interest of the Yearly Meeting on the subject of education was reflected by the reports of the Primary Schools and Boarding School. The Primary School report was mainly statistical, but in the evening educational meeting the real work of these Friends' schools was interestingly discussed. The value to the Society and the importance of keeping up these schools was forcibly presented. A member of the Committee said she wished that the Boarding School teachers and students might know and appreciate the deep concern the Committee felt for their welfare. A patron said she thought that some of the friendships formed by the students with older Friends was one of the most valuable things of Boarding School life. Those of us who had ever tried it felt this to be very true.

Probably no one subject enlisted greater interest than the changes proposed in the Book of Discipline by the Representative Meeting. We had a second thought when someone said: "I wonder just how many of us have ever read the Discipline clear through carefully." We will certainly take a renewed interest in the revised edition when it is printed. That renewed interest will I hope lead us to think still more deeply on the question—Why am I a Friend?

THE MODERN MISSIONARY.

WM. W. CADBURY.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE FRIEND, PHILADELPHIA:—

The enclosed article has been written to summarize the message that I have tried to give Friends during the past year of the purpose and ideals of the missionary of the present day. While some may differ with the point of view that I have given, nevertheless it is the point of view adopted by a great number of missionaries and mission boards. I think that I may say that the majority of missionaries at the present day would second the views which I have here expressed.

If you think that it would be welcomed by the readers of THE FRIEND, I would be pleased to have it published.

The subscriptions to my support have been received from more than one hundred and seventy-five different persons, nearly all members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. I believe that the total amount required was subscribed and almost all of it has been paid in. This is an evidence to me of the sympathy which Philadelphia Friends have in Mission work such as that carried on by the Canton Christian College.

I remain, very sincerely,

WM. W. CADBURY.

[The foregoing sufficiently explains itself. THE FRIEND is glad to give space to so clear and honest a presentation of what has at times in the recent past been difficult to explain and still more difficult to understand.—EDS.]

A little boy was walking along a narrow path on the face of a cliff. A false step and the child had fallen many feet on to the rocks below. Mahomed passed by and hearing the child crying out with pain, sighed and said: "It is the will of Allah."

Gautama Buddha then passed along the road, and looking over the cliff he cried out: "You wandered from the right path—and in consequence are suffering just retribution for your error."

Then came Confucius and feeling real sympathy with the child, explained to him how he had gone wrong and what he should have done in order to keep from falling, and so passed on.

Lastly Jesus appeared. He leaned over the cliff, reached down his arm, taking the child by the hand he drew him back to the path and started him once more on the right road.

All religions teach righteousness, but it is essentially the rôle of Christianity to restore, to save the fallen, and to help men to find the path of truth, which leads upward and onward.

HISTORICAL.

Christianity has always been essentially a missionary religion. Christ himself was the great type of a missionary. He spent His life in teaching, preaching and healing.

There have been three epochs of missionary activity, each followed by a period of rest, when the faith was being established.

The first three centuries of the Christian era constituted the first of these periods. The Apostles and Paul began the work, but the greater part of the propaganda was carried on by laymen, scholars, soldiers, sailors, travelers and slaves. They bore the message which was the secret of their inner lives and a new attitude toward the world, which constituted salvation.

A period of arrest followed from the middle of the fourth to the middle of the seventh century, while the Church became firmly established.

The second period of missionary activity dates from the end of the sixth century and continued for four hundred years. During this period all the missionaries were ecclesiastics. They spread out from three centres. From Constantinople they traveled through Southern Russia and the Balkans. From Rome they entered Germany; Gaul, Britain and the Scandinavian countries; and from Britain also men went forth into Northern Europe.

A second period of arrest followed for four hundred years, until the modern period of activity began in the middle of the sixteenth century. It was at this time that the Jesuit and Franciscan Fathers began to follow the explorers of the new world and the traders in the far East.

While the early missionaries of this period were Roman Catholics, the Protestant churches began to undertake missionary work at about the beginning of the nineteenth century.

It would appear that the close of this third period of missionary activity was near at hand. This meant that men must take up the task of strengthening and establishing the Churches in the many lands to which the message has been brought.

THE OLD TYPE OF MISSIONARY.

The typical missionary, as President Faunce says, was often described as "a gentleman in a frock coat, standing under a palm tree discoursing Western doctrine to Eastern savages, who declined to assimilate it, but each moment threatened to assimilate him."

THE AIM OF THE MODERN MISSIONARY.

The aim or purpose of the modern missionary differs markedly from this picture. The old theology seeks to rescue certain souls from a wrecked world, but the new theology seeks to save the wreck itself. As Carl Heath says in his Swarthmore lecture, the function of the Church "is not to produce from without an impress on the inward life, but rather an impress on the outward life from within." The modern missionary seeks to give a complete message to the whole man and aims at the transformation of both the individual and society, whereas in the past the message dealt exclusively with the transformation of the inner life and the future state.

The missionary must, therefore, be qualified not only to preach, but to dig wells, build houses, raise crops, treat the sick and teach in school or college. He must be ready to meet the great national and social problems of the countries whither he goes. "The true end is neither the individual alone nor society alone, but full development and realization of the individual in society."

ATTITUDE TOWARD THE ORIENTAL.

The point of view of a Westerner living in the Orient is very quickly discovered by the native. On the one hand he may look upon all the colored races of the world as inferior to himself. He condescends to lift them as nearly as possible to his plane of culture and spirituality. On the other hand, he may view all men as potentially his equal. He has had peculiar advantages and so he seeks to share with others the good things that God has given him. At the same time he realizes that there may be much for him to learn from the peoples of the Orient and their ancient philosophy. The white man is not the only one who is proud of his race and its achievements. The modern missionary assumes this latter viewpoint and in consequence he seeks above all a bond of sympathy and a sense of fellowship with those people whom he desires to uplift.

The contrast between the two points of view is well brought out in a recent article by Thos. E. Jones, of Tokyo, Japan: "Some missionaries," he says, "seem simply to endure the Japanese. This is as apparent as to be one of the commonest topics of conversation when a group of foreign missionaries get together. The Japanese wish the missionaries for friends, they wish to be one and feel as one body in the community, but alas, in many cases the missionary makes this impossible by regarding his neighbors as spiritually lost or socially inferior. To give one's life for a people is a tremendous thing. It means entering into their lives, customs and traditions. It means burning one's bridges and becoming entirely for this adopted people. It means trying to appreciate their history and their pride in an ancestral line unbroken since the dawn of history. It means loving their country and becoming a citizen of it in spirit. Such a man does not try to thrust his ideas or program upon the Japanese. He lives his message into them through friendship, love and good example. Without definite program, or the necessity of annually reporting to a foreign board the added number of converts, he simply spends his days in the community as a Christian citizen and an ambassador of friendship."

The importance of this high regard for the native must never be lost sight of, if the best results are to be achieved. This is well expressed by Professor Nitobe of the Imperial University at Tokyo in the following words: "American influence in Asia cannot be otherwise than wholesome as long as it is exercised in infusing in the vast mass of humanity there the consciousness of their own dignity and mission."

THE CONTRAST BETWEEN EAST AND WEST.

To get an intimate understanding it is essential to first grasp some of the fundamental differences between the East and West. The Westerner is distinctly an individualist. In the East the individual is completely subordinate to the Society of which he is a part. Contemplation and self-denial are honored above action and self-assertiveness. The individual subject his "me" to the whole.

LESSONS TO BE LEARNED FROM THE EAST.

Having fully grasped this fundamental difference between the East and West, it is well for the missionary to seek what the philosophy of the East may have to contribute. This will give him a broader point of view. As Charles Cuthbert Hall says: "Respect for Oriental national aims and religious aspirations has had small place in Western thinking. The momentous condition of the world at this time indicates an approaching change. None may safely prophesy the nature of that change, but, if we believe in the present activity of the Spirit of God, we may look for great readjustments in Western thinking, for the chastening of inadmissible ambitions, for the growing influence of Christ in the East."

There is an intense spirituality among many Oriental Christians. "The East will bid us enter into thine inner chamber, when western teachers are bidding us enter the market, the slums, the factory, the voting-booth."

The profound respect for parents is, likewise, a lesson we may learn from the Chinese.

A few months ago a Christian Conference was held in Shanghai. Chinese and foreigners met together to consider the future of the Chinese Church. Four things stand out clearly in the report: first, the dominant influence of Chinese Christians; second, the determination that the control shall henceforth be in the hands of Chinese, while foreigners are still essential for the proper development of Christian institutions; third, the call for a united Church in China, and the sweeping aside of all denominational barriers; fourth, a liberal interpretation of the Christian message.

We see now in China the beginning of a movement which may sweep through all Christendom for the uniting again of the Church of Christ.

Thus, while the missionary must be full of the message he has to give, he must be first of all self-effacing. His purpose is to serve, to prepare another to take his place. His greatest joy will be to see others growing into positions of responsibility and trust that he himself once occupied.

A CHILDREN'S MEETING.

There is an ivy-covered brownstone Meeting House at Mt. Laurel, New Jersey, where a few Friends gather on First-days, but on Ninth Month 16, 1922, it was rejuvenated by sixty young folk belonging to Haddonfield and Salem Quarter.

A warm afternoon invited them to play under the locust trees and one huge oak was encircled by their arms; eight little girls were needed to compass it.

The mothers who accompanied each auto full had planned for a half-hour talk by H. P. Morris in the ancient Meeting House, and as the soft breeze played through the open windows and the warm sunlight mellowed the brown woodwork of the interior we could picture the long ago when rural neighbors occupied the benches, and saddle-horses, carriages or sleighs filled the ample sheds at Quarterly Meeting time.

The children were attentive, but ice cream on the lawn was next on the program.

"Why should we not climb the mount close to us?" said our leader, and away we all scrambled to its summit, gaining a wide horizon. It is a State Forest Reserve, green with oak and pine.

The shadows creeping up the slopes reminded us of the journey homeward, and so the merry groups dispersed to Moorestown, Westfield, Marlton, Medford and Haddonfield, while Mount Laurel Meeting House was left—a delightful mingling of the past and the present, our cameras recording what we saw.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

A PIONEER PLAYHOUSE.—Uncle Morris wanted to give Polly a playhouse for her birthday, so he asked her what kind of house it should be. "I'd like a pretty green-house about as large as papa's garage," she said, "with real windows and doors, a window-seat and a little front porch where I can train vines."

"What are you going to put in the house?" asked Uncle Morris.

"None of these old things," said Polly, turning up her pretty little nose at the chairs that were scratched and the table that had to have a cover to hide its marred top. "I'm going to have all new and pretty things. I think grandfather will give me that cunning little lounge at the store and some of those wee pillows to go with it, and I'm sure mama will give me a whole cupboard of new dishes."

"What do you think it will cost?" asked grandmother, who was knitting a long gray sock near by.

"Oh, maybe ten dollars," said Polly.

"Did I ever tell you about my playhouse in the woods?" asked grandmother. Polly had never heard the story, for grandmother was making her visit in Polly's home from far-away Ohio, and her stories were new.

"Well, it was near our log schoolhouse in the woods," said grandmother; "and the little girls of the school made it themselves. We took old rails and made a little enclosure with logs for furniture. Our dishes were bits of glass and broken dishes which our mothers saved for us, and our table was a piece of smooth timber which the big boys rolled into the playhouse for us. Then we had acorn cups and little baskets braided of willow and rushes to hold our berries and other things for our picnic dinners."

"And not a doll?" asked little Polly as grandmother sat looking out of the window as if she still saw the little old playhouse.

"Why, to be sure, dear, we had dollies. We rolled up an apron or a cape, and that made a first-rate doll. I never had a doll from the store in my life; but rag ones were just as good. I don't believe the little girls nowadays have a bit more fun than we did in our little pioneer playhouse in the woods. Sometimes the wind would blow our things away, or the rain would spoil them, or the cattle in the woods would tramp about and spoil our table, but we soon had a housecleaning, and made things right again. We never had to carry a lot of things into the house when we were through playing, but ran away as free as air and had the best times ever heard of."

Just then Uncle Morris came into the room with a pencil and paper in his hand. "I've been doing a little figuring on that playhouse, Puss," he said, "and it will come to about two hundred dollars with that new furniture you want."

"Two hundred dollars!" cried Dolly. "Why, Uncle Morris, that would save several French babies, wouldn't it?"

"I should say so; but then you want the playhouse so badly that—"

"I don't want it at all," cried Polly. "I want to give the money to the starving babies. I am going to get grandmother to show me how to make a pioneer playhouse back by the brook, and I won't have a single thing in it that I will have to carry to the house at night. Won't it be fun not to have to be careful with my things? I'm going to have a pioneer playhouse this very day, for grandmother is putting her knitting away, and I know she'll show me."

That is why a check for two hundred dollars went to the poor little French children, and why Polly had the nicest summer of her whole life with the pioneer playhouse by the brook, and a very pleased old lady to help teach all the children of the neighborhood how to have good times with play-things that cost nothing.—HILDA RICHMOND.

THE PROGRAM OF A BUSINESS MEN'S GROUP.

After two years of research and discussion, the Business Men's Group of the Society for Ethical Culture makes public a program of guiding principles for business which will look toward better industrial relations. The men of the group, nearly all engaged in large industries or owners of their own businesses, were searching primarily for light for themselves. To this end they engaged Frank Tannenbaum—the writer and student of industrial conditions and prison methods—as secretary of the organization and, after a series of meetings and discussions of industrial problems, began to experiment in working out new principles in their own industries.

In presenting their program to the meeting at which it was officially adopted, M. Kirchberger, chairman of the group, explained that the object was primarily to get at the motives of those engaged in business and commerce:

"By the mere force of logic we unanimously agreed that the profit-making motive had to be dethroned. . . . The very conception of profit must undergo a change as we go along and realize that the establishment of proper human relations, the distribution of responsibilities and participations in the proceeds of industry and commerce is conducive of greater efficiency, greater stability and greater service. When the well-being of a community and not that of an individual is the goal of our labors, when we have become accustomed to think and act as groups and not as individuals, then the profit motive as understood to-day will have relegated itself to the proper place and made room for a conception of this term infinitely higher and nobler."

PRINCIPLES.

1. That there is a spiritual worth in every human being which industry must recognize.

2. That human exploitation is immoral and socially destructive.

3. The highest service which any calling can render is the development of personality in all those who are affected by it.

4. That service to the community and not profit seeking should be the main purpose of business and industry.

5. That there is a creative impulse in the mass of men sufficient to carry on industry without sole reliance upon the pecuniary motive; business and industry can fall through the same constructive interests that play such an important part in the practices of the sciences and the arts.

PROGRAM FOR APPLICATION TO INDUSTRY.

1. The Organization of Industry.

The problems of industry are largely industrial rather than political, and should, therefore, as far as possible, be solved by the industries themselves. The Federal, State and local governments should, however, establish laws that may fairly apply to industry in general. The tendency to shift to the state the problem of industry is one which we consider contrary to the best interests of the community. We believe it essential that all of the individual plants, employers and unions in any industry ought to be organized into a definitely recognized unit for the purpose of dealing with the problems which belong to the industry as a whole rather than to any particular plant as such. That is, we believe in a constitution for each industry embodying its needs and problems, its duties and powers. In each industry, the employers and workers ought to assume responsibility for

- (a) Unemployment;
- (b) Education for adult workers;
- (c) Vocational training;
- (d) Industrial research and experimentation;
- (e) Industrial hygiene and safety;
- (f) Sickness insurance and old age pensions;
- (g) Planning to secure more regular and stable production;
- (h) Increasing efficiency of production;
- (i) Improving the quality of the product;
- (j) Observance of industrial laws;
- (k) Wages;
- (l) Hours of labor;
- (m) Distribution and marketing.

2. Labor Unions.

We believe that labor unions should be recognized and dealt with as integral units in industrial relations because they have rendered an important and socially desirable service in protecting the individual worker's economic interests and have raised the ideals and civic standards both of their own members and of the community as a whole. We also believe in the increasing participation of labor unions in the responsibility of carrying on industry, as a means of facing the industrial problems of the immediate future, of achieving efficiency in production, and of contributing to the development of character and personality in all those engaged in industry.

3. Industrial Representation.

We believe that the distribution of responsibility among all engaged in industry is the most effective means of giving recognition to human worth and therefore welcome the movement toward industrial representation in industry as a constructive and desirable development. Such representation, including all factors, is to be looked upon as a valuable instrument for the handling of numerous industrial problems. It is capable of assuming responsibility for factory problems and of contributing suggestions of value to shop efficiency and shop discipline. It is a valuable means of education and of training for useful co-operation. It is not to be considered a substitute for, or antagonistic to, labor unions.—Reprinted from The Survey.

REPORT OF THE TRUSTEES OF THE T. WISTAR
BROWN TEACHERS' FUND.

FIFTH MONTH 12, 1921—FIFTH MONTH 11, 1922.

The following is a summary of the grants made and used during the fiscal year Fifth Month 12, 1921, to Fifth Month 11, 1922:

For Study at Summer Schools.....	53
For Visits to Schools.....	13
For Attendance at Educational Meetings.....	3
For Courses During the Regular Academic Year at College and Normal Schools
Full time.....	9
Part time.....	3
For special work.....	1

It is interesting to note that 56 of the grantees are members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, especially as Wistar Brown specified such membership as one of the first conditions of making a grant.

Practically all of the users of the Fund are actively engaged in teaching, which doubtless accounts for the preponderance of summer school work. Only five grants were made to persons planning to enter the profession and who had not yet taught. It is probable that this is a much smaller proportion of the total than the donor anticipated, since he specified that preference was to be given to those "who are twenty-one years of age and older and who have had the usual school education and are choosing the profession of teaching and desire to take a one year course in a university or other preparation for their profession."

It seems probable, however, from the reports received that the Fund is quite as useful in giving further opportunity for professional training to those who are already established as teachers as it would be if more largely used in training those preparing to enter the profession.

In accordance with the policy mentioned in our last report, grants for attendance at educational meetings were very much reduced. Thirty-eight such grants were made during the previous fiscal year.

Grants were made to 61 women and 21 men. Of these 32 were between the ages of 20 and 30, 32 between 30 and 40, and 18 over 40.

Fifty per cent. of the summer school work was done at Columbia University. Grants were also made for work in the following institutions in Europe:

American School of Classical Studies at Rome; University of Poitiers, France; School for Foreigners at Tours, France; Summer Art School in France and Spain under the leadership of George Elmer Browne.

The total amount of money granted was $15,302.05, which is practically the full amount that was available for this fiscal year (it was more than the year's income because it included an unexpended balance from the previous year.) There were other applications which could not be granted on account of lack of funds. This, together with the rate at which applications are coming in for the current fiscal year, seems to indicate that there is a growing appreciation of the usefulness of the Fund which will make it necessary in the future to discriminate more carefully in the amount of grants and the purposes for which they are to be used.

MORE than once does William Penn give counsel to Friends to be true to what they know already, be their gifts or their light ever so small, since those who are unfaithful to what they know cannot blame God that they know no more.—A. NEAVE BRAYSHAW.

THE INEVITABLE.

I like the man who faces what he must
With steps triumphant and a heart of cheer;
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hope fail, yet keeps unflinching trust
That God is God—that somehow, true and just
His plans work out for mortals; not a tear
Is shed when fortune, which the world holds dear,
Falls from his grasp; better, with love, a crust,
Than living in dishonor; envies not
Nor loses faith in man; but does his best,
Nor ever murmurs at his humble lot;
But with a smile and words of hope gives zest
To every toiler. He alone is great
Who by a life heroic conquers fate.

EXTRACTS FROM BABSON'S REPORT.

Read at a Conference on "The Spread of the Gospel," Ninth Month 1, 1922.

Let us not think, however, that prohibition is in a class by itself. A great many other good causes are in an almost similar position. "Sunday Observance," "Purity of the Home," "Child Labor" and a host of other good things are in the same paradoxical situation. Hardly a day goes by that an urgent appeal does not come to me to "join" some society, league or association with the purpose of putting across some reform. All of them are good, and they are being directed by good people.

All organizations are up against the same problem, viz: they are trying to change the activities of men and women without changing their hearts; or speaking statistically—their desires. This is why they have an uphill fight and always will until the desires of people change. What the nation needs is to permanently ingraft into the hearts of men and women, right desires. Then all of these problems will solve themselves. Then with a proper system of education all the "Anti" and "Pro" leagues, associations and societies could disband.

What does permanently change the desires of men and women? Only one thing—namely, RELIGION. This has always been true throughout the ages and is true today. Men and women may be converted in different ways—some through the influence of a noisy revival and others through the influence of a quiet mother; some through study or research and others just naturally by living in a religious environment. However the conversion comes about, the statistical fact remains that at such a time the desires of the person change and henceforth he wants to be on the right side of every question. Such people make mistakes and fall by the wayside, but they are all the time struggling for the right. After a man is converted he automatically hungers and strives for the virtues instead of the vices, although he may constantly be tempted and often fall.

What is religion? It cannot be explained any more than can electricity. But like electricity we know it is all powerful and men have discovered ways of getting it in limited quantities. Christian religion is the acceptance of God as one's Master and source of strength as revealed through Jesus. This strength is secured through prayer. Religion expresses itself through those fundamentals of prosperity—a desire to be honest, just, kindly, pure, thrifty, industrious and to render true service. A religious man will worship God and knowingly harm no one; he will do unto others as he would have others treat him. When people become actuated with these desires, it is very evident that all the social, industrial and international problems will quickly solve themselves.

Preachers are troubled because they cannot arouse more interest in religion amongst the business men of their cities. Is not the reason because these preachers are talking about social service, prohibition, international peace and the like instead of winning souls? As a statistician it seems to me that the preacher's job is to "win souls," as they call it—to put religion into the hearts of men and women. Preachers who have in mind this one motive and who operate evangelistic churches have no complaint about the business men of their cities. Every sermon should be directed to change men's hearts. Should not preachers be judged by their ability to win men to God? Moreover, this applies not alone to the preacher. Every churchman should make this his first duty. In fact the only way for a man who has been converted to stay converted is through helping others to get right with God. I often meet men and women burdened with the cares of life who regret that they have not the old zeal which they once had. They tell me that they "have religion" but get no real benefit from it. When telling this to my associate, —Peavey, he always asks, "Are they working at it? Actions speak louder than words."

This leads me to one closing word to any good preachers who may read this letter: Don't give too much emphasis to what you call the "Fundamentals." I personally accept these theological beliefs which you think are so important—but I know nothing about them—nor do you. When a man will accept Jesus as his personal saviour and go to God in prayer—take him in.

One thing more—before we make real headway in changing the hearts of men, we must co-operate more with one another. We must subject our denominational glory for the good of all. We must put Christianity first, Churcharity second. We must co-operate with other Churches and sects for the salvation of our cities and nations.

FOOD FOR WORK.

The "New Economic Policy" of the Russian Mission.

The new economic policy of the Friends' Mission in Russia is nothing more than the hoary one: "He who does not work neither shall he eat." It is not quite as rigid and literal as that. But in general it corresponds roughly to that principle.

The opinion of the Mission is—and in this it enjoys the cordial concurrence of the Soviet Government—that those adults who receive the American food from now on should be required to render some service in return. It is understood that this should be labor for the community, for the "common good" or whatever you prefer to term that form of productive activity that is carried on not for personal and private gain but for the social unit.

It is at the moment impossible to say, even approximately, how many people will be included in this program. There will be a number in each of the 179 villages in the American Quaker-fed district that will be in need of food this fall and winter. When the poor gleanings from their harvest fields are consumed these people will be faced with starvation, just as they were last winter. At this point they will be offered a job, a chance to do some useful work for the community. In return for this work they will receive a ration of Quaker food.

The Quakers have already begun to work out the new policy. I have seen some of the first experiments.

In Gamaleyevka, outpost village of the southeastern district, three blacksmith shops have been working night and day during the past month. In each work two smiths. A charcoal man brings the fuel for all of them. The smithy has been confined chiefly to the repair of farm machinery needed for the harvest. Hundreds of peasants have brought their mowers and reapers and plows. They have been repaired gratis. For on the walls of the smithies hang notices informing the peasant that the blacksmiths are drawing a Quaker pyok, that they are working for the community. And the blacksmith says: "Without the Quakers we should have starved. The peasants had no grain with which to pay us for the work. Anyway we would sooner work the Quaker way."

Thirty versts north of Gamaleyevka the village of Bogolubovka is operating an obchestra (community) mill. If the peasant in this volost has any rye this year he will bring it to this mill and the grinding will be done for much less than he would have to pay a private miller. This mill was repaired, the dam constructed, the races patched by peasants who lived on flour given by the Mission.

In dozens of small villages throughout the East Buzuluk District quick peasant women are operating Singer sewing machines. Their raw material comes out of the clothing bales from Philadelphia. These sewing women are engaged in a frantic race to have this bit of Russia clothed by next winter.

Then there are the cobblers. They can use the leather from many American shoes to make something large and adequate and shoe-like for a Russian foot. They use little wooden pegs and some heavy thread furnished by the Friends. They do excellent work. They will tell you the American ration saved their lives.

In another village they are cleaning wells. They are bound they will not have so much cholera and dysentery and typhoid this year. They are going to have these wells clean and pure and covered. One man works at the bottom. He is mud from tip to toe. Two pull up the buckets of sandy mud on a roller. Another empties them. Another one prepares some timbers to patch the frame work. All are working for the community. So are the men farther down the street who are digging new wells to replace the ones that are old and condemned. The well diggers and well cleaners live on a Quaker pyok.

At the old Kumiss Establishment the hammers are falling, the reluctant nails are shrieking as they leave the old boards, the brushes are splashing on the whitewash. Five trained carpenters from each of the volosts in District V are finishing off the Children's Summer Colony Buildings. One old worker is an able cabinet-maker. He says nothing but he carves and scrapes away at shelves and window-sills and tables and closets leaving a record of beauty and good workmanship behind him. He and the others are creators. It is a pleasure for the Quaker Mission to give them food. They deserve ten times more than they receive.

Novo Sergeyeyskaya Volost is plowing two hundred and fifty acres of black land for the poor fund (the community fund) so that the volost can take care of its most needy people next summer. The plowers are eating Quaker food. Next year when the products from this land are distributed the Quakers and the volost authorities will have joint administrative powers.

MILK FOR WEST VIRGINIA BABIES.

Milk-fed babies will no longer be a novelty in the mining regions of West Virginia where the American Friends' Service Committee has been working. After the feeding centres for the older children were established it was decided that the best way of overcoming malnutrition among the babies was by furnishing fresh milk to them and their mothers. Luella Jones' account of the fresh milk program shows how valuable it has been, both in improving the condition of the babies and in educating their parents.

"The people of these districts have not been educated to the value of fresh milk. During good times most families have their own cow which roams up and down the roadside of the narrow valley. But since the strike few of them have been able to keep a cow. The milk at best is tainted from the bitter weeds upon which the cows feed; it is further contaminated by poor facilities for keeping it fresh, since very few families have basements or can afford ice. For this reason it is little wonder that, as we are told, 'the children don't like milk.'

"Our Committee supplied good milk from a Charleston dairy. The mothers were urged to use this early in the morning while it was still in good condition. Simultaneously with the milk feeding was begun a plan of house to house visiting to weigh the babies. From listless indifference or friendly tolerance the mothers soon stirred to lively rivalry to see whose baby gained most. Too often there was a pitiful failure to gain, and the mother had to be urged to increased care. Sometimes she would say: 'I never did like milk, but I think of my baby and take it down like medicine. Now I like it, and I know it helps me and baby both.' With the third week of weighing came gratifying results. The whole family and often neighbors watched for our coming and gathered around to see if baby had gained.

"One of our families owns a pair of emaciated twins of five months old. They weighed only eight pounds, were too young and too delicate to be weaned. The mother had only coarse unsuitable food to eat. Steadily the register fell from week to week and it looked as if the twins would not be able to get through the hot weather. We induced the mother to drink the milk. This she did reluctantly at first. Then there was a happy day when it was discovered that Pauline, the littler twin, had gained two ounces! Mother and grandmother beamed at us happily, garrulously congratulating themselves and thanking us. Brothers and sisters fawned over the babies, arguing over the health of each. Then the father appeared, a big burly miner, claiming his share of the infant's attention. He reminded one of a big bear playing with a kitten, and one might have concluded that poor little scrawny Pauline was the most precious bit of humanity on Cabin Creek.

"We were much gratified when a local doctor and nurse told us that our plan of weighing the babies and of distributing milk had taught the mothers more about child care than years of practice had accomplished. Some of the mothers say they will not again try to do without milk for their children if there is any possible way to get it. The doctor tells us there have been fewer deaths and less sickness than usual among the babies of our district."

Even though the feeding centres closed when school began, the fresh milk distribution was continued. Now that the families see the good results from the use of milk it is hoped that it will continue to be the staple article of diet for babies in this region.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

ALFRED C. GARRETT and wife have been given a Minute of their Meeting (Germantown, Philadelphia) for service in Germany and Austria under the auspices of the American Friends' Service Committee. It is understood that Alfred Garrett's service will be in the line of a teaching ministry, and in the distribution of Quaker literature. They hope to mingle freely with those groups of people there who have an open mind toward Friends.

WALTER L. MOORE has been granted a Minute by Chester Monthly Meeting (Moorestown, N. J.) for religious service within the limits of Iowa Yearly Meeting, to be held at Paulina, Ia., beginning Tenth Month 11th.

MURRAY S. KENWORTHY, formerly chief of the Friends' Mission in Russia, is now connected with the work of the Service Committee at headquarters in Philadelphia. Anna B. Griscom, of Moorestown, N. J., is another addition to the Service Committee staff this fall.

WALTER H. ABELL, formerly editor of the Friends' Intelligencer, has spent several months traveling in Europe visiting the various fields of Friends' work. On his return to Philadelphia, about Tenth Month 10th, he will be in charge of the publicity work of the American Friends' Service Committee, having been appointed Publicity Secretary.

FRIENDS will be glad to hear that Arthur Watts, whose work as head of the Russian Relief Unit was suddenly cut short by typhus, is at last progressing towards convalescence. He is now in a Convalescent Home near Helsingfors, Finland, where he has the advantage of the attention of his mother, and Rebecca Thompson, who has nursed him through a long and trying illness. The home is delightfully situated amidst pine trees, and everything is conducive to a recovery, which has been too long delayed.

THROUGH the efforts of Margaret L. Thomas, of New York, the Women's Peace Society on "No More War Day" had the unusual privilege of sending out a message from the Newark, N. J., Radio Station. The following was included in the message:—

"Thousands in America believe in spiritual and not physical force, knowing that in the long run the spiritual ideals must triumph if civilization is to survive. America can bind all the people of the earth in indissoluble bonds of good-will and fellowship—millions in the world hope for the day when there shall be a true League of Nations, a United States of the World with a Parliament for all, and a World Court to solve any quarrel that may arise between peoples. Rejoicing in the 110 years of peace which have existed between the United States and Canada, with its unfortified and undefended boundary of three thousand miles, thousands of Americans believe that the same spirit of good-will and friendship will penetrate everywhere if there is similar disarmament along all frontiers. America calls upon all good and true men and women who believe in the Prince of Peace to aid them in their task."

THE following appeals more directly to English Friends, but it contains an essential truth that may be of profit to us as well:—

One evening recently at Ackworth, G. K. Hibbert told the story of the expulsion, by George Satterthwaite, of two boys from the School, at an hour's notice, charged with the dissemination of "detestable Catholic principles." These boys were half Pole and half English, their mother being of old Quaker stock. Their father taught in a college in Herefordshire; he died comparatively early and was buried in a Herefordshire churchyard. One of the boys, Henry Dziewicki, is a Professor of English at Cracow University. Recently coming into touch with Friends in their Polish relief work, he felt impelled to write a full explanation in a long letter to Gerald Hibbert. He closed the letter as follows: "If Frederick Andrews, who I hear retired from the superintendency of Ackworth School in 1920, happens to see this, he will probably remember me. He was one of the younger teachers in 186-. I remember a good many of the others and with most kindly feelings. What a pity that Christians should be estranged!" Just above Professor Dziewicki wrote: "Here am I, over seventy-one years old, giving from eight to nine lessons a day, private lessons, University and two Academies included. May God be thanked for all His goodness."

The Christian Century says: "The Quakers with the practicality which has so splendidly marked their efforts in all the famine areas of Europe have begun the use of modern methods of farming. Incidentally they may teach Russia some lessons which will be worth more than all the famine fund has cost.

... The American machines run day and night and young Russians who never held a steering wheel before are learning to clean spark plugs and mend ignition wires."

THESE facts should interest all who advocate the abolishment by law of Capital Punishment.

Capital punishment is to be abolished in Queensland, Australia. By a vote of 33 to 30, the Legislature there has passed a bill to deprive the hangmen of their jobs. Holland and Portugal also have abolished the death penalty; Roumania has never employed it; and it is rarely inflicted in Belgium, Denmark, Sweden and Switzerland.

1822 AND 1922.

It would seem that in the year 1822 the Quakers of Pennsylvania and New Jersey had the possibilities of a great future. Not only were they numerically strong, but they had been blessed with able spiritual leaders. Lives of benediction and power, like those of Wm. Savery, Nicholas Waln, John Woolman, Rebecca Jones, Richard Jordan, Samuel Emlen, Thomas Scattergood and Anthony Benezet, had yielded substantial fruit. The stirrings also of a fresh intellectual and social life were in the air. Browning, Darwin, Lincoln, Longfellow and Tennyson were then growing lads. The "States" had emerged from a revolutionary struggle, with the young government daily becoming more stable. The shadow of Napoleonic ambition no longer troubled the world.

Friends had (for the most part) come creditably through this difficult political period and, notwithstanding their resignation of an actual share in the local government, they found themselves with an increased, rather than a lessened, prestige. Already they had cleared their skirts from the bane of slavery. They had recently founded a new school (Weston of Westtown), built a great new Meeting House (Fourth and Arch Streets), launched a Tract Association, and had undertaken work for the Seneca Indians (Tunesassa), and for the Negroes and other poor people of their home city. Bonds of Christian love and understanding linked Philadelphia with London. There was an open door; the opportunity for a people to go forward.

Beneath a sky so fair and with such auspicious beginnings, it is sad that the current of Quakerism in Philadelphia should so soon plunge into the backwater of a whirlpool of separations. Perhaps the trouble was not primarily due to the preaching of rationalistic philosophy, nor to tactless repression. It is doubtful whether the wreckage was caused either by a too narrow conservatism in mere forms, or by ultra-evangelical enthusiasms. These appear symptoms, rather than procuring causes. The real malady we must confess to have been a partial deadness in the body itself, a coldness in too many hearts towards God.

A century has passed. Observers at home can tell whether in 1922 the situation of Philadelphia Friends and of American Quakerism, largely viewed, has (or has not) some of the same strengths and weaknesses. None of us may read the future, but we can face it confidently if our trust (and hope, too) is set in the revelation of God to the soul. Against this foundation nothing can prevail. My desire then follows the concern of our friend M. I. Reich, that in extending we may also be deepened; that as the cords are lengthened, the stakes may be strengthened; that with works we may also have faith; that in busy lives, we may not neglect the Life that is life indeed. Christ says, Seek The Kingdom.

THE MODERN MISSIONARY.

THE LIFE OF A MISSIONARY.

The daily life is not unlike that of men and women in the home lands. There are daily tasks to perform.

As a teacher he has the routine of the school room. As a physician he has the daily clinic and the rounds in the hospital, only the need is greater. As a sample of what may befall the doctor in his daily rounds, we quote the following from a medical missionary:

"A boy of eleven who fell over a cliff and broke his arm eleven months ago asks to make the bones grow together again. There was no treatment given at the time of the accident. They bound some vile-smelling concoction to the arm with bamboo splints and put another plaster of the same mixture on the back to 'draw the bone up.' The arm is of course useless. An amputation was suggested but was refused. The boy tried to prove that the arm was not dead by opening and shutting the hand.

"An old woman, bed-ridden for many years, lies in the rain on a stretcher made of sackcloth and bamboo poles, with her half-blind husband, who almost fell into the water when he tried to walk up the plank. He pleads to give his wife some medicine to make her feet walk, her tongue talk and her fingers able to hold her chop-sticks.

"A leper, blind, footless and without hands, is sitting on the bank begging for relief from the terrible disease that is slowly killing him. He promises to spend the rest of his life in making prostrations before me if I will condescend to heal him.

"A girl with tubercular trouble in her bound foot tells me that she is to be married soon and that her future husband says he will beat her if she comes to him in poor health.

"A poor woman held out her emaciated baby on the bank and asked me to make it see. Some native medical practitioner had run needles into its eye to drive a demon out of its stomach. The mother offered to bow before every shrine within a radius of three miles if I would only give the baby power to look into her face."

In the missionary hospital the medical man gives hope and healing to many of these otherwise incurable patients.

In social intercourse, in the home life, in the daily routine of every day, the missionary endeavors to exemplify the Christian life. As Rauschenbusch declares: "Whoever uncouples the social and the religious life has not understood Jesus."

Thus an Embassy of the Kingdom of God is built up and it is the life of the missionary which is best qualified to show forth the nature of that Kingdom. In contrast with a diplomatic embassy, the object is to promote the material and spiritual welfare of those in whose midst it exists.

Students have often told me that the lives of the foreigners as they see them day by day give the final stamp on the true significance of the Christian religion.

This life is by no means all sacrifice, for having once set his heart upon this task, the missionary finds much to encourage and entuse.

Mission stations are arranged on a community basis. Each missionary is paid according to his need. All extra earnings go into the common fund. Thus one may never look forward to increased wealth and perhaps here is a sacrifice according to the world's view of life. But the desire for monetary gain is more than satisfied by the absorption of the task.

Besides the daily routine there are great opportunities for study and research. Many of the great explorers of the world have been missionaries. In medicine and the other sciences, valuable investigations may be carried on. For the economist and sociologist there are countless problems waiting to be solved, and so the missionary may add his contribution to the world's stock of knowledge.

In the field of education, a broad and liberal program must be followed. The wide-reaching scope of such work in a missionary college is shown by Prof. John Dewey, after spending two years in China. He says: "Build up a China of men and women of trained independent thought and character and there will be no Far-Eastern problems—no need of conferences to discuss and disguise the problems of the Pacific."

A missionary is no extraordinary man, whether he be evangelist, teacher, doctor, nurse or social worker. All have their counterpart in the home land. The work is one whether it be at home or abroad.

Whatever be the task, let it be done well, for only the best is worthy of the Christian and a man's religion is judged by his daily life and the way he performs his job.

THE MISSIONARY'S INFLUENCE.

With methods and ideals such as these, the missionary does more to bring about world peace than any other single agency. Can we make an impress on the East? Has the Christian faith a dynamic which marching armies and commerce have found impossible? These latter have only changed the outward form. It remains for Christianity to mould the heart.

Christianity has a force which is fully appreciated by the leaders of the Orient. Sun Yat Sen declared: "The Republic of China cannot endure unless that righteousness for which the Christian religion stands is at the centre of the national life."

There must be a true foundation laid in these lands which are so rapidly opening to the institutions of the West, or chaos will surely come.

James Bryce fully realized this when he said: "This is, perhaps, the most critical moment ever seen in the history of non-Christian nations and races . . . In half a century or less that which we call European civilization will have over-shadowed the earth. All is trembling and crumbling under the shock and impact of the stronger, harder civilization."

Or, as President Faunce says: "Are we of the West content merely to unsettle and undermine the institutions of the East? . . . Or, are we to give to the Eastern world a deeper reverence, a more satisfying faith, a nobler moral code, a truly Christian life? . . . The alternative Chaos or Christianity may be a dilemma for the East, but is surely a challenge to the West."

Sectarianism, nationalism and a narrow dogmatism concerning the teachings of Christ will cause failure. The Church of Christ for China, for Japan, for India is what we must strive for. The Oriental must be trusted to lead his people in the interpretation and practice of the Christian message. As Christ gave to his disciples all authority and power so must we do to our Christian converts.

The following quotations will indicate the profound influence which Christianity is having on the minds of the youth of China: A young girl who had been turned away from home by her family, writes referring to her own experience: "Then she decided to accept Jesus Christ as her Saviour. She thought now it was the time for her to decide and could not wait any longer. So she did decide in school and begged her parents and brothers to let her join a church. But her parents and brothers answered her dreadfully. They said if she wanted to be a Christian they would not accept her as their daughter or sister, and one of her brothers said if she was baptized he should kill her, and the other said that he would drive her from home and would not take care of her any more. She was sad, of course, for she worried about her family. She then prayed very hard and asked God to live in the hearts of her parents and brothers. After receiving her brother's words, she wrote to them saying that she was still their sister, although they did not love her, yet she loved them just the same as before, or even more. Her parents were now softened and asked her to go home."

A sick boy writes from his home: "Surely I am glad to learn that thirty of the boys have come to the right side and have taken the stand for Christ's sake. This recalls my decision of 1919. Since that time I came to know Christ more truly and to appreciate the very Christian life, and I realize it myself that I have built my foundation of religion upon my will, feeling, belief and intuition, exclusive of superstition and blindly following, as Tagore has once said that he knows God as one who knows light."

"Indeed, my long sickness has caused me to have a new spiritual experience, or, I should say, a more real one. This adds to the energy of belief and strengthens it, too. I remember Jesus once said in Matthew 17-20 that Faith removed every difficulty. So is my faith, so God wins the victory of my life. How much should I thank Him!"

And another boy writes of his idea of Christianity as follows: "Some religions teach men to care for nobody except themselves, and the others treat men unequally, but the religion of Jesus is the only religion which teaches men to love every one, even enemies, just as a father loves every one of his sons, even bad ones."

It is the social gospel that appeals to the young men of China, and they are turning the searchlight of criticism upon the Christian faith. Is it worth while? Has it accomplished aught in the West? Can it do for the people of China what Buddhism and Confucianism have not done? Can Christianity transform lives, uplift the down-trodden, improve the economic systems—in short, add a newer and fuller life to the Nation? These are the questions the modern missionary must try to answer in the affirmative.

With this point of view the missionary, as he assumes his tasks in a strange land, may be looked upon as the "pioneer" of the present day. There may be no new lands to be discovered, but the problems of an awakened civilization, new friendships and bonds are awaiting him among peoples of many colors and tribes:

"Have the elder races halted,
Do they droop and end their lesson,
weared over there beyond the seas?
We take up the task Eternal, and the burden and the lesson,
Pioneers! Oh, Pioneers!"

Till with sound of trumpet,
Far, far off the daybreak call—Hark! how loud and clear I hear it wind.
Swift to the head of the army!
Swift! spring to your places,
Pioneers! Oh, Pioneers!"

Moreover, he will no longer be looked upon as a different sort of being, but rather as one of the world's workers. On the other hand, the element of sacrifice and the unique nature of his work will have its reflex influence on himself and on the Church at home. As Elihu Grant recently said: "Mission work touches lightly those for whom it is done, but is the salvation of those who do it."

By service for others we can best appreciate God. The people of the Orient need the Christian message, but the Church at home needs the inspiration that comes from service, and this comes to the supporter at home as well as to the missionary on the field.

Not alone in the Orient, but also in Europe, in our own land, and throughout the world men are seeking for more light, for fuller knowledge. Christ's message is the one sure hope to the world. We need not fear searching inquiry into the "deep things of God," only let us be ready to heed the challenge to prove by our lives as well as by our teaching that at the heart of Christianity will be found the remedy for all the world's ills.

John Oxenham has beautifully voiced the call in his poem, "Bring us the Light":—

"I hear a clear voice calling, calling,
Calling out of the night;
O, you who live in the Light of Life,
Bring us the Light!

We are bound in the chains of darkness,
Our eyes received no sight;
O, you who have never been bound or blind,
Bring us the Light!

We live amid turmoil and horror,
Where night is the only right;
O, you to whom life is liberty,
Bring us the Light!

We stand in the ashes of ruins,
We are ready to fight the fight;
O, you whose feet are firm on the Rock,
Bring us the Light!

You cannot—you shall not forget us;
Out here in the darkest night.
We are drowning men—we are dying men,
Bring, oh, bring us the Light!"

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

THE PEACE APPEAL TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, adopted by the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings and endorsed by London Yearly Meeting, with a covering letter, was distributed through the office of the Church Peace Union in New York, to a selected list of 20,000 clergymen of various Christian denominations. An account of the letter, with extracts from it, was sent to three hundred and fifty daily papers and to thirty of the leading religious journals of the country. All of the material had been sent out by Sixth Month 30th.

As was to be expected with a printed circular letter, issued in the summer time, only a few replies, seventy-six, were received. Of these sixty-six were apparently in entire sympathy with our position on war, the remaining ten disagreeing with it in various ways. A study of the points in which serious clergymen differ from us in the matter of war is of great interest and value to us.

The letters from the clergymen who replied came from fifteen states of the Union, scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico, and the writers belong to twelve different religious bodies. More than 2500 copies of the letter have been sent from the office to clergymen and others by request.

English Friends are deeply interested in this appeal to the Churches and they are uniting with us in such a way as to make it a joint concern of English and Philadelphia Friends. An edition of one hundred thousand copies of the letter is to be circulated by English Friends, and the question of distribution on the continent and elsewhere is to be worked out jointly.

The Five Years' Meeting and several American Yearly Meetings have approved the letter, and it is to be presented at the conference of some of the other religious bodies of this country.

THE HOUSE OF BISHOPS OF THE PROTESTANT CHURCH, at its Triennial Convention at Portland, Oregon, Ninth Month 10, 1922, unanimously adopted resolutions condemning Turkish brutalities in the Near East and pledged the support of the Episcopal Church to the government of the United States "in any effort, diplomatic, naval or military, that may be made toward the establishment of justice, mercy and peace in the Near East."

THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT has decided to encourage migration to Hokkaido and other outlying portions of the empire and also to South America in order to make provision for its crowded population and for its large number of people out of work.

AN IMPORTANT BRITISH LABOR BODY, the Municipal Employes' Association, declared officially, about the middle of last month when matters were growing tense in the Near East, that "not a single man or gun" would leave England for any new war, so far as it was in their power to prevent it.

JAPAN HAS APPOINTED A MINISTER TO MEXICO, who will be the first representative it has had in that country since General Obregon became president. The United States has as yet not recognized the Obregon Government.

A RECENT ISSUE OF "THE AMERICAN LEGION WEEKLY" contains an article with the following encouraging title, "F. I. D. A. C.—What's That? It Stands for the United Allied Veteran Voice—the Great Idea of War That War Shall Be No More." It cannot be said that the general attitude of the American Legion is that "war shall be no more" but it is evident that there is a movement against war among ex-soldiers, especially in some foreign countries, and the subject will doubtless receive consideration at the meeting of the Fédération Interalliée des Anciens Combattants to be held at New Orleans this month, to be followed immediately by the annual meeting of the American Legion.

THE WAR APPROPRIATIONS OF THE FIVE GREAT POWERS, according to the 1922 figures of French experts, contrasted with the appropriations for 1923, are proportionately as follows: France, 313 per cent.; Great Britain, 274 per cent.; Italy, 372 per cent.; Japan, 332 per cent.; United States, 289 per cent.; (navy alone 340 per cent.)

"If the churches of Europe and America allow that to fructify," said Lloyd George in speaking a few weeks ago about the danger of another war, 'they had better close their doors.' Better close their doors, for we cannot hope that the Christian gospel of brotherhood will come to men with any compelling power unless we can find some way to make that gospel a reality in the relation of nations to each other and can prevent that utter denial of brotherhood which we now see war to be."

This opening paragraph of a timely new book, "The Christian Crusade for a Warless World" which is to come from press within about a week, indicates both in spirit and the urgency of the need which it is designed to meet. Churches that want to become more effective centers of education for the abolition of war need no longer say that there is no convenient material for their study groups.

The volume is from the pen of Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, with a foreword by the Commission on International Justice and Goodwill. It has been prepared especially for Bible and mission classes, or other groups of young people or adults, and aims to set forth both the meaning of Christianity for modern international questions—such as patriotism, racial contacts, disarmament, war and peace—and also the present conditions which the Church has to face in dealing with these issues.

If the churches of America are serious and alert in their desire to outlaw war there will be thousands of classes all over the land devoting several weeks this fall and winter to the study of this book. For group use we know of nothing which can take its place. It is one of the few books of which it can be said that it was born to meet a conscious need just when that need was most keenly felt.

TRUST.

I will not faint, but trust in God
Who this my lot hath given;
He leads me by the thorny road
Which is the road to Heaven,
Though sad my day that lasts so long
At evening I shall have a song;
Though dim my day until the night,
At evening time there shall be light.

My life is but a working day
Whose tasks are set aright;
A while to work, a while to pray,
And then a quiet night,
And then, please God, a quiet night
Where saints and angels walk in white;
Dreamless from work and sorrow
But re-awakening on the morrow.

—CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

NOTES ON THE FIVE YEARS' MEETING.

The American Friend for Ninth Month 21st was given over to the Five Years' Meeting. We have made a few extracts to supplement the interesting report of Frances Tatum Rhoads given in our issue two weeks ago, which of necessity was abbreviated.

At the opening session the Presiding Clerk called attention to the valuable service rendered to the Five Years' Meeting by two beloved and honored members, James Wood of New York and Timothy Nicholson of Indiana. Only twelve are still living of the eighty-one delegates from nine Yearly Meetings to the first general conference in 1887; and of these, only James Wood and Timothy Nicholson are members of the Five Years' Meeting of 1922. They are also the only persons who have been members of all the conferences and of all the sessions of the Five Years' Meeting.

A request from Western Yearly Meeting that a committee be appointed to prepare a suitable program for the celebration of the birth of George Fox in 1924 was favorably received and after approval by the Business Committee was adopted, and referred to the new Executive Committee to work out the details.

T. Edmund Harvey, in his address, "The World Outlook and the Open Door for Friends," said in part:—"But the outlook shows that civilization has gone wrong. In Europe, it has broken down and failed. Europe is bankrupt financially and morally, which you here can hardly realize. It is the tragedy of thousands of homes and the constant anxiety of the ablest thinkers. While the evil is here, the danger is not so apparent because the results have not yet come. The worship of money and material power has placed us in the position of putting the means before the end so that we have forgotten the end. The evil is growing and we have failed to find a remedy for the misery. And it is small consolation to think that the means for past achievements will not work. If civilization were only machinery the situation would seem quite hopeless, but rather is it a living organism and can be born again. The work of the church of God is to bring about a new birth, in the possibility of which we must have faith, though now we may not be able to see the exact time of its coming. As we look out upon a world ravaged by war, what do we see? In England there has been a steady falling off in the Church of England. The men who went to France do not go back to church. People are drifting away; the rift between ecclesiastical organization and the people is almost complete; the church despairs of bridging the gulf, and all the while there is economic misery and terrible distrust in the world. The open door offers us a splendid picture of what a Christian life may be. The world is hungry for our message of peace and good-will and the wide-open door challenges us to enter. Christ's way is the open door of life and of service, and it is ours to point the way."

In presenting a report from the Business Committee on Fifth-day afternoon, R. M. Jones said that for ten years we have been facing what might prove a spiritual catastrophe. We must have confidence in one another; not try to get ahead of somebody and then entrench oneself. We cannot force people into spiritual positions since the spirit of man must be free. The Minute which dealt with certain requests from two or more Yearly Meetings, and which appears elsewhere in this issue, was read and spoken to by several prominent Friends expressing hearty approval. The scaffolding no longer necessary was taken down and the unity of the structure stood out in all its beauty. The adoption was unanimous and the visitors were privileged to stand with the delegations and express their approval. The Chairman of the Committee reiterated, "We have done what we couldn't." The burden of anxiety was lifted from many hearts and strong men found their emotions getting beyond control. The Spirit of God was present in power uniting, healing, quickening, and like Peter on the Mount of Transfiguration, many were ready to say, "It is good for us to be here."

The Minute as adopted is as follows:—

"We recognize with profound sorrow that there is in the world to-day a great drift of religious unsettlement, unconcern and unbelief. We desire at this time to call our own membership to a deeper religious life, a greater consecration of heart and will to God and a more positive loyalty to the faith for which so many of our forerunners suffered and died. We wish to reaffirm the statements and declarations of faith contained in our Uniform Discipline, viz., 'The Essential Truths,' 'The Declaration of Faith' issued by the Richmond conference in 1887 and 'George Fox's Letter to the Governor of Barbadoes' and we urge upon all our membership to refresh their minds by a careful reading of these documents which gather up and express the central truths for which we stand, now as in the past. But we would further remind our membership that our Christian faith involves more than the adoption and profession of written statements however precious they may be. It stands and lives only in free personal loyalty and devotion to a living Christ and in an inward experience of His spiritual presence and power in the soul, making the facts of our religion as real and as capable of being soundly tested as are the facts of the physical universe. May Friends everywhere bear in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus.

"Hardly less important for the promotion of our spiritual influence and power in the world is an increase of faith, trust and confidence in one another, a love that suffers long and is kind and a unity of spirit which will bind us more closely together than uniformity of thought could ever do.

"In the light of the above statement in which we unite and since the clause which was adopted ten years ago, stating that these declarations of faith are not to be regarded as constituting a creed, has been widely misunderstood in at least two directions, it is our judgment that this clause should now be eliminated.

"We recommend that this meeting instruct its Publication Board to issue in attractive form an edition of these three documents as the authorized Declaration of Faith of the Five Years' Meeting of Friends in America, using as a preface the above statement."

The English Friends commented upon the fact of how few women there were among the delegates, as compared to men Friends, and of how small a part they had in the discussions and the considerations of business. Women Friends constituted approximately one-fifth of the delegate body. Two delegations, Wilmington and Oregon, were entirely composed of men only.

It was greatly significant that not a single question which appeared before the Five Years' Meeting for action was settled by a vote. Such a spirit of harmony prevailed that in every case action was had by common consent. On one or two occasions when there was decided difference of opinion the matter was left open for further consideration which resulted in unity of action. This was after the manner of the London Conference of 1920. The manifestation of unity appealed strongly to the fraternal delegates.

Edward W. Evans, of Philadelphia, urged the application of Christianity to all phases of life. The social Gospel is more than social service. There are many signs to-day that the church is awakening to its opportunity in industry, and we need to bring to bear on industrial and social life the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ. Our personality is the product of the community, and since birth social influences have been thrown about us which make us very largely what we become as men and women. Love is another name for fellowship which stretches out a helping hand to those engulfed by misfortune, clothes and feeds the hungry and naked and helps sick people get well, all of which if done with proper motives is a fine expression of the Christian spirit of service. But the full social Gospel is far more than this. If you love your neighbor you will want to do more than help him make the best of a bad world. You will want to have the world afford him all the opportunities he needs for the good life. You will want not merely to assist him to make the best of an inadequate wage but to have a wage that makes possible a life of self-development for him and his family. Industry must be made to supply all our neighbors with the opportunities for the good life.

The Clerk of the All-Friends' Conference, John Henry Barlow, told of the concerns from which the Conference grew, the development of a dream which began in the dark days of the war and after four years attained reality. One thousand delegates learned to know and to love one another. Throughout the Conference Friends moved steadily and slowly forward, but all the time nearer together, and at the end all separated as friends, with a new idea of the greatness and power of Quakerism. The tangible outcome was a number of documents, but the unseen and intangible results in friendship, love, hope, new knowledge and new thought, were far greater. An extraordinary spirit of unity prevailed because they had come together with a very great ideal, with a tremendous purpose, and in the right atmosphere of love and faith and hope. "I want us to think of that dream as a prophecy, a day yet to dawn when there shall be a perfect union of all those who bear the name of Friends. Let us believe that all things are possible to those who have faith, hope and love, for our God is able."

It is not often that a reporter on a daily paper rises to take part in a discussion on religious subjects! This phenomenon occurred during the session on evangelism when Helen Johnson, who furnished such excellent reports of the meeting for The Richmond Item, was recognized by the Clerk and spoke impressively upon the deplorable conditions in our High Schools and appealed to spiritually-minded people to give their best efforts toward restoring in them a moral atmosphere. It will be interesting to many to know that she is a grandniece of Robert Underwood Johnson, so long editor of the Century Magazine and recently ambassador to Italy.

Thanks to the thoughtfulness and generosity of the London delegates, each delegate to the Five Years' Meeting is to receive a copy of the new Part 1 of the Discipline of London

Yearly Meeting which has attracted so universally favorable comment.

At the opening of the first session the retiring Clerk in turning over the gavel to his successor explained that the fragment of wood from which it had been made was brought from the Argonne Forest in France, that it was taken from timber used in the construction of houses for the French people by our A. F. S. C. workers and that a Russian cabinet-maker in Seattle whose parents had been fed by Friends in Russia had turned it into shape, while a piano finisher, the son of a Friends' minister in Tennessee, had done the polishing. This symbol of authority thus represented efficiency and love.

TREE PLANTING ENCOURAGED.

About seven million young forest trees will be distributed free to land owners in Pennsylvania by the Department of Forestry this fall and next spring. An inventory of the Department's nurseries shows there are more than five million evergreens and about one million five hundred thousand hardwood trees ready for planting.

Among the evergreens to be given away free by the Department are large quantities of pitch pine, Scotch pine, Japanese red and black pine, Norway spruce and white pine. The leading kinds of hardwood trees will be white ash, green ash, rock oak, red oak, and American elm.

The trees are from five to twelve inches in height, and will be distributed to individuals who will plant them for wood production.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE HANDS AND FEET OF GOD.—(The Epistle of London Yearly Meeting for Boys and Girls)—DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Our Yearly Meeting message this year is short and striking, and there is one phrase in it which seems almost daring—"The hands and feet of God," for it means us, that we are to be God's hands, God's feet, His "errand-men," to His needy world.

What is it to be a "hand"? Not in that very disagreeable sense in which it is used of work-people in a factory; it cannot be that. It means surely, as the old mystic says, to "be to the Eternal Goodness what his own hand is to a man"—God using you as you use your hands, to do things or to make things. It is what so many of our young folk have been doing through the war and since, all over the world, helping, reconstructing, feeding, nursing, ploughing, building, in many lands—the very "hands of God" to their suffering, starving, homeless, despairing fellows.

And feet,—to be "the feet of God" is, saying it in all reverence, to carry Him to men, for "God has no human body now upon the earth but ours," and as He dwells within us we take Him wherever we go. It is a searching thought, and we pause and bow our heads in shame. Do I take God, show God, the loving Father to my schoolfellows, my workmates, my friends, the people in my town or village? What kind of God do they think of when they look at me?

It has been said of Sundar-Singh, the great and noble Indian Sadhu, who was in England last year, that wherever he went he reminded men of Jesus Christ, so that one day when he called at a house the maid told her mistress—"He looks as if it might be Jesus Christ at the door." So

"Christ's spirit taketh breath again
Within the lives of holy men.
Each changing age beholds afresh
Its word of God in human flesh."

In a unique way those blessed feet, which at last were nailed to the cross, carried God, but He calls His younger brothers and sisters to take up His work and go on with the message—the carrying. "Go ye," He said, "into all the world." That is not done yet by any means; it might have been had all His children been faithful to His command. Perhaps it has not been kept simple enough, too much elaboration and machinery and arrangement, instead of just to go somewhere, and be a bit of God, of Christ, to others. Here or there, north, south, east or west, it matters not; just where we are now may be needing just that bit of Him which we can show, or He may ask us to go to some far-away corner of the earth where the people "grope in darkness" and are waiting for someone to bring them face to face with the Light of the World.

Our Chinese Friend F. L. Yang, when speaking at the Foreign Mission Board, reminded us that the world is now a whispering gallery where all can hear so plainly because of wonderful means of communication like aeroplanes and wireless; but what we say to each other is not always the truest and best, so much is garbled and even lies. It is for us who know and love Him who is "the Way, the Truth and the Life" to see that we make this whispering gallery a real means of telling forth what is "true, lovely and of good report." "We dare set no limit to what God can do through us if we are faithful. Let us, however unworthy our past, go forth together to the work, joyfully believing that God can, in very deed, create through men the new world in which all are made one in Him."—E. ALICE CATFORD.

GERMANTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

The Germantown Friends' School opened on Third-day, Ninth Month 19th, with an enrollment of five hundred and eighty-two; two hundred and seventy-five boys and three hundred and seven girls.

Although the school year begins earlier than usual this autumn, all of the pupils who should have reported were present with the exception of thirty. Of these, fourteen were kept out temporarily on account of health, or were absent because the steamers from abroad were late. Only sixteen of the whole number were absent for reasons of family convenience, and most of them were on duty within a day or two. This is an indication of the earnest spirit with which the families represented in our Friends' schools co-operate in the training of their children. The weather at the beginning of the school year conspired to make the opening enthusiastic and spirited.

Comparatively few changes or improvements have been made during the summer, apart from painting and general renovation. Many of our rooms have been brightened by a number of color prints secured by a small contribution from the School, through Emily Poley, who made the purchases for us in Vienna when she was working over there last year. It may be a suggestion to other schools that a small amount judiciously expended in Vienna at this time will not only help that city, but will bring a large return of pictures.

The chief topic of interest of a material sort is the use, for the first time, of Clark Field for our girls' athletics. They have started a vigorous hockey season and now have the field, formerly used by the boys, exclusively for their sports.

Wistar Brown Field is used for the first time by the boys. It contains separate foot-ball fields for rugby and soccer, a well-constructed track and four double and two single tennis courts. The trees on the field and on the adjoining Mason property have been given the best possible modern treatment this summer and the whole effect is one of park-like beauty. We consider ourselves fortunate in having such places both for our boys' and girls' athletics.

The new Locker House for the boys is under roof and will be completed in the next few weeks. It will be equipped with about three hundred lockers and with ample facilities for showers and dressing-rooms. On the second floor there will be a well-planned apartment for the caretaker of the grounds. The building is Colonial in style and makes a pleasant feature of the field.

Another interesting school plan is the construction of a separate Kindergarten building. It will be built in the near future, between the Meeting House and Greene Street. It will amply provide for our Kindergarten needs and is planned to get a maximum of sunshine in the morning hours. We hope to have a particularly beautiful room to start our young disciples of Germantown in their educational life. The space vacated when the Kindergarten moves to its new building will be used for Primary purposes.

The School lost last year, through marriage and resignation, five teachers, whose places are worthily filled, we believe, by the following appointments:

To teach Drawing, Elizabeth Wood, a graduate of Germantown Friends' School, who has had large experience in Organized Charity work and allied activities. In taking up the teaching of Art, she returns to her earlier field of work, for which she is particularly well prepared.

To teach Geography and Social Studies, William Webb Price, a graduate of Swarthmore, who is also taking up teaching after practical experience in another field of work. He has had wide experience in meeting children as a lecturer during the last year.

To teach a section of the Third Primary Class, Edna Mendenhall, who has been for several years with the Friends' School in Brooklyn.

To assist in the French department, Eleonore D. Harris, a graduate of Germantown Friends' School and of Bryn Mawr College.

To assist in the Kindergarten, Margaret Culin, a graduate of Miss Illman's School, Philadelphia.

Martha A. Tierney enters upon her duties as Secretary to the Principal.

A number of our teachers were occupied this summer, as usual, in camp work for boys. Among them, Harry A. Dominovich and our Physical Directors, Alfred A. Smith and Herman P. Breninger.

Frances W. Perkins, Assistant Physical Instructor for the girls, again had a responsible position in a girls' camp in New England.

Irvin C. Poley studied at the summer school at Harvard.

D. Lawrence Burgess was a member of the School for English, near Middlebury College, Vt., and several of the teachers attended other summer schools.

Emma D. Roberts was granted an allowance by the Committee for a summer trip abroad and she traveled chiefly in England with Rachel G. Calvert.

Hildegard B. Shumway and Eleonore D. Harris, of the French department, both spent the summer abroad.

Elizabeth S. Kirk returns this autumn after an allowance of several months granted her for recuperation and visits to the more progressive types of Primary Schools in the East.

Our class of thirty-seven graduated last Sixth Month. Of these, twenty-eight entered this autumn fourteen different colleges and universities. A survey of our list of recent graduates shows that Germantown Friends' School pupils are studying in twenty-seven different institutions. These include Harvard, Yale, University of Pennsylvania, Princeton, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cornell, Haverford, Williams and Swarthmore for our boys and Bryn Mawr, Wellesley, Vassar, Smith, Mt. Holyoke and Goucher for the girls.

The chief honors won in connection with college admission are the receiving of places in the Honor Group of Vassar and Wellesley by two of our girls.

A number of our teachers again read for the College Entrance Examination Board in New York City. Jane S. Jones in Mathematics, Edith H. Knight in French, Helen M. Zebley in Latin and Joseph H. Price in History.

MOORESTOWN FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

Moorestown Friends' School opened on Ninth Month 19th with the largest enrollment it has had. The increase is particularly noticeable in the High School. The School seems to be growing in favor, not only in the immediate community, but in surrounding territory. An increasing number is drawn from Riverton where the School has had a strong clientele. Likewise, a large number has enrolled from Mt. Holly, Merchantville and Camden. For the first time we have enrolled students from Beverly and Haddonfield. In addition to the bus which has been run to Riverton for a number of years the School is now running one to Haddonfield. The demand for this was brought about by the patrons of the Haddonfield Friends' School desiring to send their children to Moorestown in order to avoid the trip to and from Philadelphia.

Some changes have occurred in the faculty since last year. Eleanor Grace Clark, of Bryn Mawr College, has charge of the English this year on account of Ruby Davis being on leave of absence for a year's study. Ellen Hayes, of Radcliffe College, takes the place of Sarah Haines in the Junior High School, the latter being moved to the English Department. Hilda Ferris, of Bryn Mawr College and the Physical Training Department of Columbia and Harvard, takes the place of Grace Boyer in the department of physical training for girls. Helen Coles, of Swarthmore College, takes the place of Eleanor M. Albee in charge of the first grade. Gladys C. Tatem, dietitian for the past two years, will, in addition to the above, have charge of the classes in hygiene. The management feels that the new teachers will add strength to the faculty.

Whatever question may have been in the minds of some as to the advisability of the union of the two schools has been dispelled by the success of the past two years. W. Elmer Barrett has been headmaster since the union. The graduates of the School have made very creditable records in college and in the examinations under the college board. It may not be out of place to say that the patrons have expressed strong appreciation of the quiet Christian influence over the children as reflected in the home.

THE CHEYNEY PILGRIMAGE.

[It may not be known to all our readers that the Cheyney Training School for Teachers passed by purchase of the State out of the hands of Friends within the past few months. The class graduating last summer received the full state diplomas such as were issued by all other Normal Schools in the Commonwealth.

The School being now a State institution, its first function is to provide for the training of would-be teachers in the State. The past summer has been enthusiastic groups of teachers to the total of many thousands at several of the Normal Schools in the capacity of summer schools and conferences. The object that prompted the visit described below was to bring Cheyney and the opportunities it offered to the notice of as many school teachers and school directors as possible.—EDS.]

It was by the help of the Richard Humphreys Foundation that the Cheyney Training School for Teachers, now the Fourteenth State Normal of the Commonwealth, was enabled to send out a group of singers with the Principal for a little more than two weeks, to make known more widely throughout the State the motive and aims of that Cheyney program for the training of Negro teachers, which Friends have so long supported. It proved to be a somewhat strenuous but none the less interesting and helpful undertaking.

Letters were sent to the Principals of the thirteen Normal Schools asking for the opportunity to present the Cheyney story briefly and to give to the thousands of teachers attending the summer sessions the refreshment of the Negro spirituals. Wherever the summer programs were not already as full as they could be made, the opportunity was given. We finally decided to try to reach seven of these centers. A co-operating neighbor rented us a large comfortable Buick car at a very low cost. We spent almost a week in rehearsing our group of singers, two groups actually being tried out, and then set forth. In no other way, perhaps, could we have been so impressed with the wide space reaches, the massive beauty, and the material wealth and power of this Keystone State which it is our privilege to serve. We were overcome by distances. Two delays for auto repairs made it necessary for us to curtail program. We actually reached only four of the numerous sessions by driving night and day—the West Chester teacher group, the Hollis Dann School of Music at the same place, the Slippery Rock School and Bloomsburg. This meant, however, talking and singing the story to at least 2500 men and women engaged in the teaching service of Pennsylvania. The response to our effort for an understanding and for moral and material support of our work in training a body of enlightened Negro leaders for this Commonwealth and the nation, was everywhere most cordial and apparently unanimous. I think I have good reason to hope that this whole body of professional men and women will stand behind our appeal to the next legislature for the financial help we need to make the School what it must be made in equipment, staff and broadened curricula. In helping us to secure that response the Richard Humphreys Foundation has, in my judgment, rendered a fine service. Moreover, I am convinced that this initial attempt at direct visitation of these schools should be followed up in the new school year with a program organized more effectively on the basis of our summer experience.

In addition to this missionary work in the schools, we broadcasted our message and our songs from the Gimbel radio station in Philadelphia. How many thousands of people "listened in" it is not possible to know. The chief operator of this station, however, heard at a distance, and telephoned to the store while we were present to express his satisfaction in what he called a good public offering. We also carried our message and our songs to five colored churches within the brief period of our journeyings, and made tentative arrangements for future engagements in other Negro communities all the way from Harrisburg to Pittsburgh.

We returned home, tired out after an all night drive from Bloomsburg, but much more enlightened as to our great opportunity at Cheyney. We all felt that we had cast our bread upon the waters, and that we shall find it after many days. We brought with us a sense of lasting gratitude to the principals of the normal schools whose interest and hospitality could not have been more convincing and whose success in asking for free will offerings helped us to reduce the cost of the tour. We felt the same sense of gratitude to the kindly friends along the way who generously provided for us many needed comforts, for it must be remembered that the colored man's travels in our great land is still widely a complicated and disturbing adventure.

Finally, we came back to thank our friends of the Richard Humphreys Foundation again for making the whole project possible. We know now that we are working in the right direction, and we believe that this unique Foundation will continue to stand by us as we continue to "carry on."

SPECIAL MEETING OF SUB-COMMITTEE OF YEARLY MEETING EXTENSION COMMITTEE ON "APPROACH TO THE PUBLIC."

The Yearly Meeting Extension Committee is now in its second year of service; it has endeavored to take up such lines of work as have developed under what we believe real religious concern; there has been, however, amongst us, a feeling that, in the world's great need, we were, perhaps, not rendering in full the service for our Master which is possible at this time.

Invitations were sent to twenty Friends, not members of this group, to join us in seriously considering, and, under Divine Guidance, meeting some of the great problems in spiritual Leadership; a goodly proportion of these were with us. After a period of worship, the Chairman, J. P. Elkinton, told of the work which the Committee had endeavored to perform in its effort to reach the heart of the great public.

The preparation and distribution of Pennsbury Leaflets had formed a conspicuous part of this service; seventeen of them are now in circulation. Among the felt needs is a suitable article on proper relations between employer and employee; another avenue that is appealing is to the mass of people who attend meetings of the "Salvation Army," those to whom sin and temptation are very real.

Wilbur K. Thomas was especially concerned about getting the right kind of literature into High Schools and Colleges; we have only too much evidence of lowered standards in these places as well as among young people in general.

Speaking of the Y. M. C. A. which has taken 20,000 of our leaflets, he felt that the most helpful avenue of approach was in their First-day afternoon religious services; we should not confine ourselves to literature; there was need for living epistles to spread Christian truth; he emphasized the need of explaining the principles of our religious society to the German people in this country.

Max I. Reich said we needed a fresh baptism of the Spirit to do the work which we think we are called to do.

Many helpful suggestions were offered; among them that the little pamphlet prepared by Alfred Lowry might be given wider circulation; it was felt that there was a real gap between our pamphlet literature and our Book of Discipline, neither of which quite filled the place when there was a call for something concise and clear to hand to an inquirer. Reference was made to the pamphlet prepared some years ago by James Wood, of New York, and widely circulated, entitled, "The Distinguishing Principles of the Society of Friends." The edition is exhausted and the question was raised whether we could do better than gain permission to reissue it. Attention was also called to Edward Grubb's recent booklet of a like nature. Both of these should be in the hands of Friends for distribution as cases present.

A Friend suggested that we should have notices on bulletin boards at our meeting-houses drawing attention briefly to some of our cardinal beliefs; those meeting with us, unacquainted with our methods, would then be better prepared to worship with us.

The quotation, "Come ye apart and rest awhile," had been noticed at a place of worship.

Our attention was called to a very good practice in some large cities, where busy men having large interests had stopped from their work during office hours and gathered for silent devotion, the speaker added, "and it pays."

A Friend suggested that we have few people among us who are so gifted that they can state in a few pages, principles of faith and practice, in a way that we want to put out; he approved of the gathering today, and thought that a small group of writers should get together and decide if possible the material that was needed, then proceed to have the proper individuals prepare the articles; it was suggested that some chapters in Rufus M. Jones's books and those of J. W. Rowntree might be used, giving due credit.

Elihu Grant stressed the importance of visualizing one's audience in order to get properly under the concern to prepare the message; he thought that Tract Societies had much to overcome in reaching the reading public. John Wesley, in starting this sort of work, insisted on selling the material, rather than giving it away. He thought, however, there was a place for literature such as we are issuing.

It was stated that our leaflets should be written under real concern, rather than undertaking to publish at regular intervals.

The view was expressed that we needed some literature on the relation of religion to science, in order to prove that a person can be a devout Christian and at the same time have due regard to scientific truths. The "Kingdom of God" was a topic suggested for one of our series. Human fellowship leading up to a higher Divine Fellowship is something highly to be desired.

Attention was called to the large number of English Tracts, especially those of the Yorkshire Committee, and we were reminded that these had been carefully scanned by many of us, but it did not appear that, in the main, they were adapted to our needs, though well written.

The subject, "Simplicity," also "The Spiritual Nature of Sacraments," "Oaths" and "Sufficiency of Love," were suggested topics. Literature that will appeal to children of High School age, and those in colleges, uplifting in character, with spiritual background was very much needed; the Christian attitude toward science would fit very well to meet one of the needs here. A lowering of the moral fibre of young people must be admitted during the past few years, and one of the most challenging fields of service is to do what we can to correct the present condition of laxity and unconcern.

Alfred C. Garrett, with his approaching trip to Germany in mind, had been trying to visualize audiences of German people. He felt the importance of the simplification of religion. Early Friends came out of confusion into this simplicity; we need to bring a clear ray of true religion to this sadly-disturbed world.

Ann Sharpless approved of the leaflets thus far issued; there was a lively demand for them in her home town, West Chester, and she felt that in a quiet way they were doing good.

The subject of advertising was adverted to; it was suggested that the most fertile field for our sort of work was in the country papers; it might be well to use space in putting the actual Christian message before the reading public as paid advertising; such work means considerable force and a good deal of money.

Wilbur K. Thomas referred to what has often been on Friends' minds when he said that the most strategic point in American Quakerism was at 20 S. Twelfth Street, where there is a large vacant lot devoted to raising a little grass; this should have on it a Quaker Book Store; it would meet a real felt need in the advancement of Christianity.

The need of teaching meetings, to explain the religious views of Friends to uninformed audiences, was emphasized; this is one of the practical means of approach to the public.

The question was asked, have we Friends today who have argumentative minds who, like Barclay, will put questions in peoples' minds?

It was thought important to develop such opportunities as they occur.

In this service of approach to the public, we need the earnest co-operation of Friends generally, for our work is not only to discourage evil in the world, but it is rather a positive program, where, under Divine Leadership we should do all we can in aiding character-building and the advancement of Christ's Kingdom on Earth.

AUSTRIAN LAND SETTLEMENTS.

During the two years since its inception, the Austrian land settlement movement has attracted world-wide attention as one of the most constructive programs now being carried out toward European reconstruction. The rapidly increasing distress in Austria, due to the catastrophic depreciation of the krone, renders these settlements at present both more hard-pressed for support than they have ever been, and at the same time more vitally necessary to suffering Austria. The Friends' Austrian Mission is accordingly asking for an appropriation of £10,000 (about $44,000.) for the support of the land settlements during this critical period, and it is important that Friends be in touch with the latest developments of the movement.

HOW THE MOVEMENT BEGAN.

The land settlement movement grew out of the garden allotment plan by means of which supplementary food was produced in war-gardens surrounding Vienna. A group of war invalids who had worked some of these gardens formed a co-operative society, took possession—after having informed the Government of their intentions so to do—of a corner of the former royal hunting grounds, and set to work building homes for themselves and so reconstructing their lives. Following their leadership, other similar groups were begun until there are now forty settlement societies which are either actually building or planning to build land settlements in the vicinity of Vienna. All these groups are joined in a central settlement league. The greater number of the settlers are workmen who previously lived in Viennese tenement houses. Recently, however, an artists' settlement was founded, and also a settlement for pensioned army officers.

The land for the settlements is loaned by the Government. Each group of settlers, organized in the form of a co-operative society, pledges its own members to perform a large amount of the unskilled labor of reconstruction. Skilled labor is hired, where necessary, from funds which the settlers themselves contribute to the extent of their ability, and which have been largely increased by government loans and by loans and gifts from the Friends' Mission in Vienna. Co-operative carpenter and blacksmith shops have been established on many of the settlements, while the settlers themselves in many cases make the hollow concrete bricks of which the houses are built. An interesting glimpse of both the methods and the spirit of the land settlement movement is afforded to visitors by the chains of women settlers who pass these bricks from the sheds in which they are molded to the surrounding fields to dry. All the buildings constructed belong to the settlement co-operative society and are simply leased to the individual settlers.

NATURE OF THE SETTLEMENTS.

In most cases the houses are built in closely joined rows for the sake of economy. They are two stories high, with a garret above; trim in external appearances and tastefully decorated within. Ample gardens surround them; and they are provided with sheds in which poultry, goats and pigs may be kept. Visiting teachers go from one settlement to another, instructing the settlers in the care of their gardens and livestock. The productivity of the settlement gardens has been remarkable. Most of the settlers are able during the summer to produce 50 per cent. of their food requirements, and it is estimated that when the settlements are fully established they will enable a 25 per cent. reduction in the living expenses of their members.

By the end of the month it is expected that the number of houses ready for occupancy in the 16 land settlements assisted by the Friends' Mission will total 500, sheltering approximately 3,000 settlers. This number, owing to the shortage of funds, is only about 50 per cent. of the building program arranged in First Month for the year 1922.

Aline Atherton-Smith, who is in charge of that department of the Vienna Mission which is aiding the land settlements, says concerning them:

"The housing conditions are infinitely superior to the tenement housing in the town; light, air and space being the chief features. The mothers all express themselves delighted with their new dwellings, and state that they and their families are in far better health than formerly. Many tuberculous cases have been greatly benefited by the healthy conditions and from sleeping at night on the open air terrace which is attached to many of the houses.

IMPORTANCE OF THE MOVEMENT.

Visitors to the land settlements are agreed upon the great importance of the movement to Austria in its present crisis. The settlements are a material answer to the housing and food shortage from which Vienna is suffering. At the same time they give stability both to the means and the morale of the settlers. With the krone almost daily depreciating, money as money is practically worthless to the Viennese; and they convert it into other forms as rapidly as possible. Many of the working classes who have no better means of deriving some value from their wages, spend them for drink, or in other harmful or useless ways. The land settlers are able to invest their surplus funds in the construction of their new homes, thus obtaining permanent values and providing some hope for their own future. Finally, the spirit in which the settlements have been conceived and carried out, is in itself one of the greatest promises for Europe's future. Self-help, production and co-operation are its key-notes and these must be the key-notes of all permanent European reconstruction.

PRESENT NEEDS.

Owing to the acute shortage of state and municipal funds, further government loans to the land settlements are at present impossible. Building operations have consequently had to be cut, in spite of the willingness of the settlers to do all the unskilled manual labor. With a comparatively small number of families yet housed, while many hundreds of men have already contributed their unpaid labor in the hope of getting their homes before winter, this limitation is a serious setback to the settlement movement. Unless Friends and others interested can provide sufficient funds to carry the movement through the coming winter, many of the settlements will be forced to dismiss their paid workmen and some will entirely break up. It is now proposed to build small wooden or brick huts which could later be enlarged, and the hut plans formerly used by the French Mission are being sent to Vienna for possible use in this connection.

Funds are thus first of all urgently needed for the maintenance of the actual building program.

A second need is for the establishment of non-alcoholic canteens for the workmen of the settlements; canteens which can later be converted into co-operative stores for the settlers. Six such canteens have already been established. Gifts of food from the Friends' Mission have made possible the establishment of these canteens. Five of these are provided with soda water fountains—through the generosity of a visiting American Friend. The soft drinks sold are discouraging alcoholism, and at the same time they form a source of profit for the community. A co-operative clothing union will be formed this winter for the purchase of sewing-machines and the cheap production of clothes for the settlers.

The settlers are experiencing difficulty in providing food for their livestock; while means are likewise needed for the development of co-operative farms which will further increase the food supply of the settlements.

Funds for the aid of the settlement movement should be so marked and sent to the American Friends Service Committee.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A MEETING FOR WORSHIP was held at old Center Meeting-house, near Centerville, Delaware, the afternoon of First-day, the 17th ult. Both branches of Friends were well represented as the meeting was under joint appointment and oversight. It had been advertised locally by placards displayed at country stores and cross-roads, but besides people from the neighborhood a large number came from other localities as Westgrove, Hockessin, Concordville, Wilmington, and Germantown. One Friend from abroad, a delegate to the recent Five Years' meeting, was present and was much interested. There was a considerable amount of speaking, vocal prayer was offered and there was some good silence, more of which perhaps would have been helpful. On the whole it can be said to have been a satisfactory time of fellowship, and it is to be hoped that Friends can unite in holding such meetings more frequently.

WITHIN the past week we have learned with much satisfaction that Agnes L. Tierney of Germantown is to be of the party sailing on the 17 inst., Berlin and Vienna as their destination. The company numbers four, Alfred C. Garrett and wife Eleanor Garrett, their son Philip Garrett and Agnes L.

Tierney. It is but reasonable to hope that our readers may from time to time hear from them through THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS everywhere will be saddened by the news of the sudden death of Dikran B. Donchian, of New York. After attending the Five Years' Meeting, he and his wife went on to California for an extended trip. He attended Friends' Meeting at Berkeley, Ninth Month 24, and during worship spoke of his own faith in Jesus in such a way that all present were impressed with his beautiful message. After he left the house and was on the way to the car, he said to a nephew that he felt very ill and sat down in a store, and before a doctor could come to his help, his spirit had departed. The body was sent to his home in New York.

"ADVENTURES IN CHRISTIAN SERVICE," a story recently published by Sylvester Jones about missionary work in Cuba, has recently been purchased by two Iowa school teachers, not Friends, to be used by them in their teaching of Geography and History in public schools. It is also being considered by other educators for similar use.

In the spring the Friends' Bookshop, London, issued an attractive list of announcements of Quaker and General literature likely to appeal to Friends under the title of "Books You Want." In similar form an autumn list has just been published, which can be obtained free by addressing 140 Bishopsgate, London, E. C. 2.

[The following, taken from a personal letter to one of the Editors, is from a non-Friend. We print it for the sake of the caution it offers and not because of the kind words of approval.—Eds.]

Alluding to her experiences in Austria the writer says: "The people are facing their poverty with endurance, patience and courage. It was a joy to be able to help them.

"I feel that the work done there by the Society of Friends, American Relief Administration, and American Red Cross is building strong ties between the two countries.

"Often and often even people who have no children and who come from military families have said to us with tears in their eyes, 'We can never forget what you Americans are doing for our little children.'

It is very fine I think the way the Society of Friends is keeping itself so in the background in doing its work; not trying to spread Quakerism, but to pass on what Quakerism stands for, the spirit of good-will between nations, races and classes.

"One very fine Austrian woman, a devout Catholic, said to me with deep feeling, 'I feel I can trust the Friends, they are the same in times of war and in times of peace. They do relief work for the love of humanity and not in order to spread the doctrine of their sect.'"

THOSE still in doubt as to what book or subject to take for a study circle this winter might well consider one of the following:—

"A Synopsis for the Study of the Bible Treatment of Social Questions," by C. Ryder Smith (Student Christian Movement), or "Outline Studies in the Christian Gospel." Both form splendid bases for discussion on the relation of social problems and Christian principles.

A longer work from the same publishers is G. R. H. Shafto's "The Stories of the Kingdom," which is a suggestive study in the real meaning for to-day of the parables of Jesus. At the close of each section are suggested points for meditation or discussion.

The Philadelphia Ledger for the 2nd is responsible for the following:—

The migration of 10,000 more Mennonites from Canada to Mexico will begin this month, the Mennonite Church having advanced $4,000,000 to families contemplating the trip.

The 1600 Mennonites who settled in Mexico last year have done well with their crops and have erected adobe barns, granaries and stone houses, and are working on churches and schools. By the time other Mennonites arrive they will have wells dug, good roads built and enough extra houses for temporary shelter.

Each new family will bring two to four cows, four to six horses and some sheep and poultry. The migration, when complete, will involve settlement of 200,000 Canadian Mennonites.

The American Bible Society distributed 4,855,464 Bibles and parts of Bibles last year, at a cost of $1,172,756. From the sale of books there came in $462,832. It costs 24 cents a copy to produce the volumes and place them in the hands of the ultimate consumer, who paid on the average 9 cents a copy—of course many were given away. The 15 cents difference is paid by churches and individuals who wish to help the society.

The great demonstrations in English and German cities of "No More War Day" have astonished not a few Americans. The Christian Work in a recent article on the subject states that four facts are noticeable in this connection:

First, that "the people of Europe have realized that war does not accomplish anything. . . . The Allies won the war—and the peace is almost worse than the war, the victory almost as ruinous as defeat would have been. Nobody has got anything out of the war but infinite trouble and misery."

In the second place, "the people are at last getting their eyes opened and wondering if anything war could ever bring is worth the awful, fearful cost in life, suffering, agony, sorrow and a long legacy of poverty and disease."

"The third thing everybody sees in Europe, is that war has left a world just seething and boiling with hatreds, jealousies, passions, suspicions, revenges, between the nations and revolution and discontent within."

Fourth, "a rapidly growing feeling abroad in Europe that war is utterly incompatible with a civilization that calls itself Christian. The real reason back of the 'No More War movement' is found to be the consciousness that war has no part with Jesus Christ."

AN APPEAL TO PHILADELPHIA YOUNG FRIENDS.

Much as I treasure the privilege of calling myself one of you, Young Friends of Philadelphia, as I am permitted to take part in your work and your play, and so gradually get to know you until I scarcely feel a stranger among you any more, there is always a corner of my heart which is far away in my home land. My thoughts go back to the young people in Germany who are going through such momentous times. Times of moment, not only because of threatening danger, and physical need and much sorrow, but also momentous because of the revolution of thought which is ploughing up the once quiet surface of a religiously contented national mind.

The young people of Germany are seeking in many directions for a new light, and they seem hardly to know where to begin to seek. Their faith in the old church has been shattered—where shall they turn to find the Truth? They are seeking in nature, and in books, in old mystical religions and in the new "osophies" and "oigies" of latter-day philosophers. Thousands of them are still seeking, but just a few, having come into contact with those who brought to an enemy country a wonderful message and spirit of love and good-will, have recognized that here was the thing they sought, and have taken upon themselves the name of "Friends"; a name so full of meaning for the well-nigh hopeless people who saw the coming of "friends" when it had seemed that all peoples were their enemies.

These few Young Friends in Germany who are trying to learn to know and follow the Christ Within, are the "leaven" working in a great people. They are but a little flock, and they are only beginning to feel the way for themselves. So much depends upon them, and although I am sure they feel that they have the love and sympathy of Young Friends in other parts of the world, I cannot help thinking how much it would mean to them if some real evidence of that love and sympathy could be given them to help them along their way.

This is my plea, that Young Friends in America, in the joy of their work and organization in their own country, may remember, and (if only by a word of encouragement now and then, by some word which will show them that they are not isolated, but a part of other Young Friends, by a word which will tell them that there are those who have sympathy and understanding for them in the uphill climb), give real assistance and renewed strength to those pioneers who must often, I feel, be beset with doubts and fears.

ELSA H. SILBER.

In the autumn we praise Thee, our God, in the autumn we praise Thee!

Spring comes like a tranquil Sabbath morning, and we grow softly toward Thee in Thy sunlight. But in the autumn we fly to Thee as a gull flies on tireless beating wings, borne on Thy great winds. For the strength of Thy winds we praise Thee.

In the summer Thou clothest the hills with discreet green, and in the heat we rest our eyes on Thy quiet trees. In the autumn Thou settest the hills aflame—each poplar a torch; each maple a blazing brand; and we worship the prodigality with which Thou spreadest Thy glory before us. For the riot of color with which Thou settest our souls afire, we praise Thee.

In the winter the sky is gray with ominous cloud banks and we fear Thee. Now Thou settest Thy cloud galleons to sail in stately fleets across the blue and on these voluptuous barques our spirits approach Thee. For the freedom and abandon of the clouds we praise Thee.

Winds and color and clouds—all are Thine, Oh God! And we are Thine. For eyes to see Thy glory, for spirits to be set atingle by Thy strength, for souls to give to Thee, we praise, we glorify, we magnify Thee—our Lord and our God.

Amen.

THE YOUNG QUAKER.

We have watched with interest the initiation and progress of a monthly publication by English Young Friends. The Young Quaker seems to reflect comprehensively the spirit and concern of those very wide-awake young people. We respect their independence of thought and their willingness to express themselves fully and clearly. It is not freedom of speech that hurts a cause, but obscurity and half expression. The Young Quaker avoids these pitfalls, we think, with both tact and skill. Its Editorial Board invites correspondence and criticism and, when they come, presents both sides of a disputed point. Congratulations, Young Quaker, that way fairness lies!

While many of the articles are of local interest, we feel that our Young Friends would enjoy a closer acquaintance with this publication. We are enlarged by every contact that we make with all Friends overseas and the Young Quaker brings us in touch not only with English young people, but with those new Youth Movements on the Continent about which we should be fully informed. Stop at the Young Friends' Office, at 20 S. Twelfth Street some day and spend a little time looking over our copies of the paper.

We quote below an article by their Editor, Howard Diamond, which shows a little of the fine spirit of their policy.

[Eds.]

OPPORTUNITIES.

We do not always realize how much we younger members of the Society are indebted to our elders for one thing in particular—the opportunities which they are always offering to us.

Consider for a moment the position of a young man or woman in a Nonconformist Church, or in the Church of England. He may attend Church regularly, he may associate with other young people of his own age in "The Young People's Fellowship" attached to the Church. Perhaps he will, if he shows exceptional ability, become a Scoutmaster or a sidesman, and when he grows older, possibly a deacon. But his opportunity for expressing himself and taking part in the life of his Church is exceedingly small, and in the life of his particular sect, regarded nationally, his opportunity is literally nothing.

How different with Friends! In the Meeting for Worship, to begin with, contributions from young Friends are welcomed, and all may take a part in Meeting, whether vocally, or just in the quietness. This is true in theory of other denominations, though too often one goes "to hear the sermon" rather than to take part in corporate worship.

In the business Meetings and the organization of the Society, the opportunities offered to young people are very great. Not only do older Friends invite the co-operation of us younger people in the discussion and carrying out of the work of the Society, but when younger people are not present at Quarterly and Monthly Meetings in any numbers, it is the subject of comment. Even in Yearly Meeting itself attendance is free and open to all members, and speaking is not restricted, in theory or in practice, to Friends of mature years. Older Friends, in fact, are often more anxious for our co-operation than we are to respond.

A group of young Friends has sometimes been the means of re-modelling the basis of an Evening Meeting, changing its form and the type of address and programme. In one Quarterly Meeting all the extension work has been handed over to the charge of young Friends. That such things are possible is really very extraordinary, and we do not always realize how wide are the opportunities we are given, perhaps because of lack of experience of other bodies.

Therefore, we need to be very grateful to the Society as a whole for allowing us this freedom. It makes the Society something far more vital to us when we can express ourselves through it, instead of having to "take it or leave it," as must be largely the case elsewhere.

In the second place this should lead us to respond to our opportunities better than we do. How often do we nurse our ideas carefully for the next "Young Friends' Conference," when the proper place for their expression is our own Quarterly Meeting? How often do we stay away from Monthly Meeting because it is dull (it usually is), when we are invited to go and help to vitalize it?

There is no real danger of keeping all our ideas for Young Friends' Conferences—but at the same time, it is true to-day that we do not respond as we might to the open invitation to go and make our Meetings what we would of them. If ever we think the Society behind-hand in anything, the remedy lies with ourselves. We do not need to sit back and be critical, because we are invited to go in and alter.

But there is one danger to beware of. It is the danger of immaturity, of "rushing in" with immature ideas and expecting them to find approval immediately. We all know the saying that "but for the older Friends the young Friends would set the house on fire; and but for the young Friends the fire would die out." One of the triumphs of the Society, and a reason for its constant progress, is that youth and age both have their scope; new ideas are tempered with experience, and precedent gives way to concern.

HOWARD DIAMOND, in The Young Quaker.

BEAR THE YOKE IN THY YOUTH.

After the loving invitation of the Saviour, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," was given forth to His hearers of that day; He says, "Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me." To-day, as in that day, He wants every one of His hearers to take His yoke (a sign of submission), and learn of Him.

Shall we, the young people of this generation, heed His call, and give all our time and thought to His work? Can we lay aside all our cherished pleasures, seemingly innocent pleasures, for His sake, if called for at our hands? Can we patiently suffer the hatred of the world, and even of professing Christians, if need be? Can we follow Him in all His requirements, no matter how useless or small these things may seem? If we do all this, we surely are taking His yoke upon us, and are in a position to learn of Him.

And if we trust Him implicitly, we shall find His promise true, when He said, "For My yoke is easy, and My burden is light."

"Is not His will the wisest, is not His choice the best,
And in perfect acquiescence is there not perfect rest?"

SARAH E. POLLARD.

NORWICH, Ont., Canada.

THE COMING ELECTIONS.

Elections will take place in most of the States this fall that will have a very definite effect on the industrial and political development of the country.

Pennsylvania is in a rather favored position. By a most unforeseen combination of circumstances, Governor Sprout was called upon to appoint Senator Pepper to take the place of the late Senator Penrose. This choice not only placed a man of distinguished legal experience in the Senate, but also a man of unquestioned character. It was unfortunate that the Senator was called upon to cast his first vote for Newberry, whose seat in the Senate was thereby assured. Senator Pepper represents a conservative school of political thinking that may prove to be safe and sane, although the rumor circulated by the enemy describes the old-time Republicanism as absolutely safe, but absolutely insane. Time will decide.

The death rate of Pennsylvania's Senators has been exceedingly high during 1921 to 1922. First, Senator Knox, representing the Western half of the State, then Penrose from Philadelphia and finally Senator Crow from Pittsburgh. These deaths total a great loss to our representation in Congress. David A. Reed, a lawyer from Pittsburgh, is up for election as junior Senator. Happily Reed is a man of distinct legal training, with an acute mind, ably supported by very definite principles. He is on the under side of middle age and promises much. Those who know him feel that he will develop into the Knox type of statesman. Pennsylvanians should have no cause to be ashamed of these two Senators.

The wheel of politics has spun dizzily in the State this year. In addition to two new Senators we have witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of an anti-organization Republican nominee for Governor. Whereas Senator Pepper is a Progressive with a little "p", Gifford Pinchot is a Progressive with a capital "P." At least so it has appeared from his past party affiliations and administration of the several departments of forestry which have been under his charge. Nevertheless, Gifford Pinchot, if elected, will face great odds. He will have to cope with one of the most unscrupulous and powerful State political machines that our democracy has produced. He will have to avoid the disaster of Governor Brumbaugh's administration and he does not propose to follow the trail of Governor Sproul's administration. If he succeeds in redeeming the Republican reputation throughout the State and on Capitol Hill, it will be a modern exhibit of David and Goliath. In addition to heroic bravery we must recall that David used a round, smooth stone. Gifford Pinchot's political equipment calls for a suit-case full of round, smooth stones.

The out-standing political issue of this decade will in all probability be the Government's relation to industries operating the natural resources of the country and the large public service corporations. In the first group fall coal, oil and lumber. In the second group are the railroads, shipping, telephone and telegraph. These businesses are briefly referred to as the key industries of the nation's economic life. It is almost inconceivable at this writing to contemplate a Federal government or State governments that attempt to direct or control all of these enormous undertakings. The facts of recent events point to a much more imminent possibility than a lively imagination can picture. During the war the Government directed under its administration the railroads, telephone, telegraph and an amazing fleet of ships. To be sure, it did not buy nor appropriate mines, but it had wide powers of requisition and practiced a system of priorities that amounted to practical control. We say this was a period of war and departures in federalization and concentration were tolerated that will not be required in times of peace. But what does this summer indicate? An industrial paralysis of coal mining has taken place with only one equal in intensity and no equal in size or the solidarity of the striking forces. It has been a strike of national scope executed by a great industrial union of national size. Pressure, such as it was—and it was not only patient, considerate and sporadically forceful, was possible from only one source—namely, the Federal Government. The strike is settled and coal moves. The operators no longer entertain top-heavy ideas about miners, nor do the diviners amongst them fail to read the handwriting on the wall at Washington.

Close upon the coal strike came the strike of the shop crafts, with the same pressure from Washington to settle peacefully. Another serious industrial quarrel has been patched up with black eyes all around, including the nurse. The ominous feature about the railroads is their inability to move freight as I write these lines. They claimed continuously that their shops were repairing rolling stock with usual efficiency. As a matter of fact most of them misrepresented the actual conditions so that the Pennsylvania system has had to declare an embargo on all freight other than coal and foodstuffs three weeks after the trouble is settled. Several other factors have helped to produce this tie-up, such as shortage of new cars, increase in business, and so forth. But no matter how many et cetera one may tack on, the truth remains that a minor member of the several railroad unions has not only been able to embarrass the railroads, but has demanded the very serious attention of the Federal government.

And so we are gradually getting used to government in business. We are also becoming very familiar with tirades against this evil, yet the wheel of fate seems to be turning in this direction. Recently I was amazed to hear from the lips of a Southern lawyer a confession that he, an ex-advocate of State rights, a Democrat by inheritance and a great believer in private initiative, was more and more of the opinion that the Government should control not only the natural resource monopolies such as coal and oil, but also direct through suitable commissions the most important public services. The Inter-state Commerce Commission has functioned as the delicate and vital task of rate setting without the complete paralysis of railroad nerves. When my friend vouchsafed his opinion I almost collapsed with surprise, as he was a man high in his profession and a native son of South Carolina. But he put his case so mildly and so clearly that it was easy to catch his meaning—namely, that the industrial growth of the United States has been so tremendous in the last half century that the old political conceptions of State boundary lines were becoming obsolete and artificial. As a consequence it is imperative to re-shape political views to meet the new conditions.

It is just this change that makes the personnel of our State government resulting from this election so interesting. The people have not yet come to a definite conclusion as to what business is the Government's business and what business is not. To order the Government out of business is as incongruous as to banish the automobile. Both have arrived. The men whom we elect this fall will, if they be statesmen, have a good bit to do with solving this knotty problem. It is imperative that we vote for statesmen and not for politicians.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

SELECTIONS FROM LETTERS FROM ESTHER M. WHITSON.

Steamship Aquitania, Third Month 23rd.—This is my first effort to write since the hasty scratch in New York harbor. We ate our lunch at 1 p. m. Later I was advised to walk. So I walked—to the rail. At nine I went to bed. In the morning I was still sick and realized how sad was my error in undressing for bed. I resolved to dress the night before next time, so I could get out of the room and into the air without unpleasant experiences. On deck I felt weak and absolutely devoid of purpose, ambition, sense of humor or—(ask some one who knows); I think I was pretty good to get to the elevator, where the dear, "bally" little English lad ran me to deck B and helped me to the air. The officers who pace up and down are kindly, sociable and all so funny. All day I dozed on deck—too sick to move. A storm came up late in the evening. We fixed our chairs on the windy side, dressed warm and dry and took it. The steward brought us buttered toast and hot milk, which did taste good. With the wind and rain a warm wave came, and on the warm wave "sea legs" as sure as could be. I began to feel better.

The service and luxury are even more wonderful than the pictures in the booklets. The First Class restaurant is like a palace. But it is not without its motion. You cannot get away from motion. This whole thing so far seems like a dream, so wonderful, so unreal—a moving fairyland.

Yesterday was a perfect day from start to finish. Our rate of travel is like this—447 miles the first day, 556 the second, 588 the third. The English tea and soup are delightful. I am learning to turn to the left, and to talk about "tuppence," to ride up on the "lift," and to sip my tea. Oh, yes, I met the man who said this was the quietest voyage he ever had, also the one who had done it twenty-seven times before.

The day we landed the sea was calm, the sun shone and it was warm. We had sighted land soon after breakfast. One of the Englishmen at our table was very good to me. He told me what islands we were coming to and let me spy out with his glasses. Ships and fishing fleets came and passed us. Two college girls, sight-seeing alone, asked if they might join us. We "tipped" our stewards, bought our tickets from Cherbourg to Paris, packed our bags and were ready to go.

The first view of France! Oh, could I describe it! A rolling green rising out of the sea, the sections evenly laid off with hedge-rows, quaint, brown villages and the most perfect blue sky I ever saw! The harbor is beautiful. It is an old naval centre. The fortress runs out one side, far into the sea. We were piloted into the harbor between fortresses. Then we stopped and little boats chugged up to our side, and hours passed in unloading mail and baggage. Then a small boat came for the Cherbourg passengers and we came away from the great mother-ship and bumped the clean dock of Cherbourg.

We passed the customs very easily. A special train was waiting to take us to Paris. A real, honest, old, Rhine-like castle looked down on quaint old Cherbourg. As the train gathered speed and we passed from houses into the open country, we saw myrtle and mistletoe, cows, little goats, gardens, green grass, women washing in the creek, all so new, so French.

At twelve o'clock (midnight) we arrived in Paris, hustled into a taxi, with a pile of suitcases to the front; a toot of the little Hallowe'en auto horn, a great jerk forward, skinning through a narrow alley, brushing people, dodging six other careless auto drivers, over the cobbles we plunged, gasping to see the traffic hurled in every direction. A slide around a street corner, a scraping the curb, and we stopped as suddenly as we had started. A deep breath seemed necessary to self-composure. We roused the night man at the Britannique. Only one empty room! Across the street we went to the Victoria. They had two rooms on the fourth floor. So we climbed (no elevators).

Next morning we all went to the Britannique for breakfast—French breakfast—bread and sweet, unsalted butter, and chicory in our coffee. We went to the Louvre and saw everything. Bought my first picture. Went over to the beautiful Madeleine, went inside and "took it in." Then took a bus to the Eiffel Tower. From the top we looked back on Paris—white buildings, white side-walks, white streets, white statues, squares of green grass and fountains playing every where. "Paris is a lady's town, with flowers in her hair," as Dr. VanDyke says.

Then we visited the Grand Hotel—the Bellevue of Paris—and did the grand old Notre Dame. This was Paris! Was it possible that my eyes should see these things? Was it only a dream?

I cannot describe Versailles, but VanDyke was not more thrilled than I when he said, "I love the gardens of Versailles with flashing fountains filled." The gardens answered all the passionate dreams of my childhood,—the secret garden with walls all around, the fountains, the terraces, the water, smooth, green landscape with even trees. Napoleon seemed to ride out of the grove in my dreams. Josephine seemed to wander lonely, pining in the depth of the bower-garden. Proud Marie Louise paraded her wide hoops on the terrace above the fountains. If I had seen this with Hildegard when we were twelve years old, wouldn't we have been in ecstasy? Royalty, real royalty!

We sat on an old stone seat in the deep woods where princes had courted their brides, maybe. And the Palace was a palace! Tapestry, marble, frescoes, gold and silver, the ball-room, the indescribable winding staircase! But they did not seem to speak of home-life. I thought of Queen Louise of Prussia who suffered from all this.

SQUARE DAYS.

There is a certain freedom about a public square. On entering such a precinct one steps away from the confining alleys of private affairs. Involuntarily one draws a deep breath and proceeds to take a rightful place in the public sun.

So it was on a warm mid-summer day when I indulged extravagantly in an extra early edition of an evening paper, entered Independence Square to find many there before me. Nevertheless, there was a place waiting on the end of a well-taxed bench. There I sat down, spread the newspaper to full width in a completely absorbed pose. It is in such a position that one can absorb the most entertaining histories, be regaled with tremendous tragedies, or observe the face of human nature with the maximum privacy. It is an old trick and there is none more repaying.

My next neighbor, contiguous on the left, was beyond doubt a printer. His shirt was open at the throat, his arms were bare to the elbows where their modesty led them into the rather questionable retreat of abbreviated sleeves. On the gentleman's hands was the tell-tale ink. Obviously a pressman fresh from a "make-ready."

Looking surreptitiously around the edge of my paper I beheld on the opposite bench a Yiddish woman and her daughter sunning their lives as well as their persons in public. They reminded me of the observations of an English visitor who remarked that the first characteristic of our country which struck her was the large number of Jews. I explained that religious freedom was not the only motive that brought Quakers to Pennsylvania but also Hebrews to Philadelphia. This freedom had caused the rapid growth and prosperity of the city. When making this explanation I was ashamed of my own ignorance of the customs, manners and language of this interesting people. Within easy ear-shot was an informing Yiddish conversation. Although I understood not a word, I can testify that these two, instead of washing their dirty linen in public, spread a very respectable counterpane on the park bench. Their faces reflected the Yiddish legend of domestic felicity.

At this juncture my reading was seriously interrupted. Two boot shiners came tumbling down the row, distracting every one as they solicited trade. Boot blacking is a form of smuggling business when carried on in Independence Square. Just why I know not. No place in the whole city clamors more loudly for the coveted "private initiative" of which we hear so much in business. But I suppose there is a strong sense in the minds of the police, and by the same token in the head of the City Government that prohibits private enterprise from making gain at the public's expense. At all events, the young men got to work with one eye on the job and another on the cop. Alas, I was scheduled for a hasty shine, for the villain of the plot came sauntering in at the other end of the stage. Nevertheless, I extracted from my benefactors a thorough polish and the fullest snapping of the cloth that their trade permits. The trafficking in shines and the eluding of the guardians of law is a sort of game amongst these wipers. They chattered like monkeys with glee and excitement when they spied the enemy, vieing with each other to see who could escape detection longest and incidentally how great a tip they could induce from the wearer of the russets and the reader of the great concealing newspaper.

My next neighbor was a sad Italian man. (Please understand that the printer went back to his press, and that his place was instantly taken by a successor.) An early edition of an evening paper is seldom more than a rehash, so bored by print I took to conversation. The warm sunshine served not only as a convenient entering wedge to a dialogue, but had evidently thawed my friend into talk. After asking him whether he had lived in Philadelphia for a long time, he naturally asked me how long I had lived in America. I told him the truth, that I was twenty-nine years old and had lived in America twenty-six years and seven months.

"Then you come over to this country when you were very young."

"Yes, very young," I admitted, "I was born here!" An expression of bewilderment came into my friend's face.

"How is that? You are twenty-nine and in America twenty-six years?"

His Latin wit was quick to catch the point that the two odd years had been spent abroad. I was sorry that my sojourn abroad had not led me to Italy, the country of his childhood. My citizenship established, the nationality of my father was immediately inquired into. Imagine my friend's surprise to learn that not only had my father been born in Philadelphia, but his father's father. I was not quiet sure about my father's father's father, so I naturally hesitated.

"And did this remote ancestor come from England?"

"No," I laughed, "from New Jersey!" If I had said from Camden my remark would have been instantly understood, but I said from Burlington. As a result my origin was completely clouded in mystery.

Before we parted I learned much about the city of my birth. My friend was a man with family, a wife, two girls and a boy. He was also rich in relatives with whom his women had run amuck for some delicate reason that he did not make entirely clear. At all events an innocent conversation had developed into a dispute; the dispute into a quarrel and the quarrel into a raid by the Black Hand, evidently made up of relatives and friends. He did not appear to begrudge the loss of fifty dollars cash that disappeared at the time of the "house-warming," but he was excessively provoked with the forcing of a very precious trunk wrought of Italian iron which contained linen belonging to his oldest daughter. The damage to the trunk and the loss of the linen grieved him sorely.

I was uncertain what remedy to suggest. Should not the police investigate this man's damages? A representative of this profession stood in the distance gazing fixedly through two feet of solid masonry which housed the faithfully preserved Liberty Bell. When I suggested the police I was informed that a "cop" would be as welcome in this domestic whirlpool as a fly in cheese. In Philadelphia, where my informant lived, such troubles were continually arising. He hastened to impress upon me that the Society of the Black Hand although it committed occasional indiscretions, was after all a very useful and helpful society. It has a definitely fraternal and beneficial character.

My time was up and my paper had long since been exhausted. I left it on the bench for my successor to read, feeling that the two cents invested therein had been immensely profitable.

BOOK REVIEW.

A. S. M. Hutchinson's latest book, "This Freedom" (Little, Brown & Co.), has stirred up a lively interest and discussion which is as great, if not greater, than that caused by his last year's book, "If Winter Comes." The basic problem of his new book is—can a woman do two things at once—can she make a real home for her husband and children and at the same time be a successful business woman, going daily to her office?

Rosalie, the youngest in an English vicarage family, has plenty of time to watch her elders and it does not take her long to see that her mother and sisters revolve around her father and brothers in a daily grind of waiting on them and satisfying their caprices, while the men do all the splendid, wonderful things that are worth while.

So the child Rosalie grows into womanhood, each year strengthening her determination to be independent and to do great things, like a man. It is through her life, after she leaves the vicarage, and later, through the lives of her children, that Hutchinson brings out his strongest points pro and con.

The book as a whole is the following out of mental processes, especially those of Rosalie, rather than the unfolding of a plot. The actions and thoughts of the characters are extreme, but because of that, the reader is able to see Hutchinson's point of view more clearly. He has certainly presented the reading public with a vividly written story and whether they agree with him or not, as to the final outcome, they are, at least, made to think.

HENRY BELL, 1838-1922.

In the recent passing on of Henry Bell, Irish Friends have lost a valued member. His ancestors on both sides were Quakers from earliest times. The son of William and Rebecca Jane Bell (née Haydock), he was born in Belfast in 1838, educated at Lisburn School, apprenticed to his uncle in Belfast

"WATSON'S ANNALS."*

As one glances through the pages devoted by modern magazines to the reviewing of books and literature of all kinds, it is rather interesting to note that among so many not a single paragraph is allotted to the reviewing of old favorites. And after all is said and done, why waste space on a chance "best seller" that might so much better be taken up by renewing one's acquaintance with some long forgotten friend? With this prelude as my excuse I therefore beg to introduce John F. Watson's "Annals of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania in the Olden Time, Being a Collection of Memoirs, Anecdotes, and Incidents of the City and Its Inhabitants."

Printed in 1857, this fascinating work, to quote its author, "is an effort to rescue from the ebbing tide of oblivion all those fugitive memorials of unpublished facts and observations, or reminiscences and traditions, which could best illustrate the domestic history of our former days."

In three fat volumes illustrated by quaint woodcuts and quaint drawings, the reader will find much to interest him and he is hard to suit, indeed, who turns away unimpressed from this treasure house of ancient lore. Glance over the contents of Book One which concerns itself chiefly with the city of Philadelphia. Fragments of primitive history, the Penn family and facts concerning them, landings at Chester and Philadelphia with drawings of the same—the "Penny Pot House"—the river front and its caves, and then on through the years of change with descriptions of many notable houses, some of which are still standing.

Book II takes up the outlying country, that is, the separate settlements of Germantown, Frankford, Byberry, Gwynedd, Chester, etc., with their individual histories and especial facts concerning them.

Book III is composed of additional facts, apparently unknown to Watson, and compiled later from clippings, notes and corrections collected by Samuel Hazard and published in his "Annals of Pennsylvania," and "Colonial Records" and "Archives." In this volume one reads of the "Blue Anchor Tavern," built in 1691 at the juncture of Dock Creek and the Delaware and said to be the landing place of William Penn, of "Crazy Nora," one-time inmate of the Friends' Almshouse, of Kelpius, the mystic of the Wissahickon, of the famous Meschianza, and the "State in Schuylkill" Fishing Club. Indeed, there is no end to the treasures that lie buried here, and therefore, gentle reader, I beg of you, if you can not already count John Watson as your close friend, make haste to do so, you will lose nothing by the acquaintanceship.

NOTES.

THE Young Friends' Committee will miss the loyal help of Edith Darnell in the office, but we know that her interest will only be transferred to committee work, and that we can still count on her counsel and support.

We welcome at her desk, Elsa H. Silber, who comes to us from Germany, to which country her family returned from England during the war. She is better known to us by her valuable work in the child feeding in Essen.

THE Young Friends' Executive Committee plans to hold its first meeting at Westtown over the week-end of Tenth Month 14th and 15th.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

and removed later with his parents to Cork. In 1863 he married Anna Jane Davis and settled in Waterford where he opened a business, being respected by employees and customers.

He often referred to the tender visitations of God's love which he had experienced from the time he was quite a lad; and as a young man he felt a call to the ministry, attending Quarterly and Yearly Meetings regularly. For many years he was Clerk to his own Monthly Meeting, and served on numerous appointments. Dignified, yet humble and unobtrusive, his quiet influence extended to all with whom he came in contact; the word in season to one here and another there is still bearing fruit in changed lives and hearts, softened by his kindly words and still kinder deeds.

In early married life, Henry and Anna Jane Bell unitedly felt called to a fuller dedication to the Master whom they earnestly desired to serve, and became willing to take up the cross and follow in whatever path was required of them. Their home became a spiritual center where many were refreshed and comforted and where hospitality was extended to Friends and others from far and near. They were blessed with four sons and seven daughters, of whom two sons and five daughters survive them.

In 1911, Henry Bell with his wife, and a son and daughter visited the States to attend Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. This opportunity of renewing the fellowship of former friends and of making the acquaintance of others was a joy to them, of which they often spoke.

In 1913 they celebrated their golden wedding—their children and grandchildren gathering round them. Three years later his beloved wife passed to higher service. She had great ability and sound judgment and was a true helpmeet. This bereavement was a very deep sorrow, and it almost seemed as though he could not long survive, but a change of residence and fresh interests with time gradually softened the blow which had fallen so heavily upon him and his family.

Almost five years later he passed to rest, Sixth Month 4th, 1922, in his eighty-fourth year. A friend has written of him:—

"Gently and calmly, as stars gradually lose their light in the rising sun, he entered the eternal world. How real was that heavenly home to him in the latter years of his beautiful life! How sure was he of the nearness of Christ and his saints in light! And now he is there where so many of his loved ones were awaiting his arrival. I picture to myself his joy and theirs."

NEWS NOTES FROM JAPAN.

NINTH MONTH 14, 1922.

Every year brings its changes in Friends' Mission, and the past year seems to have brought an unusual number of them. As the new year of work opens, every one of us of the F. F. M. C., and many of our Japanese co-workers, look forward to it with a changed outlook and new interests. After the long vacation in the mountains or by the sea, some of us are returning to new work in a new place, some to a new home, and others to a new family group. And for those who moved or returned from furlough in the spring, this is the beginning of the first full year's work in the new place.

During the summer two of our number, Edith F. Sharpless and Margaret W. Rhoads, returned to America. Edith Newlin, after a hurried trip to China in Eighth Month with Margaret Rhoads (during which they visited Joseph E. and Edith Stratton Platt in Mukden) has moved from the Teachers' Residence in Tokyo to Edith Sharpless' house in Mito, where she is taking Edith Sharpless' place as supervisor of the dormitory for high school girls and of the kindergarten taught in the house by a trained Japanese kindergartner. She is also teaching Bible classes in Japanese. The Kameyamas, who moved to Mito last year for work in that meeting, are very helpful, Mrs. Kameyama acting as her Japanese teacher, and helping her to prepare her Bible lessons in that language. Edith Newlin writes that it seems strange to be talking no English except an occasional "Good Morning!" The Nicholsons have not yet returned to the house around the corner, and the Mito dormitory girls have not nearly as much English as the older girls of Friends' Girls' School in Tokyo.

Friends' Girls' School this year has lost two valuable workers in Edith Newlin and Margaret Rhoads; but we are glad to welcome in their place Margaret S. James, who is already hard at work with her classes in English and foreign sewing. Arriving in Japan on Eighth Month 20th, she had time for a brief holiday by Nokiri Lake and at Karuzawa before school began on Second-day of this week.

Alice L. Pearson since her marriage is no longer in charge of the Friends' Girls' School dormitory, but is teaching more classes in the school. Dr. Pearson seems to feel quite at home in Japan already. He is studying Japanese, interviewing workers for peace and international friendship, and being useful in various ways. The Pearsons spent their summer at Takayama in the little cottage which Alice Pearson and Edith Sharpless had built together.

Esther B. Rhoads has taken Alice Pearson's place as supervisor of the dormitory, and will also continue with her work in the Japanese Language School. The Language School is to open toward the end of the month in new quarters in the Akasaka Hospital. Plans are in progress for permanent quarters for the Language School in the new Tokyo Union Church building which is to be erected in the near future.

The buildings on the Tokyo compound at 30 Koun Cho are progressing. The new meeting-house already looks quite imposing, though the walls are as yet only of lath. The Institute nearby, made of the old meeting-house, is not so far along, but the carpenters are working on both. The kindergarten cannot open till the Institute is ready for it, although many parents have come already to enter their children, and our teachers are ready and waiting. We hope it will be finished by Christmas time. Rosamond Clark is looking forward to having an office in the Institute. The Girls' School addition is finished and in use, and the girls are very proud of their new rooms.

On the Dai Machi lot in Tokyo the lumber is accumulating for the Jones' residence, and the cellar is already built. Thomas E. Jones, during the spring and summer, dug the basement himself and helped in the cementing of it, thereby saving some 3,000 yen. Until their house is finished Thomas E. and Esther B. Jones and their two boys will continue to live with Gilbert and Minnie Bowles in their home on the Koun Cho compound. T. E. Jones has begun his teaching in Keio University, but Esther Jones and the children are still at Nojiri Lake where they have a little new cottage of their own.

Gilbert and Minnie Bowles are due to return from Nojiri Lake this week. The early part of their summer was full of building problems, conferences, and other matters, so that they did not get away from Tokyo till near the end of Seventh Month. After that Gilbert Bowles was called to Gotemba for a most interesting conference between groups of Chinese and Japanese Christians, the second of a series of such conferences. The first was held in Second Month in Hangchow, China, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin being one of the chief organizers.

Herbert and Madeline Nicholson with little Virginia are also returning to work this week. Getting back to Japan as they did in the spring, they had time to get settled in the Bizen Machi house and in their new work before the summer vacation. The Mito group has quite changed since last fall, with new Japanese workers, and with Herbert and Madeline Nicholson and Edith Newlin resident there in the place of Thomas and Esther Jones and Edith Sharpless.

Gurney and Elizabeth Binford are not so fortunate as the Nicholsons in having a house ready for them. They are still at Karuzawa and are trying to find in Shimozuma some place to live. It is pioneering all over again.

We are glad to have the Binfords and Nicholsons back with us. Even though we may live and work in localities far from each other, yet each member adds strength to the group as a whole and makes it more effective in our great task of developing Christian ideals and Christian lives in our part of Japan.

EDITH F. SHARPLESS is studying at the Haverford Graduate School. She will be glad at any time to meet with Friends in the interest of the Japan work. Appointments should be made for her through the General Secretary. J. C. C.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL NOTES.

School opened on the eighteenth of Ninth Month with all the classes comfortably filled. The Senior Class is larger than usual and consists of thirty-three members.

Of the graduates and post-graduates of last year's class, which was unusually small, one each has entered Haverford, Swarthmore, Mt. Holyoke, Syracuse and Wheaton. Two each have gone to Goucher and the University of Pennsylvania, while three have entered Miss Illman's School for Kindergartners.

Our staff of teachers is the same as last year, except that Mary E. M. White of Guilford College is now teaching the Third Year Class in the Elementary School.

Lucile Hiatt of the French Department, and Anne Balderston, of the Art Department, spent the summer in study abroad. The latter was given leave of absence for a few weeks this fall to complete some work in Spain. Several teachers took summer school courses in this country. Anna M. Garrett and Mary E. M. White were at Columbia University; Mary E. Williamson at the University of California; E. Mae Myers at Middlebury College; and Ethel M. Whitson at the University of Pennsylvania.

The addition to the building was not ready for occupancy at the beginning of school, but will be completed within a few weeks. The outside woodwork on the school buildings was painted during the summer and two hardwood floors laid in class-rooms and various minor improvements and repairs made.

It is a matter of keen gratification to all interested in the School that the triangular plot of ground between the Parkway, Sixteenth and Cherry Streets, is to be made into a small city park. The buildings are now being taken down rapidly for this purpose.

PENN CHARTER SCHOOL.

The William Penn Charter School began its two hundred and thirty-third year on Ninth Month 19th, with 560 boys in attendance, and much regret on the part of the Overseers and Staff that even more applications than last year had to be declined.

It is interesting to note that, in spite of the new requirements for promotion into the Senior Class, those who hope to receive diplomas next Sixth Month number exactly as many as the corresponding Senior Class of last year. Of the forty-nine boys who received diplomas then, six had planned to enter business and did so, one was awarded a diploma as of the previous class, after a Freshman year at college, four are pursuing post-graduate courses, eleven have entered colleges requiring C. E. E. B. examinations, twenty-seven have entered college by certificate, and two have been delayed by incomplete certificates. Of those admitted to certificate colleges, almost everyone took one or more College Board Examinations. It will thus be seen that the results of the academic year are very gratifying to the Overseers and the Staff of the School.

The Class of '07 at their meeting last year presented to the School $1000, the income of which is to be used for a prize based upon academic excellence and high character as manifested in co-operation towards the best things.

The Barge Freshman Mathematical Prize awarded at Yale last Sixth Month was received by John L. Biach, a graduate of the Penn Charter School.

There are but few changes in the Staff.

John W. Leydon, for eight years a valued teacher of Spanish and German, as well as one strongly interested in music, has left Penn Charter, with the good wishes of all, to take the Headmastership of the Park School in Baltimore. His place is taken by Francis W. Jacob, a graduate of Bowdoin College, and a grandnephew of the late Doctor Richard M. Jones.

In the place of Margaret B. Jameson, who was regrettably compelled to resign, on account of illness in her family, and who has given excellent service to Penn Charter for several years, Liberty McClelland has been appointed. She is a graduate of Wilson College, Chambersburg, a teacher of several years' experience, and has been a student at Columbia Summer School.

There is an additional teacher in the Junior School, O. V. Urffer, a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, who is studying English in the Graduate School of that institution.

Succeeding Michael Dorizas, who is traveling round the world, Samuel Scoville, Jr., will give a course of nature lectures. Inasmuch as Henry Lewis has been called to a position in the West, the Junior School Scripture will be taken charge of by Joseph H. Titus, a graduate of Harvard, and now a theological student in New York City.

The other teaching positions remain the same.

The officers of the Alumni Association have announced Sixth-day, Tenth Month 27th, as Alumni Day. The exercises will be just as last year, beginning with an outdoor reunion at Queen Lane, followed by Class Dinners, and an evening session at the School.

It is the aim of the School to get boys more and more in touch with the best elements of the outside world. The School Service Letter from Washington will be interpreted once a week, as last year, by Doctor Ottman of the History Department.

The School is subscribing for a considerable number of copies of the Inter-Weekly, which is the school number of the Independent, published in alternate weeks, and of which Walter S. Hinchman, an Overseer, and Richard M. Gummere, the Headmaster, are members of the Advisory Editorial Board.

An innovation has been allowed in the shape of a course which is being taken at the School of Industrial Art by a boy who intends to be an illustrator, and is counting for twenty-five per cent. of the work done at Penn Charter.

Athletic prospects are good, and the boys received with enthusiasm the official statement that a new locker building will be ready for them on the Queen Lane grounds by Ninth Month, 1923. Soccer and football prospects are encouraging, and it is felt that, with the likelihood of an unusually strong Senior Class, the school year should be not only a successful one, but what is still more important, a year of steady progress in mind, morals and manners.

R. M. GUMMERE.

THE HAPPIEST HEART.

Who drives the horses of the sun
Shall lord it but a day;
Better the lowly deed were done,
And kept the humble way.

The rust will find the sword of fame,
The dust will hide the crown;
Aye, none shall nail so high his name
Time will not tear it down.

The happiest heart that ever beat
Was in some quiet breast
That found the common daylight sweet
And left to Heaven the rest.

—JOHN VANCE CHENEY.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"THERE ARE TWO OF US."—"You'd better do as we want you to, or you will get into trouble," said the leader of a group of rather rough-looking boys to a smaller boy who stood pale and trembling before them. Through their leader they seemed to be demanding something of him.

"I can't do it," he said, his voice trembling a little, as he spoke, but his lips drawn firm, and his eyes steady and unwavering.

"What's the reason you can't? You will have to, I tell you. We are going to make you do it, whether you want to or not. We are all of us against you alone, and how are you going to help yourself?"

The boy who was beset with such overwhelming odds as this was silent for a moment, and then he looked the other in the eye, and said:

"I can't do it; it's wrong, it's mean, and I can't do a mean thing. I am not as much alone as you think I am, either. There are two of us, and the other one has always been more than a match for all that have come against him."

"Two of you," sneered the other boy, "and where's your partner, I'd like to know? Why doesn't he show up? He's a pretty fellow to leave you in the lurch. Much help you'll get from him! I guess you'll be used up before he comes."

"No, I shall not," answered the other boy, quietly; "for he is here now. It is just as I told you; for there are two of us, and the other one is—God."

The leader of the rough boys started back in amazement. He had not expected such an answer as this. He looked for a moment into the determined face of the little fellow before him, and then casting a sheepish glance at his companions around him, he said:

"Come on, fellows; let him alone. There is no use fooling with such a chap as that."

And away they went, leaving the younger boy triumphant.

—Wellspring.

THE HAPPIEST LITTLE BOY.—"Guess who was the happiest child I saw to-day," asked papa, taking his own two little boys on his knees.

"Oh, who, papa?"

"But you must guess."

"Well," said Jim, slowly, "I guess it was a very wick little boy, wif lots and lots of tandy and cakes."

"No," said papa; "he wasn't rich, he had no candy and no cakes. What do you guess, Joe?"

"I guess he was a pretty big boy," said Joe, "who wasn't always wishing he was not such a little boy; and I guess he was riding a big, high bicycle."

"No," said papa; "he wasn't big, and of course he wasn't riding a bicycle. You have lost your guesses; so I'll have to tell you. There was a flock of sheep crossing the city to-day; and they must have come a long way, so dusty, and tired, and thirsty they were. The drover took them up, bleating and lolling out their tongues, to the great pump in Hamilton Court to water them; but one poor old ewe was too tired to get to the trough, and fell down on the hot, dusty stones.

Then I saw my little man, ragged and dirty and tousled, spring out from the crowd of urchins who were watching the drove, fill his old leaky hat, which must have belonged to his grandfather, and carry it, one, two, three, oh, as many as six times, to the poor, suffering animal, until the creature was able to get up and go on with the rest."

"Did the sheep say, 'I thank you, papa?'" asked Jim, gravely.

"I didn't hear it," answered papa; "but the little boy's face was shining like the sun, and I'm sure he knows what a blessed thing it is to help what needs helping."—Christian Observer.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL REPORT

OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR PROMOTING COLLEGE EDUCATION OF WOMEN, 1922.

Nine young women received scholarships from this Association for the college year 1921-22. One of these grants was for $150, two for $200 and seven for $250 each. One young woman will graduate in Sixth Month. Another will not require a scholarship. This leaves seven renewals which have been requested for the year 1922-23. There is one perpetual scholarship of $200, known as the Eliza Earle Memorial Scholarship.

Our regular contributions will not do more than provide for these girls. Hence four new applicants have been informed that unless we can secure more funds, they cannot expect aid. A greater number of girls are asking for these scholarships each year. The small sum is enough to give them courage to start on a college career. The additional funds are secured by sacrifices on the part of the family, by loans, and by remunerative work in college. Sometimes a college scholarship helps out. The cost of a college education is at least twice as great as it was when this Association started twenty years ago.

A summary of the Treasurer's Report is as follows:—
Amount contributed for college year, 1921-22 ..... $1,907.92
Contributions as result of special appeals, First Month, 1922 ..... 260.00
$2,167.92

Payment of Scholarships for 1921-22 ..... $2,050.00
Postage, typewriting for special appeal ..... 4.75
$2,054.25

Balance Third Month 23, 1922 ..... $ 113.67

The fact that the funds for the required scholarships had heretofore been collected with comparative ease made us over-sanguine a year ago. This accounts for the necessity which arose last winter to make a special appeal. We hope there will be continued and increased support of this valuable work.

During the twenty years of its existence 50 girls have been able to secure a college education. Eight of these are still in college. Of the other forty-one (one has died) practically all are outstanding members of our religious society. In reconstruction and relief abroad, in foreign lands as missionaries, in our schools and in community work, these daughters of our Association have taken and are still taking able and conspicuous positions. One is a minister in our Society, another an assistant professor in a great university. Eighteen are married, several others are engaged to be married. If these women should be withdrawn suddenly from the work of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting at home and abroad, there would be a startling sag in various moral and spiritual efforts.

Yet each one assured our Association that without its scholarship aid she could not look forward to a college education.

A NEWSPAPER CLIPPING.

Just before I started for Matveevskaya Volost this morning I read another of those clippings from an American paper. It told of a Russian harvest of a billion and a-half bushels. It spoke of a grain tax worth several hundred million gold roubles. It painted the rosier pictures of Russia I have seen since the Soviets began to command the respect and the business dealings of the Western capitalist governments.

I felt quite proud of Russia as the motor-cycle hammered along over the hard, black road running south toward the Cossack lands. The fields were green from the late—the too late—rains, the sun was performing miracles with the hillsides, and the clouds over them. August morning without a black crow on the horizon—I felt peaceful, self-satisfied, official, prosperous. I felt so because, for the moment, I was being tricked into the illusion that Russia was rich and affluent and flowing with milk and honey.

Then I rode into Matveevskaya and engaged the Volost Mutual Aid Committee in conversation. And I learned from these serious, honest peasant committee-men certain facts. I learned:

That dozens of families are preparing to leave the volost—bound for Tashkent or any place where there is the least rumor of a harvest—because they know they have not a fraction of the bread they need to feed themselves over the winter.

That the people who survived last winter were able to do so because they had household goods and so forth to sell, but this winter they have nothing that could be called a reserve.

That dozens of families in Matveevskaya Village, as well as in the poorer village, Medvedka, where the horse statistics read "1921—120; 1922—0," possess altogether but a few pounds of grain with which to live eleven months! These few pounds were acquired by painfully gleaming kernels from the fields of the peasants in other and slightly more fruitful volosts.

That the recent rains have not only delayed the threshing of the grain, thus preventing the peasant who had any from realizing his riches earlier, but they have caused much of the grain to mould in the field and in the stack. . . . (It will be remembered that the big sheds—rigas—where the unthreshed grain is ordinarily stacked—were unroofed and unthatched by the hungry stock and people last winter).

That the few people who had any grain for seeding were reluctant to plow for it because they are not sure that they will receive pyoks from the Quakers. If they sow their rye they will need Quaker flour for their bread pots next month or the next. If they save their rye to eat they might be able to get along until Christmas.

Having learned these facts I told the committee to advise the peasants to sow all for which they could prepare the soil, to sow for the harvest of 1923 when the Quakers may have gone, to sow for the time when they can rely on self-help and not on charity. Having given this advice, which in a sense amounted to a promise involving life and death and thousands of bushels of flour, I rode out of Matveevskaya, leaving behind me for a few yards a trail of bits of newspaper clipping.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORK IN POLAND.

With the completion of its summer and fall program of agricultural reconstruction, the Friends' Unit in Poland had expected to terminate its work. A cablegram just received, however, announces a desire on the part of the field headquarters to continue certain work through the winter. The plan is to concentrate upon hauling timber for housing reconstruction; with the provision of home-industry work for refugee women as a secondary activity. This program would be carried out in districts surrounding a new center to be established in the Vilna section of the devastated territory which served as a battle-ground between Germany and Russia.

A letter from Florence M. Barrow, chief of the Polish Mission, describes conditions in this district. "There is a long line of battle-front," she writes, "which runs from north to south over an area about twenty miles in width and which is covered thickly with barbed wire, trenches and gun emplacements. This constitutes a kind of long island of great need in a land of plenty. The country round is well cultivated and there are beautiful lakes and woods. The refugees for the most part returned two years ago and have lived ever since in the German dugouts or trenches which are now rapidly collapsing. Most refugees have cultivated some ground among the barbed wire and trenches, sometimes only with a spade. Undoubtedly the need for agricultural help is great but an army is needed first of all to clear up the barbed wire, and in places even the skeletons, and to fill up the trenches before anything much can be done.

"At the request of the Vilna Committee a plowing column has been sent to Smorgonie in the southern part to give a practical demonstration of the Mission's methods of working. Smorgonie itself was a town of 32,000 inhabitants before the war, with good brick houses and manufactories and tanneries. It was totally destroyed and now 4,000 people are living in wretched cellars and dugouts. The housing conditions are really terrible and the most hopeful suggestions appeared to be for the town to obtain a loan for rebuilding. In that neighborhood there is a good deal of land unplowed and not hopelessly entangled with wire, and we hope to make some further investigations. Personally, I feel that except for Smorgonie it is hardly a district in which the kind of help we could offer would really be very effective.

"We are, however, faced with a great need. It is probable that by continuing during the winter even in one district, two hauling columns could render possible the building of hundreds of houses. From Eighth Month 15th to Ninth Month 16th, two small columns hauled enough for fifty-one houses. When it is realized that without our help no other help would be forthcoming the responsibility is great. The timber is there and it is only the hauling that is needed.

"So, too, with a continuation of the industries as a means of providing food, there are many refugees who have returned since the spring who will have no food grown on their own land till next harvest, and have no funds to carry them over the winter."

An appropriation of $80,000 is requested by the field headquarters for the support of the proposed continuation program. Of this amount, $45,000 would be expected from America, while the remainder is being asked from the English Friends' committee. The American Friends' Service Committee has at present practically no funds on hand for Poland, and sees no prospect of being able to raise any. The possibility of the Committee's being able to support a continuance of the work, therefore, seems slight. Such a course can probably be undertaken only in case interested donors are able in the immediate future to contribute sufficiently large amounts to insure the receipt of the sum requested.

All interested are requested to communicate at once with the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. The appropriation requested is comparatively small, and though the unit which would remain in Poland would consist of a correspondingly reduced group of workers, it could do great good during the coming winter.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Tenth Month 7, 1922—129 boxes and packages received; 13 anonymous.

Contributions received during week ending Tenth Month 9, 1922—$10,754.18.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

THE SHELTER.—On the seventh The Shelter Managers invited their many Friends from far and near to come to Cheyne as their guests in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of this Institution.

They had planned an out-of-doors program, but half an hour before the time fixed upon for the entertainment the gathering clouds made evident that they had a different schedule. With wonderful dispatch the whole affair was shifted to the Library Hall on the adjoining grounds of the Cheyne Normal School, this was the more difficult because a main feature of the exercises was a pageant in which the Normal girls and the little children of the Shelter were the sole performers, having rehearsed for an outside exhibit.

The entertainment was an entertainment in very truth, and reflected much credit on Evangeline Hall, senior teacher at the Normal School, whose pleasure it had been to arrange the pageant in detail.

Other features of the program were a poem by Leslie P. Hill, appropriate to the occasion. An appreciation rendered by old scholars, including a beautiful letter from a former Shelter girl now living in Liverpool, England, a Historical Sketch given by Elizabeth S. Pennell, which we hope to publish soon in THE FRIEND, and the rendering of Negro melodies by the Cheyne students; the exercises closed with a brief and stimulating address by Kelly Miller, Dean of Howard University, Washington, D. C. He stated that the Shelter was the first organization of its kind to be planted on American soil.

THE Germantown Meeting is making changes to the Committee Rooms adjoining the Meeting House. Heretofore there have been a kitchen and two rooms, one much larger than the other, but adjoining and so arranged that by the opening of sliding doors they could to a large extent be used as one room at the time of lectures. The changes contemplate a slight enlargement of the smaller room, and a new and larger kitchen. An old-fashioned Colonial fire-place, similar to the one of the famous Chew House, in Germantown, will be placed at the end of the smaller room. Simple but homelike furnishing will be introduced and the rooms will be made homelike and attractive for those wishing to use them, not only for lectures and tea meetings, and larger gatherings, but also for smaller groups.

FRANCIS R. BACON, at a recent meeting of the A. F. S. C., stated that during the whole two and one-half year period of our German relief work we fed three million children and distributed 3,545 carloads of food. Practically one-half of the area of Germany was touched by our work. As has been stated heretofore, children's relief in that country is now being handled by German organizations themselves in accordance with plans developed by the Friends' Mission.

HELEN ESTHER HAWKINS, of Wilmington College, Ohio, has been appointed successor to Clarence E. Pickett as Secretary of Young Friends' Activities of the Five Years' Meeting. She attended the Haverford Graduate School last year.

ACCORDING to the provisions of the will of the late Delavan Smith, publisher of The Indianapolis News, Earlham College will receive a bequest of approximately $12,000, the amount to be added to the permanent endowment fund of the College. The deceased publisher has contributed to Earlham enterprises two or three times in the past.

An English General, who has shown more of the peace-making spirit than the average civilian, has said Christians were studying how to manufacture poison gas. There was no escape from them and their preparations, so long as this world remained the old Vanity Fair of the Pilgrim's Progress, and so long as the money changers in the Temple of Peace thought more of mandates than of mankind. He pleaded with the people to turn the unrivalled fighting spirit they had inherited from their ancestors into a plan of campaign to remove the causes of war. Through politics let them make it clear that they were in favor of forgiveness of debts so that we ourselves might win forgiveness, if not from the United States, at least from the Kingdom of Heaven. Until the other day this wondrous Empire had never put itself in the pitiful position of saying it would be generous if others made it worth while. Let them end the feud. The boys they were commemorating did not die for reparations; nor for Mesopotamia; nor even for Jerusalem. They had hoped to kill war, and it was "up to" their successors, the men of the present, to take practical steps to make those peace dreams come true.

THE Disciples' church at Junction City, Kentucky, says The Christian Century, has publicly offered to sell out its property and join with any other congregation of Christians in the city on any basis which includes only those things which all Protestants accept as true, and which are also Scriptural. There are seven churches in a town of 600 people, three colored and four white. The minister has tendered a provisional resignation to be accepted in case the proposal of this church is accepted by any other in the town.

CHRIST'S GREATEST MONUMENT.

Christ has set up many monuments in the world to witness to His past appearance in the flesh and to His present working in the hearts of men by His Spirit. We might mention the Christian Church, and our Christian civilization. But the greatest of all is the Christian character. Our Lord has created a new type of humanity of which He is the Archetype. The Christian character is not patterned on anything that went before, however noble. The Christian type contains strands of moral beauty absent from that approved by the ancient philosophers, the well-known teachers of ethics preceding Jesus. Neither did the Old Testament writings furnish the ideal. When James and John wished to imitate Elijah, and call down fire from heaven on the Samaritan villagers who would not receive the Master, He rebuked them, and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of;" that is, they were ignorant of the Christian spirit, the new attitude of mind introduced into the world by Him.

Where this new spirit expresses itself we meet with the marks of the disciples of Christ. And amidst their diversity, in this Spirit is found their bond of union. Now if it be true, that "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His," whatever else he may possess; it is also true, that if any man have the Spirit of Christ, he is one of His, whatever else he may lack. This Spirit is no respecter of persons, or of the artificial distinctions that keep men apart. Color lines, race differences, class and caste distinctions, are ignored in this new humanity.

But in order that we may understand the nature of the Christian spirit we are told what it is not. Three elements must be eliminated if we would express the new temper which our Master delights in.

(1) The element of slavery. "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear." The slave-spirit, whose service is one of compulsion, is displaced by the son-spirit, whose service is that of joyful surrender. The son is not driven by the crack of the whip. He is not all the time afraid in the consequences of a mistake. He knows he is in his Father's home; he has an assured place in his Father's bosom, and at his Father's table. That was the secret of the life of Jesus. The religion of the Jews was largely an upkeep of obligations, a joyless routine of formalities. In Jesus, bondage gave way to joyful intercourse with that radiantly beautiful Being whom He called "Abba, Father." And those who receive His Spirit follow Him in this.

(2) The element of worldliness. "We received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God." The world's horizon is limited by the apprehensions of the senses. It lives in time and space. It seeks pleasure, honor, possessions, ease. But the Christian is animated by another spirit. He looks at the things which are unseen and eternal. With an eternity behind him, an eternity before him, an infinity above him, he feels the throb of eternity within him, and the cry of infinity after the infinite in his being's secret depths. He can say to God with the Psalmist: "All my springs are in Thee!" He lives in a larger universe than that of the sense-bound materialist. Truly, eye has not seen, ear has not heard, and the heart has not conceived, the things which God has prepared for His lovers. But these things, says the Apostle, are "revealed to us by His Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." Thus amidst the discords of time we may carry about in our breast the melodies of eternity. We do not ignore or despise this world. We do not philosophize away its ills. But we no longer scramble after its prizes, nor grieve over its losses. Our true interests lie elsewhere.

(3) The element of cowardice. "God hath not given to us a spirit of fearfulness (or timidity); but of power and love, and of a sound mind (or discipline)." These words were addressed to Timothy, a Eurasian. Eurasians are naturally predisposed to timidity, and that was Timothy's besetting weakness. But he was told that he could become "strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." And truly the Spirit has often made weak men bold. They have been enabled to add to their faith courage. This proved to be the outstanding Pentecostal sign. The Spirit of Christ, and of Christianity, as reflected in the character of Christians, is no more a spirit of cowardice than a spirit of bondage, or of worldliness. It is a spirit of love, power and soundness of mind. Every man is a mystic in the measure in which he becomes aware of, and gives himself up to this Spirit. As another said:

"The practical mystic is of all men the man to be reckoned with, he is so human, and yet his strength is supernatural. Not transcendental, or sentimental, or fanatical, but quietly assured and wholly sane, keeping step with God's purposes, and with His saints, despising no man, bowing down to none, giving honor to whom honor is due, but ever keeping 'the fortress of his 'established soul' virgin for God."

Thus the Christian becomes Christ's man, and evidences the fact of Christ. Spite of the terrible corruptions of professing Christendom; amidst the strife of its parties; the clash of its controversies; the ambition of its rival sects; Christ maintains an apostolic succession. No section of His divided family can claim a monopoly of it. And the continued witness of these bearers of His Spirit and image guarantees a brighter day to come.

"The world is weary of new tricks of thought
That lead to nought;
Sick of quack remedies prescribed in vain
For mortal pain;
Yet still, above them all, One Figure stands,
With outstretched hands."

M. I. R.

OUR STATEMENT.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS AND READERS:—

The Contributors (Board of Management) desire gratefully to acknowledge the financial support which has made possible the continuous publication of THE FRIEND throughout an unusually difficult period.

For the fiscal year ended Sixth Month 30, 1922, the operating loss was $3246.32. Donations were received to the amount of $3753.50 from individual Friends and other sources, leaving a balance of $507.18.

For the past eight years, from 1915 to 1922, inclusive, the donations have exceeded the operating losses by $699.82, showing a generous recognition of the needs of the undertaking. We acknowledge also substantial gifts to the Endowment Fund.

According to the Budget for the current fiscal year ending Sixth Month 30, 1923, about $3800.00 over expected income will be required to meet expenses.

Religious journals devoted to denominational interests have at best only a limited circulation and for the most part they cannot be conducted without some financial deficit which in the case of THE FRIEND has been made good by voluntary contributions.

We feel that the incorporation of the Younger Friends in the management of the paper, so that they become in large degree responsible for ten numbers during the year, has proven a wise and helpful step.

It is a traditional feature of THE FRIEND that the Editors as well as others who carry the burden of the work do so at a very modest consideration, more as a matter of religious duty and service to the Society than of personal gain of advantage. This spirit should be cherished as one of our best possessions.

The work of the paper should go forward with a fresh impulse in voicing those principles of Christian faith and life which it is the part of the Religious Society of Friends to proclaim in the world, as a living member of the Church of Christ.

In this task, we shall continue to rely upon interested Friends for the necessary funds in the belief that their confidence and assistance will not be withheld from so worthy a cause.

The Contributors invite any constructive criticism, suggestion or counsel that may tend to maintain the integrity of the paper and fulfil its fundamental purpose.

LIMITATIONS IN AMUSEMENTS.

Some weeks ago a brief letter was addressed to a few of our subscribers asking that they express themselves in a short essay on some phase of the trite topic, "Limitations in Amusements." We have been gratified that so many responded and we have no word of complaint that some others felt that they had no message at this time.

None of the writers would claim that the papers settle the questions that often perplex us, but it is some satisfaction to find that others are seriously thinking along the lines that have been engaging us and that we are not entirely out of line in the procession.

We felt that the subject was too many-sided to be treated in short essays, and so our suggestion was that each writer confine himself to one narrow field; this has been done, and we believe as a result we have some worth-while thoughts for the rest to reflect upon.

The same opportunity is offered to others that these few have accepted, and we shall be glad to hear from any who feel they have a message for us.

It is but fair to state that the object in directing our attention to this particular line of thought at this time grows out of a Minute adopted last spring by one of our Quarterly Meetings, asking that the language of our Fifth Query might receive the thoughtful consideration of Friends. It is the desire of no one who cares for best things that the standard of living be lowered, but rather that the principle involved be placed on a positive rather than a negative platform and that our duty toward the right use of our richest inheritance receive the searching scrutiny that our Queries are designed to awaken. The language of the Fifth Query, as it now reads, is: "Are Friends careful to avoid and to discountenance all unnecessary handling and use of intoxicants? Do you avoid attendance at theatres, operas, dances and other harmful diversions, and are you careful to keep in true simplicity at the times of marriages, burials and on all other occasions?" [Eos.]

PROBABLY few of us realize how great the influence of the Queries has been on the Society of Friends. Most of us feel that with the undoubted changes which have come in mental outlook, especially in our attitude toward the training of children, a revision of some of the Queries is advisable. All of us earnestly desire that no change shall be made except under the same guidance from our Heavenly Father as that which actuated those who framed the Queries originally, and that the alterations shall stimulate an increase of spiritual life among us.

We all believe that tired minds and fatigued bodies need recreations. The physical part of us does not antagonize the spiritual. But we cannot really recreate unless our souls are refreshed as well as our bodies and our minds.

Dance parties in hot rooms, lasting into the small hours, movies and theatres where the influences are questionable, entertainments at the expense of actors who are peculiarly open to temptations and dissipations, all of these cannot claim to foster spiritual life.

The years in which conduct was guided and often controlled by tradition and authority are past and we want it to be so, but in place of that, it is imperative, if the human race is to grow in its understanding of spiritual values, that each of us should give consecrated thought to our amusements as well as to our sober duties. Because we are more individually responsible for our own conduct than those who preceded us, we certainly are more than ever obliged to seek after true values and wise discriminations.

We should welcome any help which we can make our own and both seek and give thanks for any influence which our Father sends to strengthen our higher life.

Can we ask ourselves honestly day by day whether our amusements and recreations build up healthier bodies, stronger minds and sweeter, purer spirits?

Jesus Christ recreated with His friends. He encouraged a cheerful life. But always for Him and the same is true for us, He felt it laid upon Him to be about His Father's business.

QUERIES—POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE.

We sometimes wonder how long it will take the world to wake up to the fact that mere negatives and prohibitions are not conducive to the highest spiritual development. In youthful days—and it is not improbable that the motive lingers to a certain degree in years of greater maturity—the suggestion that a certain book was harmful or unfit for us to read tended somehow to increase its attractiveness. Likewise is it not possible that the continual mention of theatres, operas and dances as things to avoid, may tend to impart to them an unnatural attractiveness, may make their attendance a bit more adventurous and alluring? There are salesmen who still employ competitive selling methods in their solicitation. But certain it is that the more a salesman devotes attention to the positive merits of his own goods and the less he talks about the goods of his competitor, the more successful he is likely to be.

Are not the same principles equally applicable to the development of spiritual qualities? Telling people to stay away from theatres is not of itself going to make them much more spiritual even if they obey and remain away. Do we not need some greater, all-inclusive positive principle that will lead people to use their time rightly? Given that principle, we can allow attendance at theatres, operas and dances to take care of itself. Of one thing I think we can be certain. The youth of to-day are going to try these things for itself, query or no query. Our young people are going to make up their own minds upon the subject, and while they are in the process of so doing it may be questioned whether a series of queries as to their conduct is going to help matters much. It may keep our young people away from meeting.

On the other hand, if attention could be focused upon the possibilities of the proper employment of leisure time, the theatre, opera and dance question, if capable of solution at all, would be much more likely to be solved. Consider again the method of the successful salesman. He sells rather by suggestion than by prescribing some definite course to be followed. Why? Because everyone prefers to choose his own line of action rather than to follow directions. The salesman portrays possibilities, creates desires, shows how they can be realized. He leaves the final decision to the buyer. The more the buyer can feel that the choice he is making is his own, the more likely, if he buys, is he to be a satisfied customer who will repeat.

This principle carried over into the spiritual realm means, as has been suggested, that those who have seen and experienced the better way will make that way so attractive that others will desire to walk in it. Other problems too are likely to be settled along with that of theatres, operas and dances. Card parties, golf or excessive use of the automobile on First-day, perhaps even the waste of time that is spent from the radio, all and many other things will be embraced in the larger principle.

Of course the mere changing of the wording of a query will not of itself accomplish much. The change needs to be accompanied by a larger vision on the part of the meeting of the possibilities of the life of the spirit. If the change of the words indicates a glimpsing of this larger vision, then results should begin to follow. The principle of attraction will win more followers than the principle of prohibition. Our meetings have a large part in this program. If they can be kept on a high spiritual plane, they cannot but affect daily conduct. In the long run we choose those things which appeal to us the most. A meeting radiant and buoyant with the spirit will outdo a multitude of queries of prohibition in influencing the choices people make in their daily lives.

I am glad therefore that attention is being given to the method exemplified in the Fifth Query. It indicates a stirring of life that is much more likely to be helpful to many of us than has the method of the past.

LEISURE HOURS.

There is much significance in our choice of what we do in our leisure hours. The selection of our recreation shows the trend of our thoughts; it indicates our attitude toward life; reveals our character, and is an expression of our personality. Dr. Samuel Johnson, with his usual perspicuity said, "No man is a hypocrite in his pleasures." In our periods of freedom, we quite naturally turn to those things which interest us most.

Sometimes it takes much experimenting before we discover just what we like to do best, what seems to us most worthwhile. But then that is an attainment—to know what you like and to know that you know. For it involves straight thinking, self-reliance and the courage of one's convictions.

Now the amusements and recreation which take up our leisure hours, as long as they are wholesome, are really quite necessary and desirable. As Cervantes wrote, "The bow cannot stand always bent, nor can human nature or human frailty subsist without some lawful recreation."

It is a difficult matter to be arbitrary and to dogmatize as to how another shall amuse himself as long as no real harm results. Some might think it a sheer waste of time to spend hours playing golf, not realizing the physical benefits and the mental relaxation the game affords. Perhaps the only restriction we would place upon amusements would be to avoid those which lessen one's self-respect, having in mind the saying of St. Augustine, "Love God enough and you can do as you please."

Our recreation should leave us refreshed in mind and body. We should be re-created. The reading of worth-while books and our social intercourse should broaden and deepen our lives—give us a better perspective.

And then our leisure should give us an opportunity to arise from the mere fact of living to a consideration of life itself, the wonder and mystery of it all. For we take our existence and life about us so much as a matter of course that we lose sight of the stupendous enigma in which we are involved.

Many have discovered that the deepest and most abiding inward pleasure comes from imparting pleasure to others. They use some of their leisure in planning the happiness and welfare of others. Therein lies a never-failing source of interest and inspiration. It is one of the durable satisfactions of life.

Robert Burton, in his curious book, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," concludes the volume with the admonition, "Be not solitary, be not idle." The advice is salutary, for anyone leading a busy, active life (the more diversified the interests the better) will have no trouble in filling happily his leisure hours.

CHARLES B. HESTON, JR.

"LIMITATION AND SELECTION OF AMUSEMENTS."

Consideration of the question of placing a limitation on amusements calls for a careful study of the subject from very many angles, including the determination as to which of our recreations come under this head, and a classification of these amusements as regards their relative harm or value to the individual, together with a careful reckoning of just how much relaxation of this nature we need in our daily lives.

In so far as it directly concerns the present older generations it seems to me that a satisfactory solution can only be reached through the quickening of the individual conscience first to a sense of the right proportioning of his or her life. We all need a certain amount of relaxation from our daily routine of work and problems of a serious nature, that come to us, a time to play, something to make us laugh and forget. The task of the individual is to determine the amount he or she needs.

Secondly, we must make a careful conscientious selection of our diversions. There are very few things in this world that are of themselves wrong or harmful. The abuse of many of them is what makes them dangerous to the individual, the nation and the Church. It is not a difficult problem to eliminate those amusements from our play hours that we know to be harmful and our watchwords should be "Selection" and "Moderation." The Church cannot herself successfully place definite limitations on amusements. Her task should be rather an effort to sensitize the individual conscience so that in the selection of recreations the choice will be those things which have at least a tendency to strengthen the bodies and improve the minds or the spiritual life, as well as to furnish relaxation.

Considered from the standpoint of children we realize that a very great deal can be accomplished through education in regulating the amount and improving the tone of the amusements in which they are to participate. There are wonderful opportunities along this line within our grasp. Concerned teachers and parents can teach children to choose for their amusements the recreations that are really worth-while by bringing them up to love nature, flowers, trees, grass and the sky, to love out-door sports and play them well, and enjoy music and reading.

Development of children's play hours along these lines will mean that these things will be the ones that appeal to them as they grow older and must choose more and more for themselves what they shall play at in their hours of relaxation. If a child learns to play out-door games well, those games become for him a source of amusement as well as a splendid opportunity for the development of his body. If he loves music and learns to play well, he is finding amusement in the development of that talent. If he learns to love books, he is entertained at the same time that he is developing his intellect.

There are amusements, such as moving pictures, the theatre and dancing that will always be with us as possibilities for relaxation. They confront children as well as the younger and older men and women of to-day. My concern as regards these in connection with children would be that parents teach them moderation in all things and that they conscientiously guide them in the selection of the diversions of this nature. This method has a strong appeal to me rather than too many don't's, and I believe that if this spirit of "careful selection" and "moderation" is developed in a child's life along with the love for books, music, and God's out-of-doors, the Church will have far less cause for concern regarding the over-indulgence in amusements which through abuse may come to be classed as harmful.

ARTHUR EMLEN BROWN.

If the word "sacred" has a two-fold application, designating both God Himself and the structure raised to His honor, how shall we not with propriety call the Church "holy," since it is made for the honor of God, sacred to God, of great value, and not constructed by mechanical art, nor embellished by the hand of an impostor, but by the will of God fashioned into a temple? For it is not now the place, but the assemblage of the elect, that I call the Church. The temple is better for the reception of the greatness of the dignity of God. For the living creature which is of high value is made sacred by that which is worth all, or rather which has no equivalent in virtue of the exceeding sanctity of the latter. Now this is the complete Christian who is of great value, who is honored by God, in whom God is enshrined. Here, too, we shall find the Divine likeness and the holy image in the righteous soul, when it is blessed in being purified and in performing blessed deeds.—

THE DISCOVERY OF SCHUYLKILL MEETING.

(FIRST-DAY, NINTH MONTH 24, 1922.)

The meeting was ended. Of the one hundred or more that had been together in worship, all but a small group had gone. Those left were chiefly of that number who had felt the call for this gathering into the presence of God,—those who represented the meeting and its neighborhood, and those who for the most part were entire strangers to the community. As hand grasped hand in the making of acquaintanceship we of the latter class learned that such names as Williams, Miller, Pennypacker, Brower, etc., were representative of the former, and so Schuylkill Meeting was discovered.

How peaceful the scene as viewed from the little meeting-house, on which and the little company before it, the afternoon sunshine fell, as if in parting blessing! Partially screened by the branches of the great oaks that dignified the extensive grounds lay a charming view of the valley below, on whose slopes the trees were beginning to change their robes of sombre green to the livery of autumn.

Alone we passed, for a moment, into the adjacent graveyard, whose iron entrance gate stood invitingly ajar, that we might perchance discover the names of some whose place of worship had been the o'ershadowing meeting-house. Of those whose mortality here found its last resting place a large part of the enclosure gave no record. For here, too, had once reigned supreme the quietist dictum that forbade memorial to the dead. In another part, however, its abolition allowed us the knowledge sought, where we found the family names of Jones, Matlack, Davis, Hayes, Walker, etc.

A century or more ago had passed since Enoch Walker gave these premises from his ample acreage to his co-religionists for a house of worship and burial-ground. The meeting thus established was subordinate to Radnor Monthly Meeting, and it is quite probable that a number of those settling here came over from the Welsh tract.

So much for history; what of the meeting that thus brought the Schuylkill house to our notice? First, the motion of its holding, directed by the Extension Committee of Concord Quarter, followed by the kindly response whereby Race Street and Arch Street Friends shook hands with each other and sat down to commune together without bar to Christian fellowship.

Thus for a while, in the sweet stillness of that beautiful autumn afternoon, the spirit of silent prayer stole in upon the assembly. But the presence of seven ministers of the Word boded ill to a prolonged continuance of silent waiting; and so ere long the initial message sounded in a clear note the fundamental principle of Quakerism—the in-dwelling light of Christ in the soul of man, given for his redemption, as presented by its great apostolus, Robert Barclay. To us of this day Christ is speaking, as of old, in order that "His joy may remain in us, and that our joy may be full." And so to the end of the meeting, message followed message, leading to a climax of thanksgiving humbly uttered in a few words by one of those visited. Then came a sense of that enfolding love of Christ, whereby doctrine that encases itself in formal creed is felt to melt away into that fellowship of the Gospel wherein the spiritually-minded are increasingly recognizing that true religion remains to be "a way of life." It begins in a change of heart, which leads to a desire for purity, and, finally, is satisfied only in that which saves from sin, even the life-giving power of Jesus exercised in all its functions for the sanctification of the believer in all the relations of life.

The close of the meeting was under a sweet and solemn sense of heavenly benediction. The true Christian life again was shaped for us in a beautiful parable tenderly quoted by one of the last speakers in substance as follows: A visitor to a little country church in Scotland noticed that the one to whom was delegated the sacred office of carrying from lip to lip the cup of the holy communion, was an aged rustic. Next day he chanced to see this same old man engaged in the laborious work of breaking stones upon the highway. The visitor, struck with the incongruity of the two lines of service, made mention of his surprise to the minister, who replied that there was no man in his congregation who by his devoted, blameless life was more fitted for the sacred office which had engaged him the day before.

Thus it seemed we had gathered for a while from the dusty highways of life into the quietude of the peace of God. We were about to return again to that portion of life's highway over which we were individually set to travel, and to mend and improve which by our toil for each passer-by was a duty, which if accepted may clothe us with official dignity on the Lord's day. For,

"The Holy Supper is kept indeed,
In whatso we share with another's need."

Thus even the "cup of cold water" in the hands of the giver becomes transformed to the "Holy Grail."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"CRAVAT MUN AL OUNIE!"—One afternoon at a meeting of the Women's Auxiliary of the Riverside Presbyterian Church of Jacksonville, Florida, a little girl, clasping a shabby but evidently much loved doll, came shyly into the circle of sewing women. She thought that if her beloved could only have a fresh crop of hair, a new dress, and, perhaps, a little something done to her complexion, she would then look nice enough to go into the big box with the other dolls who were to start next week on the long trip to Constantinople.

That dolly fell into sympathetic hands and soon became a smart sailor boy dolly, with a swagger 'kerchief around his neck.

The Sarkissian family, deportees, arrived at Constantinople from Erzerum. They were a fairly intact family for refugees; there were both mother and father, a two-year-old boy, a tiny baby and smiling, big-eyed, crippled Veronica. Veronica had a spirit whose radiance had survived not only the hardships of deportation, but all the discomforts of her twisted little body. She was like a sunbeam in the noisome refugee camp.

On her arrival, Veronica had possessed a battered native dolly, but that dolly had done so much visiting among all the tiny doll-less mothers of the camp that at last she had simply ceased to exist. In solitary moments Veronica mourned her lost "Nivart," but the camp never knew of her sorrow. It remained for a Near East Relief worker, who had been drawn by Veronica's radiant smile into a sympathetic intimacy with the child, to learn how much she missed her doll.

On the worker's second visit to the camp she sought Veronica. Veronica's greeting was the quick kiss on the hand, the hand then carried to her forehead, in true native form. The worker handed to her a bulky package. A gift formally bound with paper and string had never before been within the refugee child's experience. The string and the paper were removed by older hands than hers; the doll was brought to a standing position in front of the amazed child.

Wonder, excitement, joy, all fought for expression on her tiny face. Then, without uttering a word, she stretched out her thin arms, and, with motherly dignity, gathered the dolly close to her and kissed it gently, over and over. At last she looked up with a dazzling smile.

"Cravat mun al ounie!" she exclaimed, which is to say, "And he has also a necktie!"

Thus did the beloved doll of a little child in Jacksonville, Florida, find its way into the heart of a radiant little cripple in a miserable refugee camp in Constantinople, Turkey.

TRACKS OF GOD.—"Father," asked Thomas, looking up from his studies, "how do you know there is a God?"

"Why, what makes you ask the question? Do you doubt the existence of God?"

"Well, I heard one of the students say that he had been reading a book that proved conclusively that you could know nothing about God, nor even be sure there is a God. He said that, if there were a God, He was outside of the world and of such a nature that we could not know Him. Is there any way really to know?"

"Well, my boy, do you remember the other day that you were laughing about Robinson Crusoe's dismay at discovering that there were other persons on the island besides himself? How did he discover them? Did he see them? No; he discovered one track of a bare foot in the sand, and he knew that it could not be his own. He knew that only a human being could have made it, and he knew that whoever had made it could not be far off, for the tide had not yet reached it. All those things he knew to be true, although he had not seen a human being within miles of the island. And the knowledge was all gained from a mark in the sand.

"If one print of a bare foot in the sand is absolute proof of the existence and presence of a human being, what are we to suppose when we see the prints of the Master's shoe, as Bunyan calls it, covering the whole wide world? We see a million creatures that only God could make. We see on mountain and in valley the print of the fingers of God. We see a million flowers and plants and trees that only God could make grow. We see all the rivers and the springs of the world fed from the sky. We see a great universe, perfectly made and ordered from the tiniest speck to the greatest of all the worlds. What do all those things mean—those millions upon millions of footprints in the clay of the world? They mean God, living, present, ruling and loving! They mean God and nothing else."—From Youth's Companion.

BOOK REVIEWS.

"SPIRITUAL ENERGIES IN DAILY LIFE."*

Just how a series of short essays that have appeared from time to time, in two or more magazines, can be so arranged into book form as to give one the idea of perfect continuity is a reasonable question.

In the essays before us there is a finished relationship which need not have been expected, for some of the chapters have already appeared in publications as diverse in character as The Atlantic Monthly, The Journal of Religion, The Friend (London), and The Homiletic Review.

Perhaps with this thought in mind the most emphatic word of approval that one can give is to the fact that the different chapters are so linked together that the completeness stands out prominently.

It was once the fate with essayists to publish in this, that and the other magazine brief papers on diverse topics, all excellent of their kind, but no two kinds related, then when the number would make a volume of reasonable size, forth from the press would issue a new book. Not so with these. There is a thread that finds its starting in Chapter one and it runs continuously through to the end. How this is brought about we leave you to settle.

Religion as Energy scarcely satisfies the questioner as to what the essays are to unfold. Neither, I think, do the sub-heads to the ten chapters which comprise the volume. "The Peace That Passes Understanding" is the first chapter, a title familiar to us as Bible words and suggestive of the introspective writing we are accustomed to in Friends' journals, and so, too, "The Mystic's Experience of God" as the concluding chapter, though the title will not be found in a Friends' journal, the seventeenth century way of referring to it crowds these journals from cover to cover.

I trust these essays may have a wide reading; in their new setting they will be found richer even than when they first appeared in a fragmentary form. Were I asked which chapter has most gripped me I would be unwilling to reply without a second or third reading, for one rarely brings exactly the same person to the consideration of such topics as this book offers. To-day's mood and to-morrow's mood are not identical.

*"Spiritual Energies in Daily Life." By Rufus M. Jones. Published by the Macmillan Co. On sale at Friends' Book Store, 302 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

When I came to a certain page (93) near the middle of the book, I re-read what I had just been over and I find it so richly suggestive in thought and so fair a counterpart of what goes before it and what follows after that this small fragment will be quoted:—

"What, then, is Christianity? In answering this question we cannot confine ourselves to the teaching and the work of Jesus. Important as it is to go 'back to Jesus' that is not enough. We cannot fully comprehend the meaning of Christianity until we take into account the fact that the invisible, resurrected Christ is the continuation through the ages of the same revelation begun in the life and teaching of Jesus. Galilee and Judea mark only one stage of the Gospel, which is, in its fulness, an eternal gospel. The Christian revelation which came to light first in one Life—its master interpretation and incarnation—has since been going forward in a continuous and unbroken manifestation of Christ through many lives and through many groups and through the spiritual achievements of all those who have lived by Him. Christianity is, thus, the revelation of God through personal life—God humanly revealed. St. Paul and the writer of the Fourth Gospel were the first to reach this profound insight into its fuller meaning, though it is plainly suggested in some of the sayings of Jesus and in the Pentecostal experiences of the first Christians. It is the very heart of the Pauline and the Johannine Christianity. Important as is the backward look to Jesus in both these writers, the central emphasis is unmistakably upon the inward experience of the invisible, spiritual Christ. This is the expectation in the Fourth Gospel: Greater things than these shall ye do when the Spirit comes upon you. This is the mystery, the secret of the gospel, St. Paul says, Christ in you."

CONFERENCE ON SPREADING THE GOSPEL.

A conference of a few of those specially interested in the more earnest spread of the Gospel in our home communities was held at Arch Street on the first and second of Ninth Month, and was felt to have been a favored occasion. The need of a fresh anointing for such service was greatly felt and was in some measure realized, as in solemn stillness we gathered to wait upon God, and earnest supplications were offered for guidance amid an outpouring of His power.

In the deliberations which followed, a definition of the word "Evangelism" was several times considered, as expressing the thought of the spreading of the Gospel: one speaker took it in a wide sense, of any means of telling the glad tidings of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, e.g., not merely by what one called "revival meetings," but in meetings held according to Friends' principles, as well as in personal conversation, and in connection with patient educational methods. Another speaker defined evangelism in two ways: (1) the building up of the membership of the Church; (2) the outreach to the world far and near; a third defined it simply as "to seek and to save that which is lost." We need to teach and preach our Saviour a great deal more than we do. We need what someone has called "a fresher of grace," an experience that will surely come if men fulfil the conditions. We need a renewal of firm belief in the Bible. Evangelism implies going forth from our usual places of worship and declaring the simple Gospel in such sort as to pierce the heart of unbelievers and bring them into the faith of Christ; the methods may and must vary; just as the faces of individuals differ from each other, so also souls may differ, and may require differences of approach and method. But an inspired testimony to the power of Christ to save must be the heart of it all; and to this end a baptism and filling by the Holy Spirit is essential. There is need also to be kept by the power of Christ so as in no way to be a stumbling stone to others; we should carefully watch our actions among others, working out our own salvation with fear and trembling. By His Spirit

"THE LAURENTIANS."*

"There are those who travel carefully, with forethought and porters, with guide-books and account-books and insurance papers. They proceed from place to place without fatigue, are prudent as to companions and long-sighted in regard to their three meals a day, their eight hours' sleep. . . . Where the hotels are not starred they do not go.

"I have no quarrel with such, being myself not the first to eschew comfort; but they, I am afraid, will be thrown into a simmer of exasperation by this book. For it is a record of things that should not be allowed to happen to the accurate tourist. It is an account, as truthful as I can remember and as frank as I dare say, of a roving commission tendered by me to myself over a country lying just beyond my imagination.

" . . . Within these self-set borders I was to be free—free to roam or raminate, to fly or float or foot it as I choose, to parley with natives or meditate about them in cautious silence. This book is the echo of that meditation."

These few sentences from the opening chapter of "The Laurentians" are sufficient to whet the appetite of any reader to follow the author through his roamings and his meditations. The book invites the camper to experience for himself the delights of living out-of-doors in this section of Canada, while for the quiet reader by the fireside the meditations are full of humor and of a keen appreciation of the real values of life.

also we must come to radiate some of the winsomeness of Christ, and so win others to Him.

Our friend George G. Williams alluded to his own conversion at Westtown when about fifteen years old, under the ministry of Samuel Emlen, and how as a young man he endeavored to do Christian service among the street boys of Philadelphia; at that time a lasting "passion for souls" was given him. He reviewed the extraordinary efforts of the early Friends in spreading the Gospel, how George Fox "thundered against sin," calling for a genuine repentance, and declaring that "Christ died for all, and was a propitiation for all," and was an all-sufficient Saviour to regenerate all; for three years he and two other ministers held an average of twenty meetings a week in London, until 10,000 adherents were gathered there. This means nearly three meetings a day for three years. Bristol Meeting started from a meeting in an open field where five hundred "sought the Lord" through the powerful work of the Holy Spirit. There is a great need to-day for a revival of this out-reaching spirit of the early Friends. There is a luke-warmness among us to-day, and therefore a need of prayer to awaken Christians to their need. "If God is real to Christians, why is it that they keep Him out of all their conversations?"

The lack of this inspired and effectual out-reaching spirit of evangelism in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has been a distinct loss for many years, another speaker claimed, leading to the drifting away of many of our young people, and a failure to enlarge our borders. Since the ministry of Joseph John Gurney, who derived his inspiration indirectly from the revival under John Wesley, our Yearly Meeting has been very evangelical in doctrine, but very unevangelical in methods. This seems due to the endeavor to keep a middle course between the Hicksite and the evangelistic separatists. But the doctrine of the early Friends differed a good deal from the evangelicalism of Wesley; he started with a dark picture of sin, man fallen—total depravity; the early Friends began rather with Light—the assurance that every soul has the ability and opportunity to receive the Light of Christ. Each has its place. Again there are two types of religious experience, one requiring strong appeal, a challenge for decision, a “right-about-face” break with a sinful past; the other gentler, more gradual, like the dawn growing into the full light of day; this latter type of person is apt to be repelled, sometimes driven back from the faith, by the evangelistic appeal for decision. It is this latter type that our Yearly Meeting has ministered to; it is the former type that evangelism has in mind. But a full Christian service should include both. Evangelistic meetings could be held according to our principles if one having the gift of an evangelist, as in the primitive Christian Church (Eph. iv: 11), received an unmistakable call to that work.

Our Friend, Max I. Reich, said: Give us the man, and the problem will be solved. The Holy Spirit will lead aright as to the method which should be used. To reach the masses, much co-operation is required; as Wesley said, “All at it, and always at it,” and again, “Brethren, get set on fire, and the people will come to see you burn.” Max I. Reich gave some of his personal experiences years ago as an evangelist among the lumber camps in Canada and Michigan—also in Kansas and Indian Territory, then in England, Wales and Scotland. These illustrated the variety of method found useful under the Spirit’s leading. People may be brought into the Divine presence in silent worship even in a street meeting. There is such a thing as Quaker evangelism. But Friends must learn to co-operate, to work in groups, as when “Peter stood up with the eleven.” Give us eleven spirit-filled men, and the whole Church back of them, and we can show you Pentecostal days.

The sessions of the Conference closed with a beautiful fellowship of silent and vocal prayer.

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

SELECTIONS FROM LETTERS FROM ESTHER M. WHITSON.

CHÂLONS, Third Month 30, 1922.

I arrived here in a cold French rain. And yet trees and grass showed signs of Spring; they say it was like summer a week ago. I heard a song sparrow but he sounded cold. This hospital is on the opposite side of the town from the new one. It is surrounded by a wall and inside are the big old houses, cold, barn-looking; one group, the insane home, the other the maternity house where we work. A little way off are the rough barracks where we live, which were built by our boys in 1918.

I was ushered into my barrack cold as Greenland with the windows open. There is one room here which is the nurses’ living-room. It contains a long table, an awful piano, a big cupboard, a sewing machine, a small cot with three legs, a shelf of odd books and a stove—a welcome stove! Of course there are enough chairs to go around. This is home to me already. Conditions are crude, partly because so much has been moved to the other place.

The babies are perfect; the mothers not so perfect. The maids who wait on us are imperfect. I am to go to work in the maternity right away. I am just delighted. I am going to like French food. About twelve o’clock a French woman puts twelve plates on the bare table, twelve knives and twelve spoons and twelve blue glasses by the plates. At 12.15 a bell rings and twelve jolly girls come in to eat. A huge dish of scrambled egg on toast, another of mashed potato and another of creamed peas are the center of service. Crusty bread is devoured hungrily. A dessert of jam and chickory coffee ends lunch. Breakfast is coffee and bread and butter. Everybody is rough and ready and helps herself and waits on table.

Janet Speakman, the girl from Swarthmore, gave me a warm welcome. She had her afternoon off so she took me through the town showing me the good shops and over to the new hospital where Melvin Cawl met us and showed us all over it. Really it is indescribable, beautiful beyond my expectations, and home-like. A wall around it—very Frenchy. Trees and bushes in the yard, a tennis court laid out, play-room for the children and a beautiful nurses’ home.

Melvin has even designed the fresco and French borders and had artists come from Paris to work out color schemes in the patients’ rooms. The nursery and children’s wards have fire-places and nursery rhymes and cows and cats and pictures all around the walls. It is far nicer than I ever expected. The views are perfect from all sides.

We went from the hospital down the canal and across the street to take tea with a French lady whom Janet had met. Two other French ladies were there. Of the three the hostess spoke very good English. She was a delightful hostess and kept us all laughing, using both tongues, but we all understood all the time. They are school-teachers and we have arranged to exchange English for French whenever we can get together. They are all friends of Mademoiselle Merle, the Directress of the hospital. I enjoyed it so much. I am sure I’ll learn French. I am to have a French girl over me in my work, so I shall have to learn.

They have tea here every p. m. The nurses are excused from duty long enough to run in a few at a time. It is new but nice and I am going to like everything.

Châlons is very old, very quaint, and not so large as I expected. It has many shops, a few ruins from bomb shells, a very old cathedral, a time-worn town hall, deep green moss-bordered canals moving under quaint bridges, donkey carts led over cobble-stone pavements by women with little children, and mud, mud, mud, and water. It is a garrison town. We live across the street from the wall of the French army-barracks. There are blue boys everywhere. They look weary, shiftless and tired of life. They are in the army only because they get paid. If they were not in the army they would be out of a job. Their life is monotonous. They get tired of the drill and marching.

Fourth Month 20th.—The grandest, happiest thing has happened since I came to France. I received a letter from home! When this wonderful letter came, one of the girls brought it over to my barrack at three p. m. She knew I would be awake. Yes, mother, only here eighteen days and—night duty over the whole place! It’s not bad at all, only I do not sleep much. Honestly, I was so cold in bed today with everything possible over me that I felt like getting up and burning the barrack just to see a warm fire. Last week was pleasant and spring-like. There are lots of pretty gardens, but the houses look cold and not home-like. No, we do not scrub floors. French maids do all that kind of work. Nursing here is much the same as in America, only French methods and few accommodations (in the old hospital). My! how these women love their babies! I never saw such passion as they have for their little ones.

On my day off recently, Mlle. Merle loaned me her wheel, which I rode to Lapine, a small town about six miles from here. I visited the old cathedral, which dates back to 800 or 900 A. D. It actually totters with carvings and moss and spires. The interior was cold, dim, Catholic. It was early in the morning, so I investigated to my heart’s content all the shrines and candles and the old, mouldy well where some innocent sinners were baptized, odd statues of the imaginary Mary, and the little stalls where the boards are worn with kneepoints. I rode about the queer little town then rode all the way home in the rain. After I had changed my clothes the sun came out and laughed at me.

Not gold, but only men, can make
A people great and strong;
Men who, for truth and honor’s sake,
Stand fast and suffer long.
Brave men, who work while others sleep,
Who dare while others fly;
They build a nation’s pillars deep,
And fly them to the sky.

—RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

A MESSAGE TO THE FRIENDS' BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF PHILADELPHIA.

The following letter was read at a recent meeting of the Friends' Bible Association. It has been the practice of the Association to make an annual donation in money to Minnie P. Bowles to be used in the purchase of Bibles and Testaments, the books to be given as gifts as her judgment prompts. The Association is glad to share the letter with the readers of THE FRIEND.—EDS.]

30 KORAN MACHI, MITA,
SHIBA, TOKYO, Fifth Month 5, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

I regret that my letter sent thee from Zushi when I was away at the seashore with my husband last year, seems never to have reached thee. Do forgive this seeming oversight. We do greatly value the yearly grant from the Philadelphia Bible Committee. This fund always being here enables us often to give a Bible where otherwise it would be an opportunity lost. At the Christmas time we got one hundred small Testaments. Most of those we gave to children in the Bible School. Whenever a young man or a young woman is going far away, some one who has become a Christian while in our midst receives one as a "memory gift." We find nothing more highly prized than a "Bible." Since we have this fund we can give better ones than we could without it. Each year since The Friends' Girls' School has had graduates we have given each graduate a Bible—a good, well-bound one—a whole Bible. The past four years Bibles have doubled in price, also the number of graduates from our school has greatly increased so that for the past three years we have not been able to give the graduates the whole Bible but only the New Testament, well bound and on good paper. This year there were twenty-eight graduates, so we knew at 3.10 yen each for New Testaments we could not take the amount out of this Bible Credit, so we had to get the Friends' Memory Gifts for the first time out of a special or really The General Fund, and by special request. Most of our girls become Christians and all prize the Bible and the teaching they have had. Last year's class, sixteen girls, had their Gifts from this fund. Last year and this Edith Sharpless' young kindergarten graduates, eight each year, also received their first small, well-bound New Testaments in the same way. In the First Month P.-P. W. Ziemann, who is the pastor of the Union English Church Service in Tokyo, and his wife, had gone out one evening to attend a Mission Committee. They returned home at ten P. M., finding their new home a pile of ashes. The servants were there and had saved a few articles from the kitchen and dining-room, but every book he possessed had been burned. He had twelve Bibles, all were gone. I went down and got two American Revised, good print Bibles for them.

Renzo Sanada is one of our valued members. In 1916 he was sent to Paris as one of the secretaries in the Japanese Embassies there. He was there, and also attended three hundred and fifty important National or International Conferences on the European Continent during his time of difficult service, while there for six years. He attended the Washington Conference throughout and at the end of the Third Month returned to Japan. He was at our meeting for worship on Fourth Month 23rd. Since his return to Tokyo he has been living in the Imperial Hotel. On the twenty-third that hotel burned. He lost everything he had—not even a hat did he have left. He had returned to the hotel and was writing letters. He had in his side pocket a New Testament which we had given him in 1916 as he was leaving. While writing he had taken it out of his pocket and placed it beside him. It was burned. The fire started in the basement by a workman dropping a cigarette stub so he was obliged hurriedly to escape as the floors were giving way before he knew the hotel was afire. Afterward he told me he highly prized that little New Testament, as he had carried it and used it daily the whole six years. We are trying to get another just like it to replace the lost one. When he was here this week we gave him an English New Testament, a small Japanese one, a small whole Bible in Japanese, and a large print newly revised Japanese New Testament for desk study. These all came from the fund you send. Last week Taniaki Hara, now an old man, a life-long worker for ex-convicts, a strong Christian man, who has led hundreds of criminals to Christ and to better lives in every way called here. He said, "When Dr. Whitney was living he used each year to give me one hundred of the cheapest bound Japanese New Testaments; I do not know where he got them, but they were a great help to me in my work and each year through this means some became Christians. I came to see if possibly I might get this help from the Friends since Dr. Whitney is gone." So we have had sent to him from this fund the one hundred copies at 10 sen a copy. They are really the cheapest they handle.

George Braithwaite is this year the one worker from abroad who is working with the reliable staff of about ten Japanese men in the American Bible Society here. Notwithstanding all of the many European philologies and other unsettling books that have been poured into Japan the past year, as well as former years, the Bible is the leader in sales.

We hope this fund can be continued and assure thy committee that every sen of it is an investment for Eternity. We have many Bible Classes with women and students in our home and in other homes. The Bibles for our class and group work are also out of this credit. Our new meeting-house is just building. When it is finished we shall need a new supply—so we are hoping your committee may be able to continue this excellent work.

Very sincerely thy friend,
MINNIE P. BOWLES.

HELP UPHOLD THE STANDARD!

Few religious organizations have been afforded such an opportunity for the effective expression and advancement of their ideals as lies open to the Society of Friends to-day through the work of the American Friends' Service Committee.

The article by Robert W. Dunn, published below, gives a graphic instance of the kind of results which the work is producing: "Mile after mile of flat river-bottom land—plowed!" When one realizes that this land lies in the famine zone of Russia, that it means not only emergency famine relief, but permanent agricultural reconstruction, and that it was plowed by Friends' workers, one is thrilled with a vision of the possibilities which lie in Friends' service work.

By serving as a "good Samaritan" to thousands upon thousands who are stricken in body and soul, it is not only administering relief, but is demonstrating that there are those for whom service and love are realities, and so is stimulating new faith in the ideals which the present international situation so often tends to crush out.

But the Service Committee can realize these great opportunities only in proportion as the Society of Friends realizes its opportunity by continuing to render whole-hearted support to the service work. That work was begun in response to a great emergency. Great emergencies still call for its help. But so far as concerns the Society of Friends itself, the work can no longer be regarded as of simply an emergency character. It has become one of the Society's permanent concerns.

Every Friends' meeting should have its local service committee, and should be working in the cause as a part of its regular religious activities. The many communities which have served so splendidly in the past, are urged to continue their support this winter with renewed zeal. Many other communities have taken comparatively little share in the work thus far, and it is hoped that they will now realize the opportunity which it opens to them, and will enter wholeheartedly into it.

Last year the Society of Friends in America contributed approximately $250,000 to the work. This served as a base upon which the Service Committee was able to raise total contributions valuing more than $4,700,000. This year, with Russia facing a new famine crisis, the committee hopes to obtain and distribute relief having an even greater total value, and it depends upon Friends to continue their support upon as large a scale as heretofore. Will not every Friend give, and every Friends' community raise, at least as much for the service work this year as last?

If Jesus were among us to-day, and were seeking means to carry healing and cheer to the destitute and the suffering, what Friends' meeting would not make every effort and sacrifice in order that His mission might be fulfilled? Every Friends' meeting can help to carry on that mission by supporting its share of this work which was inspired by His ideals, and which it is attempted to carry on in His spirit.

FROM A CAR WINDOW.

If you happen to be a passenger on a Moscow-Tashkent express, and if you happen to be awake when your train is clicking off the distance between Totksoye and Sorochinskoye on the single-track line between Samara and Orenberg, you will see something that will make you certain that you are not in the famine area. You will simply not understand it, especially if you have heard of the appalling casualties among horses this last year in Buzuluk County.

This is what you will see. Mile after mile of flat river bottom-land—plowed. A broad black strip along the railroad. It begins just beyond the 250-acre millet field where they are now cutting and threshing the clean native millet—millet for which land was turned by Quaker tractors early last summer—and it stretches up the gentle slope toward the horizon and farther than the eye can follow. But you will be able to get the sweep of it from the window of your wagon for it runs parallel with the track for a distance of two or three miles.

This black plowed land is neither the work of God nor of thrifty peasants. Neither must it be taken as an index of the amount of land plowed in these parts. It is entirely abnormal. It is not a miracle, but it would not be there but for one fact—the presence of the Quaker tractors. It is their work. It is the land they have plowed for the fall seeding. It is the biggest single accomplishment and certainly the most visible evidence of the presence of the Friends' Mission in Sorochinskoye.

Two carloads of seed rye have arrived from the Gubernia Agricultural Department in Samara. The harrows and seeders, also pulled by the four Fordsons, are already at work. The process of plowing and seeding farther and farther west along the line will continue as long as the fall sowing season lasts till the end of Ninth Month. With the 1750 poods of rye available for the sowing it will be possible, at five poods to the small dessiatine, to sow 350 dessiatines or some 500 acres this fall. Then there will be several hundred acres left over for the spring sowing of wheat.

And the products from these long furrows, the grains from this vast stretch of black, where will they go? By agreement with the Soviet Government the Quakers will distribute all the returns, after amounts for repayment of seed grain is taken out, to those peasants who will still be in need and in actual danger of starvation next summer—1923.

That date should make you pause and consider a little. It should make you realize that there is still actually, though of course not as acutely or dramatically as last summer, a famine in Buzuluk County and that it will still have its effects in the summer of 1923.

When you see that belt of black earth you must realize that this is the one and only large belt of black plowed earth in the whole of Buzuluk County or in the whole of the vast province of Samara. It is the work of a foreign relief agency that is vitally interested in building up agricultural production in Russia and in helping the peasant to construct a civilization that is peaceful and productive and worth living in. . . . And next summer riding along the same line the traveler will be amazed at the sight of an almost endless sea of gold—the ripening rye.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

RANCOGAS EDITION OF THE JOURNAL OF JOHN WOOLMAN.—The Macmillan Company has now in the press a complete edition of the Journal and Essays of John Woolman, prepared by Amelia Mott Gummere from original sources, at the request of the Friends' Historical Society of Philadelphia. It will form the latest volume in the Pennsbury Series, issued by Friends' Book Store at 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Unavoidable delays prevented its appearance for the bi-centennial of John Woolman's birth in 1920. In this interval, however, very important material has come to light, and it is cause for congratulation, rather than regret, that its publication has not been hurried.

The text has been supplied by the two early manuscripts and the English Journal now at Swarthmore College, together with the complete folio prepared by Woolman for the printer, and owned by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. All the writings so far as known are included, together with an unpublished Essay on Human Relations. Meeting and court records have furnished rich returns, and wills, deeds, surveys and other legal papers, all drawn by John Woolman, have come to light.

The old myths of Woolman's illiteracy and poverty are effectually dispelled, and an attempt has been made to place John Woolman in the setting of his contemporary life, and to show from the facts which research has disclosed, why he has been recognized by eminent writers as an important factor in the very interesting social development of the eighteenth century.

Full justice is done John Woolman's work in the anti-slavery cause, but the present world conditions render the proper interpretation of his social reform work particularly timely. For this reason J. G. Whittier's introduction to the late editions, which deals chiefly with the abolition question so vital at the period of its publication, has been discarded in favor of an extended biographical sketch of the author's personal life, setting forth the outstanding facts heretofore unknown.

An appendix contains copies of early deeds and wills of John Woolman's ancestors, and his own trust deed to Stephen Comfort, as well as biographical notes on the persons mentioned in it. These, together with a very full bibliography will, it is hoped, furnish the student of John Woolman with material for a social study of the first importance.

The thirty-three illustrations in this volume of 625 pages are preceded for frontispiece by a portrait of John Woolman from a memory-sketch by a contemporary.

We hope in next issue of THE FRIEND to publish a review of the book by Rayner W. Kelsey.

WE have already given a full report of the late Yearly Meeting held at Barnesville, Ohio. A young Friend, member of the meeting, has written us within the past few days her impression of the Meeting and we venture to give the following from her letter:—

"The presence and exercises of many visiting Friends was a precious evidence of the abiding and forgiving love of our Heavenly Father. But we were reminded in our first session that we could receive no profit from the labors of these messengers, unless we were willing to bear and accept. Emphasis was placed upon the meaning and value of prayer; the absolute sufficiency of Christ for our every need; the abundant life which He promised and will give; His atoning sacrifice whereby our sins may be forgiven; the Inner Light or Spirit of God which dwells in our hearts to guide us in all things if we will but hear and heed; and, lest we judge another, the parable of the talents was revived and we were reminded that none of us could hope for more than to be 'faithful in a few things.' These were perhaps the outstanding messages brought to us by our ministering Friends, but the secret, silent exercises of other visiting Friends were as full of God's love and as fruitful for our good as the spoken words.

"If only empty vessels could be filled, this must mean that very many of our members went to Yearly Meeting with empty hearts, but they came away filled to overflowing. At each session we were granted a fresh, full visitation of the Father's love, an answer to the prayers of many hearts. A precious sense of fellowship brought us very close together as we were daily fed with the manna which God alone can give."

[HAVING requested copies of the Minutes liberating our Friends of Germantown Meeting for service abroad we are glad to give these minutes in full.—Eds.]

To those who are interested in the message of our Friends:—
Greetings:

Our beloved fellow members, Alfred C. Garrett and his wife, Eleanor E. Garrett, have informed us that they are drawn by the Divine Love to visit Germany, Austria and Poland and, if way should open, other countries, to meet with those who have been drawn to the Society of Friends and also with all who are seeking the way of Truth and its application in our present life.

Our Meeting fully sympathizes with the plans and purposes of our Friends, and although we shall miss their fellowship in service at home, we rejoice to send them forth as our representatives, trusting that their gifts, so valuable to us, may be blessed to all with whom they meet.

We bespeak for them the co-operation of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and remain

Your Friends.

Tenth Month 12, 1922.

To those who are interested in the message of our Friends:

Greetings:

Agnes L. Tierney, a beloved member and minister of Germantown Monthly Meeting of Friends, Philadelphia, has felt that it would be right for her to visit the people of Germany and Austria and, if way should open, other countries.

Her mind turns especially to the "Friends of the Friends," but also to all who are truly interested in the simple Gospel of Jesus Christ, and her desire is to offer to all such the Quaker interpretation of Christ's message to the world to-day.

We believe that Agnes L. Tierney is drawn to this work by the constraining love of Christ, and we earnestly desire that her ministry may be one of reconciliation between man and man, nation and nation, and, above all, between men and the Divine Father. We bespeak for her the kindly help of all to whom this letter may come.

In love your friends,

Signed as previous Minute.

A FRIEND recently absent from home tells us that he found those with whom he was thrown eager to possess for themselves Part 1 of the New London Book of Discipline. In the London Times of a few weeks ago Maurice Hewlett alluded to the book in this wise: "It is nothing less than a stream of testimony to the root of Quakerism, an anthology of its religious conversation from the seventeenth century onwards. It is closed only by the cover, for the stream is still flowing, and apparently with a strong tide."

A NEW and rather spectacular way of advertising appeared a month or so ago in a prominent English daily paper.

One full page of the paper was paid for and the message it contained was a brief statement to the effect that the undersigned were committed to the belief that "war is treason to the spiritual unity of mankind." The signers included at least one member of the Church of England, five Unitarian ministers, four Friends and enough others to swell the total to twenty.

It seems unlikely that Americans can be outdone in any thing of this nature, especially when the invitation was given for all who shared like feelings to make a similar public commitment.

A NEWSPAPER correspondent writes of Friends: Their solemn conviction is that one humble, reverent, inspired man—with God—makes a majority. Not by their own might, but through their inward light, have they proven a world-force. It is not they, but the truth that is in them that they expect will set the world free of useless, insensate misery and wrong.

May the prediction be proved true.

ROOTS.

When I came back to Haverford this fall the morning-glory vines had grown out of all bounds. Not only had they climbed to the second-story of the house, but they had sprawled over everything else that grew. I cut out a huge bunch of them and threw them in a heap. For several days the blossoms opened and shut, morning and evening, seeming not to know what had happened to them or their roots. It set me to thinking about the Christian life and to asking myself whether I was rooted in the ground, or in the air. This question may apply to other things, one's health, business, etc.

We know that there are two ways, in practice, of deriving the inspiration necessary for our lives. One is to enjoy the stimulus of our relation to good men and women about us. Our society holds us up. By the favor of a goodly fellowship which teaches and lends impelling force to our lives we are able to live pretty happily. The other way is to go more deeply and individually to that of God within us, or wherever one is in the habit of locating Him in the universe. Would we be at a loss to tell oftentimes which of these ways we are using more?

It is surprising how long the effect of a spiritual fellowship can be felt even after the connection has been broken by any form of removal. Angels, seen and unseen, bear us up on their hands lest we dash our feet against the stones.

Of course both of the ways of maintaining spiritual vigor are ultimately one. They go back to the Divine source. One is more immediate and direct than the other. It is our privilege to know how direct our relationship to God and His goodness is. We use the indirect method far more than we realize. Just as plants derive nourishment from the air and the soil so we ought to be nourished by both. It is surely intended by Providence that we should enjoy every spiritual good.

There is a rough hero in Bible story who illustrates this very well. Poor, shaggy, blundering Samson, after terrific adventures, was cut off by his strength and didn't realize it. (Judges xvi: 20) He said: "I will go out as at other times, and shake myself free. But he knew not that Jehovah was departed from him." The connection was broken and he was like a common man. How we clench our hands as we watch him, for we have been let into the secret and sympathize as he goes out to meet the issues of life and death.

What does my inner, real life and character feed upon? What are my standards and ideas and where do I get them from? A merely practical religion in the hand-to-mouth, every day sense may stop suddenly short. We must have a guarantee of its source. Let us look up the fountain of our faith. It may do well enough for a household to send around the corner to the store to buy emergency provisions occasionally. Food comes packed in glass and tin for such needs. Such provision meets many practical questions, but no one really supposes that it will ever be quite as satisfactory as original supplies of meat, vegetables, and fruit prepared by experienced hands.

Practical, ready-made, so-called up-to-date religion needs to be scrutinized earnestly. The power that maintains the spirit life is not first practical, but deeper in its source. It is in a profound sense "woe unto us when all men speak well of us" if by that one means that we have merely hit it off well with current, practical expectation. Religion has always looked askance at popular favor. Our roots must be in the Divine soil if we are to be living plants bearing the Divine fruit.

Why do so many practical men and women in all lands give deferential heed to some old, blundering, impractical saint? Is it because of superstition—not altogether. Ask them and perhaps they will say, "My mother was a Christian," or, it will be because of a sainted father, or other strong spiritual influence in the life. We have seen something analogous to this in other religions. Certain dervishes and sacred persons are little better than simpletons in their own right, but the mighty forces which they symbolize to the world are revered. There is an ineradicable sense that the fountains of life are deeper than our practical concerns and methods. They are not to be drawn upon in the usual way. The electorate, majorities even, may not control them. By contrast with them, spiritual choice of shrine, or seat may seem almost whimsical. It is as the wind, blowing where it listeth. Yet Jesus Christ made the Kingdom of God easy of entrance to those who are downright concerned to enter now.

So let us beware if we find it difficult to understand the call of God to our spirits, but easy to please people and win prominence among men. Let us beware if we have a knack of standing always under the drip of praise and prizes in everyday life; if Little Jack Horner is our patron saint, and if some present idea of efficiency satisfies us. Are we rooted in the soil or in the air? How long is it since we had a first-hand conviction that the Eternal was calling to our soul for obedience and service?

Let us stand still in the silence of some unhurried moment and ask in utter submission of our straggled selves that God our Heavenly Father have mercy upon us and show us the way to Himself. There is nothing of equal importance with this. It is the fundamental privilege and necessity. It is the beginning and the end of Christianity. Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life, to what and for what? To the Father.

The children of the Spirit are a chosen race, a holy nation. Unfortunately they do not always and infallibly know each other, nor have the structural equipment to make much of the fact when they do. But—that will all clear and there shall be one fold and one shepherd.

Your need and mine is to go deeper than all the bustling activity of surface concerns and make sure in our consciousness that we are spiritual beings joined with a spiritual universe. If we do not do this our courage, our strength, and our reason for being at all will some day seem to stop suddenly short and we shall not know how or where to go. Groping like the shorn Samson in the presence of his foes, existence will seem but a mocking. Oh, let us practice the seeking for God. This is the one reality from which we derive our own reality. This will steady the soul. This will make faith possible and life real.

Limitation in Amusements.

SUITABLE AMUSEMENTS FOR CHRISTIAN GENTLEFOLK.

In the days when hawks and hounds were for gentleness to wile the time away, the poor falconer was forced to lodge in the cold barn lest the smoke injure the hawk's sight. Since the nobility of those old days were descended from mountain hunters who had stolen both land and liberty from the valley farmers, their sport shows a characteristic heartlessness. Thus, also, our own amusements are the test of us in that they show our true character by what we do when we have nothing to do. Consequently, just as George Fox had gentle manners without any training because of his Christian philosophy, so the true nobility of to-day will amuse itself as becomes Christian gentleness.

If tradition does not err, Christ seems to have enjoyed Himself in ways which are still the wisest. He read and memorized the words of prophets and poets. We know, because He so often quoted them. He did beautiful handwork. His ox-yokes were famous for polish and fit. He loved solitary walks in woods and mountains and walks with a friend or two in the fields. He enjoyed dinners with interesting people no matter what place in society they held. He took part in community celebrations.

As He suggests when contrasting His ways with those of John, amusements are as much a matter of taste as of morality or religion. There are persons who think certain forms of dancing, card-playing, and even drinking are not evil; yet the sensuality associated with the first, the gambling with the second, and the drug habit formed by the last so disgust others that they can take no delight in any one of the three. "If meat makes my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth" to a person of fine sensibility means "I have no appetite for meat."

Parents, who must both check low instincts in their children and stimulate the higher ones, need to be very wise in the delicate handling of the fragile threads of early choice that bind us to the best in life. The little girl of eight may be so led to enjoy good fabrics and needlework and color that she becomes an artist and a good dressmaker at sixteen; or, without a love for artistry, she grows up an animal dressed in fine bought feathers. A boy of nine can be so engrossed with handling wood or raising sheep that, at eighteen, he is a skilled artisan or a herder; or, without opportunity to play with real materials, he may become a lounging animal smoking a cigarette.

Wild mob yells at a game, sensual listening to primitive blue chords, sitting for hours with the only activity a machine-made story on a screen, too highly sexualized dancing, lazy reading of poor magazine stories are all merely "letting go." No amount of scolding will prop up Franklin's empty bag.

Like the miraculous pitcher the bag can only fill itself. The hours you spent sitting in the straight-backed "little chair" listening to father and mother talk to company were spent filling "little pitchers." That was the way a baby

Puritan, Quaker or Indian learned the wisdom of his tribe. Fine intellectual conversation is not taught by a paid cheer leader.

The echoes from a great rendering of "It is Enough" from "Elijah" were not allowed to die away before a foolish little man began to talk. "How can he?" lamented a displeased listener. "Because he never heard a note," explained the organist. One must have ears to hear.

An old Chester County farmer who discovered the detective lolling and smoking with his feet on the desk, went out and found his stolen horse himself away down in south Jersey. "But I didn't git it a settin' in a cheer," said he. A Japanese once described our overstuffed American chairs as immoral. Only a factory worker after hours of drudgery is justified in habitually sitting, either at home or at the moving pictures.

All of which brings us to the conclusion that the truest recreation for anyone is another kind of work, except where the life work is machine drudgery. In that case, like Nathan Schaeffer, one can only ask, "Where can we get the wisdom to prepare human beings for life in a silk mill?"

There was a section of the Jersey coast boardwalk this summer where a police raid had screwed down wooden shutters on numberless "baby dolls." One poor foiled gambler attempted a straight sale of his stock, but failed to sell even one. The thousands passing did not want to buy a baby doll. They wished to play a game. A solemn Bible text nearby on a huge billboard did not solve the problem of the wayfarer man any better than the closed shutters or the sale of tinsel.

The Church has but lately taken up the study of people's lives instead of their deaths, and there should great things come of it by and by. There are still many buildings that are great stone tombs with coldly glittering altars and meeting-houses that are retreats for the self-satisfied. On the other hand, there are some that are warm open-house community centres with parties, pictures and picnics for wholesome recreation that fill those who profiteer in amusements outside with the fear of bankruptcy. To transform one of the former kind into one of the latter is a lifetime task worthy of the most adventurous missionary.

As a standard for the choice of wholesome recreation, the by-laws for Christian living given by the Apostle may be modernized thus:—

1. Love one another.
2. Live quietly.
3. Abstain from sensuality.
4. Work with your hands.
5. Attend to your own business.
6. Be self-supporting.
7. Do not grieve for the dead.
8. Be pious on week-days.
9. Be alive and sober.
10. Belong to the daytime.
11. Be respectful to the Church authorities for the sake of the cause.
12. Check the disorderly.
13. Coax loafers to activity.
14. Sustain weak characters.
15. Keep your temper.
16. Seek opportunity for good, never for punishment.
17. Rejoice at all times.
18. Never quench the fire of the spirit; but test revelations, retaining the good and abstaining from the evil.

For instance, certain night amusements may be contrary to 2, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 14. Some daytime sports may violate rules 4, 6, 8, 13 and 15.

Numbers 17 and 18 contain the secret of the most thrilling form of recreation possible. One moment of such revelation of the life more abundant, like the sight of the daffodils to Wordsworth, becomes "the bliss of solitude" for years thereafter.

HELEN E. RHOADS.

To many of us, the Fifth Query has become a sort of landmark, an institution which it would be a sacrilege to disturb or even to consider disturbing. But solid thought will bring us to the conclusion that if it be only an institution, if it is merely a query, to be read in our meetings and answered for its own sake, it should speedily find its place in the limbo of discarded formulas which have served their uses and are dead.

The Society of Friends of to-day has no more place for forms and rituals than had the English church of the seventeenth century against which George Fox and his co-laborers so effectually protested.

With regard to many of the "diversions" with which we have heretofore associated the Query, many of our members undoubtedly feel that it is hopelessly out of harmony with the times. "Behold, I make all things new," saith the Scripture, and there are those whose altogether laudable if sometimes fevered or restless searchings after something better in life than that which is or has been, would find such a "newness" in the expanded horizon of the present age that all old things must necessarily pass away, if for no other reason because they are not new.

But I am not willing to admit that the Fifth Query is ready for the discard. Indeed, I am satisfied that there never was a time when Christian people needed more soberly to consider their order of life with regard to the subjects queried after; and if Christians, generally, then Friends more particularly, for Friends have always placed a special emphasis on the obedience of individuals to the discipline of the Society. Friends, too, have always professed a purpose to keep their membership up to the standard of life which the Society has set.

It is commonplace to say that the question of amusements is merely a question of moderation, a nice balance between the extremes of worldliness on the one hand and of Puritanism on the other. We have all known this from the beginning. Most of our vices are merely the abuses of some virtue. The question is where are we to draw the line between what we are to encourage and what we are to discourage.

The query is directed to "harmful diversions," and I should assume that "theatres, opera and dances" are to be taken as illustrations of the kind of diversions which we are to avoid. The inquiry comes down to our ideas of what are "harmful diversions" and how we are going to define them; are we going to define them at all? What do we understand to be a "diversion" and what is "harmful" diversion? What is the element which distinguishes a "harmful" from an "unharmful" diversion? Probably there is no question on which there is room for a greater difference of view nor one more fundamentally influenced by conditions of life, surroundings, associations, customs, traditions and a host of other more or less accidental considerations, and perhaps above all, by the next whim of individual choice and impression.

"Now who shall arbitrate?
Ten men love what I hate,
Shun what I follow, slight what I receive;
Ten, who in ears and eyes
Match me: We all surmise,
They this thing, and I that;
Whom shall my soul believe?"

In the first place, I think we should clear our thoughts from all prejudices and pre-conceived notions of what is proper. We may be quite sure that some of our members, and especially the younger people whom we seek most to influence, will not share our prejudices and that they may hold quite different notions as to the proprieties. We should face squarely the question, what we mean by our inquiry and assure ourselves that we are speaking the language of truth and not the language of outworn tradition or of blind prejudice or taboo.

For myself I see no great difficulty in the query as written. Of course it is easy to find fault with the word arrangements which were set up many years ago for a social condition which superficially was quite different from our own.

Anyone can do that, and a judge or lawyer who does the same sort of thing is called a humbug and a "pettifogger." It is perfectly clear that the query, reduced to its lowest terms, inquires if we avoid harmful diversions. Do we? Let everyone answer from his own conscience and there will be little need of closer definition.

I doubt that specific definition of objectionable or unobjectionable amusements would be possible or desirable, but I think there may be a few underlying principles which will be found of general application and which will almost surely exclude most of those amusements or diversions Friends feel ought to be avoided. Naturally we do not all know, and especially our younger Friends do not all know, what are the objections to certain specific diversions, and for this reason the principles will often be difficult of application. In these cases it is the duty of those in authority, or those with a concern in the matter, to see that right information and sound instruction are provided.

I would suggest the following five general considerations:—

1. Considerations of the effect on the individual. The first question should be, "Will I be re-created by that which I propose to do?" Will the proposed diversion or amusement really build up or tear down that strong manhood and womanhood which we seek to cultivate? I exclude all considerations of physical health, for I assume that no one will defend as proper any diversion which saps the vitality of the body. The inquiry is toward that higher life which speaks in character and spiritual values, and anything which tends against that higher life ought to be excluded. In this category I place all amusements which involve harm or risk of harm to others; those which would involve cruelty or suffering to dumb animals or which have in them anything with which we would not want to be known to associate. Not because of the harm to such other individual, but because of the reflex upon the soul of the participant, which itself must bear a part of any harm that has been done. I would include in the same category all diversions involving intense passion and great excitement,

"That leave a heart high, sorrowful and cloyed,
A burning forehead and a parching tongue."

2. Considerations of our associates in the diversion. If the diversion is otherwise proper, yet if those who participate in it with us are in danger of being thus misled to their hurt, we should avoid it. I am thinking, for instance, of card playing, however innocently, with someone who thereby might be led into card gambling. I am thinking also of our invitation to others to join us in the attendance of theatres or movies or the like. Even though the way be clear for us it may not be so for our guest, and we may embarrass him on the one hand or harm him on the other. We should all be particularly careful in this regard in the case of children visiting in our homes. It is, too, a very serious consideration with regard to dancing, and especially to modern dancing. Young people and especially young women have little appreciation of the effect which an evening of dancing, with appealing music and attractive company, may have upon their partners. Dancing may be harmless and no doubt is enjoyable, but it is also fraught with grave dangers to those who participate in it and can never be to edification.

3. Considerations of those who entertain us. The thought here is toward the great class of professional entertainers; toward theatres, the opera, movies and professional games of all kinds. Whatever exceptions there may be, it is a matter of common knowledge that professional entertainers whether they be professional ball players, professional singers, ballet dancers, actors, or any others, are unable to maintain a high moral standard of life. The profession of the theatre, the opera and the moving picture is maintained at the cost of the moral fabric of the actors and actresses who participate in them. Every performance which we witness and toward which we contribute our small or large entrance fee is produced by men and women, who, by reason of the profession which they follow and which we are paying them our money to help them to follow, are forced into and kept in an immoral, if not an immoral life, which in the case of very many of them results in their utter ruin. Can we afford to be partners in such a business? Can we afford to be "diverted" by young women (often very young), and by men whose spiritual lives are thus sacrificed for our pleasures? Nero is said to have burned Christians for his entertainment, and all men have called him a cruel monster; yet would it not be better to destroy lives for a pastime than to connive at the destruction of souls? Long ago we discarded "cock-fighting" and "bull-baiting," because they were barbarous and cruel. Are we any better if we sit in a splendid theatre and witness the most exquisite masterpiece of histrionic art while the character of the actor is lowered or the soul of a chorus girl is put in jeopardy? I think not.

4. Considerations of the occasion. We should consider the times and seasons as well as the places of our diversions. Of course we shall exclude all excesses. As society is constituted Friends should avoid a public or ostentatious show of their diversions, and probably what would be quite proper in one place should be avoided in another. They should always avoid even harmless games in places where their presence would be misunderstood or misconstrued. A very harmless diversion would be objectionable if it were enjoyed in places habitually frequented by low men and women.

5. Consideration of the public good. Perhaps this should be placed as the first consideration of all, for we should do nothing to make harder the way of our fellow-men. The constant thought of every man and woman should be for the people among whom they live and with whom they associate. They should not only be willing to do all within their power for the help of the public, they should also be doubly willing to abstain from anything which would tend to the public harm. The noble declaration of St. Paul should be our watchword; "I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend."

My own conscience may be clear on occasion to attend theatres and movies and to play "Sunday golf and base-ball," for I may think I shall do it with restraint with good reason and in moderation, but a right consideration of the public good will restrain me from doing that which I would not have the general public do without good reason and without restraint. If my diversion in moderation causes another to stumble and fall by doing the same thing to excess, I should clearly abstain entirely. Friends should not hesitate to consider themselves as if they were examples, held up for the public to follow.

In the protest against harmful diversion Friends should be careful not to exclude diversions simply because they are diversions, for within proper limitations, diversions and amusements are good for us all. Indeed, it may be fairly questioned whether many Friends have not detracted from their usefulness by an over-anxiety not to offend. I have even asked myself whether we should not somewhere in the Queries or Advices ask if Friends are careful to provide themselves and their children with adequate and proper diversions. Probably if we could solve the question of what are proper amusements and diversions for our young people, and provide them, we should have less concern for the improper ones. But it is always easier to be dissatisfied with what is before us than to find a substitute that answers our requirements and meets all of our objections.

After all, the appeal must be to the conscience of the inquirer. He must gain the facts and ask counsel from those whose judgment he respects and he must seek the guidance of our Father in Heaven in the silence of prayer. Yet, after all, the decision must be his own. But the responsibility, great though it may seem, is the glorious privilege of manhood and womanhood. It is that which makes us men and women and Christians and separates us, by an infinite gulf, from the "developed brute," and wherever the question is close, there is the sure and time-honored maxim for our guidance, "To doubt, is to refuse."

C. WILFRED CONARD.

(To be concluded.)

In the Far East.

William C. Allen.

AROUND SINGAPORE.

We had a beautiful voyage of six days across the ofttime cantankerous China Sea. Strangely enough, day by day, as we approached the Equator, the heat became less intense. The sweet sea air of the tropics swept through our little cabin. There were nine cabin passengers on the ship, three of them being women, and two of these had been born within thirty miles of each other on the other side of the world, near Philadelphia, whilst the parents of the third lived fifty miles distant from that city. We had never met before—here was a coincidence. The approach to Singapore is very beautiful, and the harbor is alive with ships of all descriptions from every country. We reached the wharf on a little launch, sitting in the sunshine which registered 148 degrees temperature, whilst the hot air from the small engine-room helped to further disconcert us, as it blew across the heaps of luggage on which we were compelled to sit.

Singapore is a polyglot city. Here the East and the West come into closer contact than at any other place on earth. At every turn are crowds of Mohammedans with their fezzes, Arabs, various brands of Indians, Chinese, Japanese, Malays and Europeans of many languages. A few Americans reside in Singapore. Here at the southeast corner of Asia many of the great commercial transactions between the Orient and the Occident are consummated. The Esplanade close to the water-front exhibits every phase of life, from the great hotels where money is lavishly expended by the rich, to the crowded, dirty quarters where Malays and Chinese crowd each other with their curious customs and wares. For miles under the trees or in the shadow of the houses squat the natives. They cluster about the booths or out-door restaurants, crying their wares and eating their strange dishes and foods. The business portion of Singapore consists of narrow, twisted streets with arcades to protect the European business people from the Equatorial sun—for our genial old friend, the Equator, is only seven miles away. Through these crowded thoroughfares pour half-naked coolies, pulling endless lines of rickshaws, and at times hastily evading the motor cars that work their way from one corner to another. The rickshaws are broad enough to accommodate two persons. The native portions of the city reek with dirt, garlic and people. Shining brown life is the most picturesque part of this great city of the East. Innumerable boats, covered with bamboo mats to ward off the fierce sun rays, propelled by men with heavy poles or oars twenty feet long, are guided through a maze of, craft up and down the narrow stream.

But Singapore is in some respects better than Hongkong. The lot of the women appears to be far easier and happier in spite of the great transfer of commodities that is constantly taking place. This may be partially offset by the brutal behavior—the cuffs and violent physical punishment, sometimes observed—in the treatment of inferiors by these who are above them, either Europeans or Asiatics.

Here, as in so many ports in the Orient, we witnessed the sometimes disreputable conduct of some of the white people. Many of the young men drink a great deal—not a few of the women smoke and drink. To an onlooker it would appear as if the more money some of these people have and the better their social position, the faster are their lives. At Singapore we stayed at the Raffles Hotel, the leading hostelry of the city. The first night we were there was the occasion of a week-end dance, and during the hour preceding dinner small groups, English principally, sat at the little tables in the great verandah, taking glass after glass of wine, both men and women smoking cigarettes. By the time they went into dinner about nine o'clock not a few of them were already foolish from intoxicants. The dance concluded toward three o'clock of the Sabbath morning, and during its progress four fights occurred. Church workers throughout the Orient have frequently informed me, as I have observed for myself, that the people of European stock, Americans included—mostly young men—seldom attend worship. What can the yellow races who bitterly resent the sting of white commercial and military dominance, think of the representatives from our "Christian" lands, when they behave in this manner?

I have met with some young Americans engaged in business in the Far East who keep clean—for instance, every man connected with the Standard Oil Company we have met with abstains from alcoholic beverages. Their lively wives, so far as I have seen, do not smoke. The Y. M. C. A. workers from England and America, are, of course, a credit to the countries from which they come.

On the sea front of Singapore is the playground for Europeans and Eurasians, but social contact between these two classes does not exist. The grounds are divided for the use of each. Thus it may appear very evident that a European papa may play tennis on his exclusive side of the field whilst his half-caste son, because he has had a native mother, must play on the other side.

In Singapore, I had extremely illuminating conversations with some persons regarding the effects of the Great War. In conversation with a Dutch gentleman he narrated sad details associated with the collapse in business subsequent to the war, the ruin of many men and companies. He exclaimed, "It has not only been around here, but everywhere. You go out to Celebes or New Guinea and there you see the poor natives, millions of them, who are starving. There is no demand for what they produce. They probably have never known that there was a war, yet they suffer because of it." On a subsequent occasion I was talking with another Dutch gentleman, who told some harrowing stories. He emphasized the fact that even the neutral countries, such as Holland, were racked by the passions that developed after the Governments declared war in 1914, and that much family life was broken up because of different members' viewpoint of the strife. He spoke of instance after instance when brothers and cousins joined the colors of different combatants, and fought each other. He told me he had been in the Caribbean Sea in 1914, and in one of the great ports thereof, at the outbreak of war, there were English, German and French ships of war at anchor, adding, "Their commanders gave fine dinners to one another every day, when suddenly the war came, and all immediately put to sea, and in two days were fighting one another." "It was horrible!" This big, red-blooded Dutchman deprecated the actions of Governments in forcing their nationals into human slaughter, but, as a sea captain remarked to me on this trip, "What can we do? How can we help ourselves?"

The missionary work of English and Americans is extensive in Singapore. It was a pleasure to meet with the students of a number of the large schools in that city. We were indebted to the Anglican Bishop of Singapore and Bishop Bickley of the Methodist Church of America for the most sincere hospitality. On these occasions there were opportunities to discuss questions of ecclesiastical and international importance, and I learned much from these and other brethren in Christ. Kind friends also treated us to drives in the suburbs of Singapore, where the handsome homes and grounds of the foreigners and wealthy Chinese merchants are altogether delightful. After eight days full of Christian fellowship and interest we sailed for incomparable Java.

A MEETING IN A QUAKER OUTPOST.

In a corner of the room an English missionary was sitting, and his thoughts were turned to view the meeting in a rather detached way. He tried to look at it through the eyes of English Friends who, without opportunity to travel, are still intensely interested in the development of Quakerism throughout the world. A real Friends' meeting? Yes, it was that. The ministry was spontaneous, and there was liberty. A Syrian Friends' meeting? Certainly: there was only one other English Friend present out of a total of seventy-five, and the only vocal part taken by either was the making of some announcements. A spiritual Friends' meeting? He believed so. The quality of the ministry and the attitude of attention were outward indications of the working of the Spirit whose presence can be known, not proved.

It was rather an unusual day. A special interest had been aroused by the visit of a small company of Girl Guides camping under the pine trees in the neighborhood for the week-end. These in their neat uniforms filled two or three seats in the middle. They are pupils at a school organized by a Protestant Syrian lady in the city of Beyrouth, one of the most cheering and promising of entirely independent efforts for which missionary work is indirectly responsible. It is a good school, progressive—as the existence of a troop of Girl Guides proves, and remarkable in its spirit and tone. It is hard to believe that the slight little lady at the end of the row of big girls is the spring of so much energy and initiative—hard until one sees the character written in her face, and knows of her record as pupil and teacher at a missionary school in Beyrouth.

Two other visitors happened to be present, brothers; the elder an evangelist in Mosul, the younger a theological student. The rest of the company, school-girls and school-boys, a shop-keeper and a carriage driver, a Friend from Philadelphia and a young doctor lately established as an eye-specialist (who is a member of the Society), and a man who was once butler to Lord Kitchener, a pharmacist and a headmaster, a child of three and a great-grandfather of ninety-three, made a wonderful variety of personalities and interests.

After a few words of explanation of Friends' method of worship for the help of the strangers, two visitors first took part, the friend from Mosul in prayer, the student with an address, both showing that the liberty of the meeting had been rightly understood. The young doctor spoke, earnestly dwelling on the fact that it is our sin which crucifies Christ afresh, and illustrating from an incident of his daily clinic. The mission doctor followed with a delightful talk specially addressed to the Girl Guides on the duty of building up character from experience, referring to the difficulties they had met in a totally unexpected storm of rain in the night. Then the headmaster of the High School, a cultivated Syrian gentleman, gave a thoughtful address on the flag of the Guides and the flag of Lebanon (French colors with a green cedar on the middle white), and the Christian meaning of the words Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.

There are generally periods of silence in the meetings; on that day there was practically none. But this seemed all in right guidance. There was so much life that had to express itself in words.

It is a small Church: probably no more than a dozen present were actually members of the Society; but it is alive. Yes, it is alive; and the observer (participator too) in the corner thanked God for another proof of the presence of the Master in the midst of the Quaker Church in Syria.

A Member of the Syrian Mission.

write, "though he appeared to us in some things singular, . . . yet I say to thee, that I cannot help thinking it was the way truth led him." Esther Tuke had breadth of mind and greatness of heart.

One wonders whether a sweeter message was ever sent by a wayfarer to loved ones at home than the words of John Woolman, directed from England to his wife in America: "The tender concern which I have many times felt for thee, and for Mary and for John, and even for Betsy, I may not easily express. I have often remembered you with tears; and my desires have been that the Lord, who hath been my helper through many Adversities, may be a Father to you, and that in His love you may be guided Safely along."

Such is the man whose picture is presented to us now in the framework of this bulky volume. The arduous labors of the editor are a great gift to Quaker literature. At last we have a full and authentic edition of John Woolman's writings, and generous additions to the facts of his life. One way to encourage these great ventures in Quaker history is to buy the books once they are published.

After finishing the book the reviewer wanted to read again the words of Joseph Fort Newton, written after a recent visit to John Woolman's grave at York: "Reverently we stood by the grave of that simple man,—daringly radical, but Divinely gentle,—who was the incarnation of the spirit of Christ, and whose life of love and service, of pity and prayer, made him a kind of sad St. Francis of the new world."

TEMPERANCE.

The material for this issue has been furnished by Benjamin F. Whitson.

THE liquor dealer never fails to register, never loses his vote, never hibernates between elections. If a storm falls on election day, the troops of darkness breast it like a rock. They know their candidates and back them, rain or shine.—JOHN G. WOOLEY.

SINCE it has become aware of the fact that it can live only by continuous struggle, Liquor is not going to die without fighting. The day is coming when a complete victory will be won, but until that day, this traffic will practice every conceivable form of strategy for prolonged existence. It will go on selling to the last day even though it must peddle in the gutter at the heels of the law.—GUY HAYLER, in The International Record.

"Less than a quarter of a century ago," said Lincoln to his friend, "I predicted that the day would come when there would be neither a slave nor a drunkard in the land. I have lived to see one prediction fulfilled. I hope to live to see the other realized."

"Mr. Lincoln, shall I publish this from you?" said Major Merwin.

"Yes," the President replied, "publish it as wide as the daylight shines."—Public Ledger.

In America the sovereign citizen's vote is a thing of large responsibility. It is an obligation, not simply a "privilege," as it is so often called. Whether he likes to do it or not, every elector should vote, endeavoring most earnestly to make his ballot count for God and Home and Native Land.

PROHIBITION has become so popular with the people of Pennsylvania that, though both old party machines are wet, the party voters of each party have named a DRY candidate for Governor, while inconsistently continuing the wet machines in power. The Democrat candidate has been an outspoken enemy of booze ever since the writer has known him. If he is elected Governor no one need fear that he will not be against the liquor traffic. The Republican candidate has issued a personal platform in which he has taken most advanced ground against the liquor traffic, though the Republican party seems unable to build a platform of any kind. Therefore, so far as these two candidates are personally concerned, the "prohibitionist in principle" has absolutely no ground for choice between them.—B. E. P. PUGH, Prohibitionist.

HOW CANDIDATES STAND on Prohibition and law enforcement may be learned from the latest copy of The American Issue, the official organ of the Anti-Saloon League. A separate edition is edited at the office of each State Superintendent. The subscription price is fifty cents a year. The Pennsylvania Edition may be gotten from 1026 Stock Exchange Building, Philadelphia. Every family should have a prohibition paper of some kind.

NEW JERSEY is recognized as one of the greatest battle-grounds of the bootlegger's war. Its very geography makes it an inviting field for the operations of law violators. There is no coast line on the American continent better adapted to smuggling than that of Jersey. This State has been a favorable home for the alien and hither has he come in very great numbers.

Governor Edwards is the most outspoken friend of booze to be found in high office in America to-day. On the other hand, Senator Frelinghuysen is an outspoken exponent of Prohibition in the United States Senate.

The New Jersey primaries are over. Senator Frelinghuysen, candidate for renomination after six years of service in the Senate, won over his wet opponent by a vote of more than two to one.

There were five Congressmen who voted dry. They were all renominated. In addition, one wet Congressman was defeated by Chaplain Coon, a Methodist preacher and soldier.

For Governor, the Republicans nominated William M. Runyon, for eight years dry leader in the Legislature.

Jersey is bound to witness one of the hardest battles in the history of that State between now and Eleventh Month 7th. Frelinghuysen and Runyon, bone-dry candidates, are on the Republican ticket. The Republican State Convention went on record unequivocally for the maintenance and enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. On the Democratic ticket Governor Edwards is running for the Senate and Judge Silzer for Governor. Both are wet and the Democratic platform declares in favor of the return of wine and beer.

THE PROHIBITION INTERNATIONAL.—At the European Conference of the World Prohibition Federation just concluded in Amsterdam we have seen the Norwegian fraternize with the Britisher, the Swede with the Dane, the Belgian with the German, the Austrian with the Dutch, and so on, and one does not hesitate to say that so long as there are such men working for "the soul of the world," so long will missionary enterprise exist as something real and vital.

In looking around the Council Room in which this European gathering was held, and listening to the debates, one realized how little the world knows of the mind that is behind the Prohibition Movement. The general press may not be slow in labeling such men as fanatics; and the liquor interest doubtless considers it charitable to style them as fools, but the general public accords them a welcome on the public platform and gives attention to their arguments.

That they are fanatics may be true—Lincoln was a fanatic when the slave trade existed, but his statue stands in the heart of London at this hour. That they are fools may be true—Christ was (counted) a fool, but there are few to-day who would not give all they possess to live like Him. Of such men it may well be said, "Age shall not wither nor the years decay," for to them we owe all of human happiness we possess. It is not enough to call a man a fanatic or a fool—the man who is wise asks why?

To-day the voice of the Prohibitionist is heard in Senate and Legislature; in Academy and Council; in University and School; in Hall and Street, and if sometimes it is the voice crying in the wilderness, it does not always fall on deaf ears.

From Norway to Mexico, from New Zealand to Newfoundland, the voice of the Prohibitionist echoes. It is as the sound of many waters. He who once could only speak in the councils of his confederates, now speaks in the Parliaments of the world. Indeed, one may state that three European Republics can boast of thoroughgoing abstainers and Prohibitionists as Presidents, while scores of legislators face the issue of Prohibition with a bigness of purpose and a sympathy of understanding that make one have good reason to rejoice in the possibilities of the future.—International Record.

STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN, NINTH MONTH 6, 1922.—The Prohibition Referendum returns to hand give 919,579 against Prohibition, and 889,311 in favor, a wet majority of 30,288. The wet majority in Stockholm was about 120,000, showing 90,000 for Prohibition in the rest of Sweden. Stockholm thus defeats Prohibition.

THE LITTLE TOWNS.

Great cities are little wonderful;

I love their domes of smoke

And miles and miles of avenues

Crowded full of folk.

And no man looks at mountains

More lovingly than I

When sunset paints them sharp and clear

Upon the western sky.

I love the lilac fringe of foam

Along the summer sea,

And every tossing mile of blue

Is beautiful to me;

I love the quiet havens

Where the white looming sails

Slip softly in at twilight

With casks and costly bales.

But best I love the little towns

With leisure to be wise,

Brooding over many things,

With quiet in their eyes.

The little towns are my best friends,

Most innocent and dear—

Oh, these I have loved best of all

For many a happy year.

Even Time is good to them,

Affable and kind,

Weathering and shaping them

Slowly to his mind,

Ripening their beauty

While the seasons run,

Touching them most tenderly

With rain and wind and sun.

Rome, Paris, London,—

Boston, if you will,—

Have a million lovers

Who will love and praise them still.

I shall praise the little towns

While I am given breath—

Concord Town and Stratford

And little Nazareth.

—ODELL SHEPARD, in Youth's Companion.

THE WHITE FEATHER.—A family of Quakers settled in a remote part of Pennsylvania, then exposed to the savage incursions of the Indians. They had not been there long before a party of Indians, panting for blood, started on one of their terrible excursions and passed in the direction of the Quaker's abode. Though disposed at first to assail him and his family as enemies, they were treated with such open-hearted confidence, and with such cordiality and kindness, as completely disarmed them of their purpose. They came forth, not against such persons, but against their enemies. They thirsted for the blood of those who injured them; but these children of Peace, unarmed and entirely defenceless, met them only with the accents of love and deeds of kindness.

It was not in the heart even of a savage to harm them, and on leaving the Quaker's house the Indians took a white feather and stuck it over the door to designate the place as a sanctuary not to be harmed by their brethren in arms. Nor was it harmed. The war raged all around it; the forest echoed often to the Indians' yell, and many a white man's hearth was drenched in his own blood; but over the Quaker's humble abode gently waved the white feather of peace and beneath it his family slept without harm or fear. Footprints and Waymarks, by JOSEPH WALTON.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

SELECTIONS FROM LETTERS FROM ESTHER M. WHITSON.

CHÂLONS SUR MARNE,

Fifth Month 3, 1922.

Four weeks and nine days have passed in the Maison Maternelle. This is a clear, warm, sunny day, the first wholly clear day since I arrived here. Mlle. Merle reminded me at tea that now I am in "sunny" France. I'm sitting in the high grass behind our barracks. It is a big field full of meadow larks, fast being driven out of nesting-places by the sturdy plowman.

When I came "off duty" at two P. M. (on First-day) I rushed across the pleasant city to the new Maison where I was to meet two English girls. We took a grand walk along the canals, crossing bridges till we came to the Marne. This we followed for a couple of miles, coming to the town again at the railroad station. The canals are as green as the grass that borders them. Tiny little daisies and Star of Bethlehem skirt the river. We took a "tram" past the old Cathedral. In the yard was a garden and the most gorgeous pansy-bed I ever saw. Grass-plots separated the pansies from blue masses of Forget-me-nots. I did wish mother could see it.

We saw civilians, pinked in red and yellow, going or coming from "mass." The styles of the really well-to-do people are beautiful—long, full skirts, neatly-fitting waists and drooping, rose-bud hats. But aside from those on "Sunday promenade," the stores are all open. They are building and plowing and hauling. The circus is in full swing. Only the bank is closed, and the Post Office.

Fifth Month 5th.—Have been working in the new hospital all day. We move on the thirteenth. The place is beautiful. I wish I could show you the garden with shade trees and benches and a tennis court. And the children's play-room! It is more like a rich man's nursery than a hospital. Really, with Mlle. Merle here and things as they will be, we should not call it a hospital, but a home, a shelter, a big play-house for stray waifs and a resting-place for tired, hard-working mothers. Mlle. Merle hates the name "hospital," because she wants love and loyalty always, rather than "system" and "regulation." So long as she is here, however, we shall not become devoid of system, nor be militarized, neither be extravagant nor penurious, Catholic nor Quaker.

Fifth Month 13th.—THE MOVING. This is the fourth time in the experience of Mlle. Merle that the hospital, its occupants and possessions, has been moved on account of war or change of location. Also bear in mind that it is a maternity hospital, involving wee babies and expectant mothers. We were weary the day before the moving from a long day at the new house doing the final everythings. Those who were not at the new place had been packing all day at the old place. Late at night we all packed our own suitcases. Our trunks had gone already. At five o'clock A. M. the heartless night-nurse rang the big bell long and loudly. We jumped from our brief repose as though not stiff from the day before. It was clear and cool. Thanks for that! We slid into our clothes, then tore our beds to pieces, rolled them up and bound them with ropes and dragged them to the place to be loaded. We drank our coffee without sitting down, and at six o'clock A. M. a camion arrived with two men to load while we carried out the stuff. We emptied the barracks, closed the door and departed forever from the old, wooden shelter erected so suddenly by our Mission boys in 1918, and stripped as suddenly of its homeliness by Mission girls in 1922.

However, the progress of our loading was interrupted by the seventh child of Madame ——. The men were stupid but they understood "Allez Vite." I shall never forget the smile of that poor, suffering woman as, resting on the mattress in the half-loaded van, she leaned her white face against the faithful nurse and waved goodbye to all the anxious aids and workers who stood watching the departure of the first camion. I went with the second camion carrying expectants and big babies. When we arrived, half a dozen men with cameras were at the entrance and shot our pictures. The third and last camion brought the bed-ridden mothers and wee babies. Mlle. Merle rounded up the remains and departed on her faithful bicycle.

Of course the new baby had its picture taken, too, being the first in the new Maison Maternelle. It had new clothes such as its mother had never seen, as she rested in the sweet, clean ward with the sunshine filling the beautiful chamber. This peasant woman cried softly as I hugged her baby for her and told her how brave she had been. This hospital is about the size of the West Chester Homeopathic. It is all on a level. It is homelike. We have new dishes, a set for each meal. That is the French way—a breakfast set of black and yellow, a dinner set of white, a tea set of yellow and a supper set of white. We drink from tumblers. We have enough chairs for all of us to sit down at once—there are fourteen of us. The way Mlle. Merle carries two languages and all else is wonderful. I shall never forget the day we moved even though I live a century.

Sixth Month 6th.—Last First-day was Whitsunday. It struck me funny to have Whitsun's Day a national holiday in France. It is a bank holiday in England also. The big event which always takes place is the Horse Show. At the same time also Paris launches her world of fashion. This town being smaller and more provincial, one would have guessed there would be small array of costumes, but it was gorgeous. Behold! The hospital is separated in the rear by only a flower-garden from the Country Race Track. Well, — and — paid five francs to sit in bleachers, while the rest of us who were "off duty" hung out the windows of the upper floor and saw the whole thing. Of course all the men were military, not a man in civilian clothes. French, Italian, English and even three American uniforms. The women were both cheap and gorgeous. The horses were from the garrison and it was all stunts in jumping and hurdling.

Next thing is a sadder tale, but like the moving, it has left an impression I shall remember. Melvin Cawl left us today for good. For the past four days he has been trying to wind up his work. He has hardly stopped to eat or sleep. The London Committee meets tomorrow and he is having to go by air to be there on time. Day and night our faithful Daniel (a Russian, well known to the Mission at Grange) has helped him plan and pack. We loaded him in with his luggage and he shook hands. He did not look back till he got to the gate when he turned and waved his hat in his last goodbye. If he gets to America, I hope he will eat and rest. We all felt too badly to eat breakfast the morning he left us.

"Into the ocean of Thy peace,
Almighty One, my thoughts would flow;
Bid their unrestful murmuring cease,
And Thy great calmness let me know."

NOTES FROM THE SERVICE FIELD.

IMPARTIAL American investigators have confirmed the reports on the Russian famine situation which the American Friends' Service Committee has been circulating since mid-summer. The Philadelphia Public Ledger of Tenth Month 18th, in a special cable despatch from Moscow, summarizes the findings of Graham Taylor and Allen Wardell, of the Commission on Russian Relief of the National Information Bureau. These men went to Russia to conduct an investigation of the Russian famine situation for the benefit of the contributing public in the United States. They now report that the famine during the coming winter will be as bad in some districts as it was last year. They agree with the Friends' workers that relief must be continued through the coming winter and that animals to cultivate the ground must be imported to terminate the vicious circle of famine years.

A SURVEY being carried on under the supervision of the Friends' Mission likewise points to the need for continued relief in Russia. This survey aims to make a complete analysis of the food resources of each family in the Friends' district. The results from three of the volosts (townships) are now completed. In the best of these volosts, 84 per cent. of the population will need to be fed by the end of the year; while in the worst, practically 100 per cent. will depend for their existence upon relief administered by the Friends.

AFTER two joint meetings of the Executive Board and the Finance Committee of the American Friends' Service Committee, the budget for the coming year's work has been decided upon. This budget totals $4,350,000 in cash and kind, to be used for relief and reconstruction in Russia, Austria and Poland. The enthusiastic support of every Friend is needed to carry forward the progress as planned. In no way can the Society of Friends more effectively express its ideals than in helping to carry on the service of love which this program embodies.

ALL kinds of letters come to the Service Committee office. Here is one just received:—

"Gentlemen:—Yours of September 6th just at hand and in reply will say we have come to the conclusion that helping the Russians only adds to their misery. If they cannot get down to peaceful living when being helped, it may be better to discontinue helping them until they do so. We want to better the needy, but do not favor kindling a fire."

This letter indicates just two things: first, how much more responsibility for loving service of relief lies upon those whose eyes are not blinded by prejudice; and secondly, what a great service Friends can render by counteracting such misunderstandings with their larger knowledge of the field and vision of its needs.

One friend of the Service Committee this week contributes a check for $2,000 for the European relief work. How many more will give or obtain this amount during the next two weeks?

SOLOMON F. YODER was one of the members of the French Mission who was charged with aiding the families of the German prisoners who were associated with the work in France. During the past summer he has received many letters, calling for relief, from the families of former prisoners.

The Service Committee will be glad to forward to such families any donations made for the purpose.

A RECENT letter from Edith M. Pye (London) gives most encouraging news of the Maternity Hospital at Châlons, France, which was built by the Friends as a permanent memorial of the work of the French Mission. This letter is based upon a report given by Lily Mason, who has just visited the hospital. She reports that the wards are all full; that the patients are so satisfied that many of them make voluntary donations for the upkeep of the hospital; and that the money received from the Prefecture and the patients has, so far, practically covered running expenses. The weekly baby consultations are increasing in number; and home visiting will soon be undertaken in connection with them. The staff includes French, English, American, Peruvian and Alsatian girls. Edith M. Pye concludes: "I believe that great developments for the welfare of infants and children in that part of France, will take place as a direct result of the Friends' gift."

THE American Friends' Service Committee has sustained a great loss in the death of Cecil Cloud, a former member of the Unit in Serbia. He went to Serbia with the first group of workers. His loyalty, ability to work harmoniously with government and local officials, and his keen insight into relief and reconstruction problems, made him of great value to the Unit. Mission members who knew him will miss his boyish face and his man's presence. It is good, however, to think of him as still

"... faring on, as dear
In the love of there as the love of here."

THANKS FOR A SHAWL.

"For American Friends' Service Committee. A bit of comfort, I trust, to Russian refugees or others. A shawl brought by my parents from Scotland."

We find this note pinned to a warm grey shawl that comes out of one of the bales from Philadelphia. The Quaker worker in the Gamaleyevka warehouse along the Tashkent railroad, holds up the shawl and remarks: "What a serviceable, lasting thing this will be. What a big all-enveloping piece of cloth."

Just then the Director of the new Children's Patronat No. 91 at Novo Sergeevka steps up and hands us a carefully-drawn list of the clothing needs of his 115 orphaned famine children, for the coming winter. They expect to have beds, real beds, at least one for every two children. That makes 57 plus bed-covers needed. "Do you have any covers suitable for the winter?" the Quaker worker inquires. "Not a thing," answers the Director apologetically.

A few moments later the Director and his assistant are loading on to three deep-bottomed telegas piles of clothes. I suppose there must be at least two full bales in the lot. Among the other things they pile on are some bed-covers. The warm, grey Scottish shawl is one of them.

To-morrow night it will be covering the bed of Ivan Petrovitch, an "all-around orphan" and a member of the Children's soviet at the new Patronat in Novo Sergeevka.

These early days of autumn are cool and rainy and the nights are cold. You need bed-covers in Novo Sergeevka these nights. Ivan Petrovitch thanks the American lady who sent him his.

Other little Russian orphans are still waiting for theirs. Has thee a shawl or a warm coat to send them? If so, send it to American Friends' Service Committee—Store Room, Fifteenth and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

A BRIGHT, warm afternoon was favorable for the gathering of boys and girls at Arch Street Meeting-house on Tenth Month 28th. At two p. m. from sixty to seventy gathered in the West Room, and after a few words of welcome, all united in reciting the First Psalm.

Richard C. Brown then spoke simply and helpfully on Worship, after which we settled down to a brief silent meeting, in which the spirit of worship was felt.

Then, in the Committee-room, Elizabeth S. Pennell and Mary J. Moon conducted a lively game of Quakerism. Names of people and places of note, known to Friends, lettered upon cards, were held up, and claimed by those who could tell something about them. Those who failed passed to the other side, as in a "spelling bee." The names covered a wide range from "George Fox" and "Mary Fisher" to "Wm. B. Harvey" and "207 Walnut Place." As Mary Fisher seemed quite unknown, Hannah P. Morris was asked to tell her story as Violet Hodgkin has given it in "Silver Slippers." John Pim Carter followed with a lively talk, which held the attention of his audience.

Then the sunshine beckoned, and the delicious apples, given by two kind Friends from Jersey, with trays of candy, were enjoyed, along with soccer in which the fathers almost outran their small sons, and toboggan coasting—while the mothers chatted and watched. One foreign-born mother, with her child, came in from the street, accepted our refreshment, and stayed with us, though she could speak but little of our language, seeming to feel a friendly atmosphere.

So it was "a good time," and though we would have welcomed more children, we hope that to those who came, the dear old Fourth and Arch house and grounds will have gained another happy and helpful association.

RHOADS LONG LASTING BELTS

SOME operators use substitute belts because they are cheap, others have not had good leather belts. A poor leather belt is no better than a substitute belt.

When you know the advantages, the satisfaction, the economy of GOOD LEATHER BELTS, you will hardly care to use any other.

Rhoads Belts are good belts. They are built with conscientious skill from carefully selected leathers. They are long lived, close gripping, and so good that you want them the next time.

UNITY AMID DIVERSITY.

As we survey the outer world we cannot but see that a perfect whole comes not from having all its parts alike, but from the existence of dissimilar parts so related that the entire structure functions properly.

We recall the strong passage in Romans xii, which teaches this same thing, and the application of the figure to the Church. "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office, so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." This figure is further developed in 1 Corinthians xii: "For the body is not one member but many," etc., the different members being presented as questioning whether they are of the body, because they are not something else than what they are. Their doubts are set aside by the assurance, "But now hath God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased Him," and each one is to fill his office as best he can, "that there should be no schism in the body."

This harmonious diversity being everywhere recognized in the Divine economy, what lessons it may teach us! The various children in a family or school have different powers and traits allotted them. Trained, regulated though these must be, how vain and wasteful is it to try to reduce them all to the same mould! The individuality of each child is to be respected by others and by himself. "It is not worthwhile for Peter to try to be Paul, nor for Paul to try to be Peter; but rather that Peter shall be the best Peter possible, and Paul the best Paul possible." In words to this effect did Mary Lyon impress upon her pupils at Mt. Holyoke their duty of self-development.

Yet how difficult it is to keep from judging another because he does not act just as we do, because he does not think just as we do! One great liberty we should allow our friends, one great means of keeping the peace with them, is not to trammel them by insisting over-much on their coming up (or down) to our standards. For in the very diversity of views, resulting from diversity of gifts, developed amid endless variations in environment, and leading to services typified by parts played by the foot, the hand, the ear, the eye, in this diversity, we repeat, lies the strength of society and its proper functioning, provided "there be no schism in the body."

But we do have schisms in many bodies: in the body politic, in the body industrial, in the body religious, alas! and perhaps saddest of all, in the body domestic, where there should be that harmony and happiness, which Cowper calls "the only bliss of Paradise that has survived the Fall." These bodies are at times melancholy spectacles of disunion. Wherefore? The unifying power is missing, that great Spirit which would bring all elements into harmony, "baptize" them, to use Paul's expression, "into one body." "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" Not unless there is some force binding them together more strongly than that which tends to sever.

Is it possible, then, for us to live in peace and harmony with those who are on opposite sides of most important moral and religious questions? Questions that we regard as fundamental, having but one right aspect? To be concrete, is it possible for a Catholic and a Protestant so to respect each other's religious persuasions and motives that they can keep "the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," when in close intercourse one with another?

To come still nearer home, is it a thing to be imagined that in 1827 our ancestors could have tolerated—yes, more than that—could have exercised kind forbearance and affectionate respect toward those who differed from them on doctrinal matters, and that they could have remained as one body?

To realize a oneness of feeling and of spiritual interests with those of other denominations it is needful that both we and they shall be baptized by the one Spirit. Union of organizations alone will not do it. Far from it. But if both sides are prayerful and sincere, striving for the highest good, there is every reason to think that unity of spirit may obtain even while we and they cling conscientiously to some dissenting views. Spiritual unity with our comrades is capable of growth, a growth to which each of us is summoned; and there is no better or surer way to attain it than by having our spirits in accord with the Father of spirits. Then distrust and censure of others will in great measure pass away—and in their place will come understanding, respect and love, bringing nearer the time when "All shall be one." A. S.

"Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."
1 Cor. xvi.—13.

"We kneel how weak, we rise how full of power.
Why therefor should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong,
That we are ever overcome with care,
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled, when with us is prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee?"

"FORBEAR to nurse your grievances, nor let them corrode your soul, they'll die if you forget them."

Limitation in Amusements.

I wish to touch briefly on three points relating to the question of proper recreation and amusements.

First, I would emphasize the necessity of approaching the matter only with an open mind, and with a sympathetic understanding of the viewpoint of others. It is very easy to be over-critical of the habits and practices of other people,—especially easy for us who are older to view with alarm the apparent frivolities and indulgences of the younger generation. As a matter of fact, I doubt if this apparent change in our young people is much if any greater, relatively, than with most of us in middle life. If we compare our own method of living with that of our parents when at our age, we can hardly fail to see how less rigid we are, less sure of absolute right and wrong, less exacting of ourselves, more lenient in our judgments. We must expect similar changes or even greater in the young. We are all victims of modern conditions, which have arisen, we know not how. The quiet-moving, simple life of a generation ago, mostly in farm-homes, has given place to the complex, surging life of to-day. Invention and discovery have brought an increased convenience of living, but they have also brought a very greatly increased complexity. The war has broken many old moorings, and has given us few new ones. The keener competition of business has brought a certain feverishness into commercial life; the automobile, though giving us a greatly broadened horizon, tends to unsettle our home-life; the character of the Sabbath has changed; even the claims of religion press on us less certainly.

Our young people are conscious of these changing standards of their elders; they find themselves thrown into a complexity of life which is confusing, and which is certainly not of their making. It is little wonder that in their bewilderment and uncertainty they sometimes follow new paths.

The particular kind of amusement on which my mind is most divided is the motion picture. Its possibilities for both good and evil are manifold. I fully recognize its value in education. Edison is only just in his criticism of our educational methods. When he says, "You teach by word; you should teach by eye; you can teach children almost anything by means of moving pictures," we recognize the truth of his position. The motion picture is the culmination of steady progress in methods of graphic representation. The eye catches at a glance far more than an hour of verbal explanation might give. From time immemorial the blackboard or its equivalent has been an indispensable part of the equipment of every school-room. The modern text-book is of necessity rich in illustration. The photographic plate carries the student of geography, history and science far afield. The word-pictures which Dallas Lore Sharp gives us of wild bird-life off the Oregon coast are wonderfully vivid, but they become trebly vivid and lasting through the marvellous slide thrown on the screen. But the pencil-sketch or photographic cut can show us at best only a static activity; the motion picture clothes the shadow of life almost with life itself, and opens up avenues of knowledge which are wholly new. None can deny the value of the motion-picture in the school and college class-room.

I recognize also its very great value in the education and entertainment of the masses. Its inexpensiveness brings it within the reach of the very poor, and affords a cheering and helpful relief to the monotony of their life; when properly used, it becomes a most useful agency for popular education and wholesome entertainment.

Unfortunately, like nearly all great inventions, it becomes a harmful as well as a helpful agency. Too frequently it descends to cheapness and vulgarity. Its promoters are seldom men of high purpose or principle. Their god is the dollar, and they cater only to public demand. Censorship may rule out actual indecency and such scenes as may prove an incentive to crime. But far too many films show life at its cheapest and border on the vulgar and the suggestive. They open up to our children, brazenly and invitingly, phases of life which are far removed from our Quaker standards. They too frequently make mockery of the purity and sanctity of the home. And I can not believe that our children can attend with any frequency the film-plays of the average movie, and maintain a clean, wholesome, innocent outlook on life. The comic section of the Sunday paper seldom does more than cheapen our appreciation of art and humor, but the movie lowers our standards and values and cheapens our morals.

This criticism does not apply to the better films in the better houses of our large cities, but I believe it does apply to a great many of them, and is almost universally true with the vast majority of motion picture houses in the smaller cities and villages throughout our country.

I think we should all be cautious, young and old, of the influences which draw us away from the possibilities of self-entertainment in our leisure hours. It is a pity to become enslaved to the necessity of "being entertained." There came recently to my attention the case of a father and mother and little boy who had apparently not solved the problem of contented and useful evenings at home. Almost every evening the automobile carried them off to the movie, the theatre or the beach. There seemed little enjoyment for them unless they were "on the go." One evening as the lad was called in from his play to get ready for the inevitable trip, he exclaimed, "Do we have to go away again?"

The quiet enjoyments of home, an interest in the beauties and mysteries of the natural world about us and the wonders of the evening sky above, the zest which comes with hearty outdoor life and work and play, seem to me to bring a joy and satisfaction which is lasting and untarnished and which is always at our hand.

GEORGE L. JONES.

AMUSEMENTS.

Some subjects, for example, the ministry, are of inexhaustible interest to Friends. Amusements is not one of them. Of it we are in danger of saying and hearing too much. Perhaps if it were taboo for one year in our journals and meetings for discipline we should all be the better for the silence. However, the very fact that we talk so much about it and listen to so much advice on the subject (and perhaps give it) and publish symposia thereon affords good barometric data, as I presume Rufus Jones would say, for determining our spiritual climate. Three sets of persons at least do not have any problem of amusements. Those given over wholly or for the most part to luxurious mental and bodily living never stop to question the propriety of any sort of entertainment. We are not such a body, either as a whole or in any large part. A group of narrowly-guarded persons, like members of a monastery or convent, with a routine completely determined by an external set of rigid rules, would not need to ponder over the whether or not of certain forms of recreation. Again, a group that is setting a prepared people afire by their apostolic fervor, as did the early Christians and Quakers and Methodists, certainly would not spend much time in deciding what they might and might not do. It's the half-way between bodies that are worried. The fact that they are worried means either that they are not worldly enough or not apostolic enough. Regardless of implications, one may remark that our English Friends do not seem to write or talk much about this question. They are about a generation ahead of us in their new career as effective laborers in the vineyard of this world that so desperately needs trained and efficient pruners and diggers, sowers and reapers. The writer is an arrant and confessed Anglophile, and what he says about England may need discounting. But perhaps they are so busy in their various arduous labors that the question of amusements as a serious topic for debate sinks into the oblivion where it belongs among a group of Christians devoted to alleviating or making themselves ready to alleviate the sufferings of humanity.

I do not care to go into any discussion of various sorts of amusement. It is of course a matter of very great importance, because what a person does in his leisure time both shows what he is and makes him still more that sort of person. But we may find a general view of the whole matter which contains large elements of hope. Our own Yearly Meeting is producing great numbers of young persons who have (comparative) leisure and money and about whom are no effective fences. But there is not yet, though it is growing, an atmosphere or an operating system of thrilling and compelling services, the challenge of which every person must face. I remember, if I may without offence refer to England again, that I was visiting near Birmingham and I was taken in hand by some Friends interested in Adult Schools. This work at that time engaged exhaustingly the services of large numbers of the most vigorous young and older people all over England. We arose at about five in the morning, and after breakfast bicycled away to a seven o'clock meeting of about a dozen workers. After a devotional period we scattered to various early morning schools, and then went to a regular meeting for worship. It was a regular First-day program for most of them week in, week out. Now that was a sort of service that disposed entirely of all problems of amusement.

It is not at all in my mind that we promptly start or revive Adult Schools (I worked in one for two years and it was, in truth, hopeless work, though intensely interesting). We have our philanthropic labors. If they have not yet the range and sweep of interest that may be found elsewhere, time may remedy that. Perhaps new labors that fit the genius of this generation are ready at hand, waiting for volunteers. We must remember that our awakening as a Yearly Meeting to modern fields of service is of comparatively recent date. We are, too, in a position to be somewhat hard of hearing in regard to upsetting demands. Many of us live comfortably on ancestral estates both of land and money, with our friends and relatives at hand. Our horizons are not yet compelled to be world-wide by having a brother or a sister or a life-long kinsman living in South Africa, Australia, India, Madagascar or China. We do not come from migratory pioneer families, with uncles and cousins and nephews and nieces in ten widely scattered States of the Union, none of them rooted for generations on one spot. The process of our education will be slow. But it certainly will be sure. Indeed, the war widened our bounds immensely, and the impetus of those various services will never spend itself, but will increase with the growing years.

Perhaps this will be highly objectionable to some persons who will quote the oft-heard verse about running without being sent. I have just finished reading the last of the Rowntree series on Quaker history. Nothing stands out in my mind so sharply as the fact that human agency was frequently effective in rousing some doubting man or woman to a great service. Cobden came to John Bright when the latter was desolated by the death of his wife and gave him a clear call to the labor to which he devoted much of his life, lifting the burdens from the English laborer. Woolman labored assiduously among Friends, educating them in regard to the incompatibility of a Christian profession and holding slaves. Shall we allow a slave-holder to say: "If the Lord desires me to release my slaves, he is able to make His will known to me without suggestions from thee, John Woolman?" A too great and exclusive insistence on the necessity of purely individual call, itself a sound and fundamental principle, unaccompanied by constant education, especially of the younger element of our Society, may result in a quietism that will be a convenient cloak for timidity and laziness. Consequently, when we are considering the question of amusements and a generation of well-to-do Friends, it seems to me not only legitimate but essential to dwell on the peculiar tasks that seem to await our Society in this generation, holding out to all Friends large opportunities for sacrifice and service.

There is one source of amusement that we do not sufficiently emphasize; this is scholarship, in the sense of a thorough mastery of some definite department of knowledge or human activity. We greatly need all over America more men and women of scholarly habits, not among professional teachers, though they are needed there too, but among active business men. A young man or woman just out of college might well decide to take one field of human endeavor as a special field of study, resolving to know as much about it by the time he is forty as anyone else in the world. In a sense it does not make much difference what he chooses; the discipline of the process, and the by-products of information and broadening interests that will result are rewards in themselves. But there are many topics of interest; it is easy to name some of them off-hand: capital and labor, Negroes in America, women in industry, the country church, the casual laborer. It will take some years of gradual accumulation of knowledge to make a person able to speak with authority on any of these topics. Or if these practical problems of society are unattractive, there is an inexhaustible source of interest and profit in many phases of history, art, literature and science. The discipline is an admirable one. It rounds out the one-sidedness that is apt to result from a too deep absorption in business and physical recreation; it begets a quiet steadiness of temper that enables one to weigh the various concerns that come before us as we grow up into the age of responsibilities.

The question of giving advice to young people on the subject of amusements needs perhaps more thought than we give to it. Not everyone is qualified to give counsel on this difficult subject, in regard to which a wise silence is not seldom the best course to pursue. Anything like a censorious tone or a mere traditional repetition of time-worn verses and admonitions probably does more harm than good. Only a person of known warm sympathies with the feelings and point of view of younger persons had better try this hazardous approach; one who sees much of them, knowing their thoughts and speaking their language. Above all let him have this qualification, let his horizon be broad and his eye on the future of our Society.

On the other hand, we need not be afraid to say what we really feel, out of fear lest we antagonize those who do not see as we do. We need not conceal our belief that it is easy to become so absorbed in pleasant habits of life not themselves intrinsically wrong that the larger spiritual concerns no longer have power to compel our attention. Nor need we to hesitate to state emphatically our belief that certain forms of recreation, by reason of their touching more nearly than others certain complicated responses in human beings, tend to slacken the tension of mental and spiritual activity. Let us go squarely to our young people and, showing them what our Society has done in the past and what it has before it to do, ask their help, and urge them to expect to accomplish great things for the kingdom of God, either under the Quaker banner or some other sign. As for older Friends, they must do everything they can to create an atmosphere out of which dedicated lives may naturally spring. Invite your children to a high, strenuous life, educate them in the needs of the world, bid them prepare for lives of hard, steady application, and forget all about this problem of amusements.

CARROLL T. BROWN.

Methuens, the London publishers, announce in their new autumn catalogue of forthcoming books under the heading of "Comfort and Cheer," A DIARY FOR THE THANKFUL HEARTED, edited by our Friend, Mary Hodgkin, of Darlington. (6s. net).

They state that "The central thought in the quotations from writers past and present, which are here collected and presented in an attractive form for each day of the year, is that of thankfulness—a thankfulness unforced and real, and devoid of sham sentimentality or prompted gaiety. The volume is intended to bring refreshment when life seems difficult."

REPRESENTATIVE MEETING.

There was a large attendance at the Representative Meeting held Tenth Month 20th, forty-four being present.

At this opening session after the summer recess, the need of Divine guidance and help in the service as representing the Yearly Meeting was weightily and feelingly expressed.

There was full approval of the suggestion of George M. Warner, Clerk, that this meeting should authorize brief minutes of approval and sympathy for our fellow-members, Alfred C. Garrett and Agnes L. Tierney, who have recently left for religious service in European countries.

Report was made on behalf of the committee appointed to propose, if way opened for it, some means by which more time might be secured to conduct the business of the Yearly Meeting, that the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders should, if agreeable to those concerned, hold two sessions on the Seventh-day prior to the opening of the general Yearly Meeting; this would then leave Third-day morning open for another session of the Yearly Meeting which should, for the present at least, allow sufficient time to conduct the business without undue pressure. No other change was contemplated. This plan as outlined was approved by the Meeting and the Secretary was instructed to communicate with the Clerks of Quarterly Meetings of Ministers and Elders. If all the Quarterly Meetings approve of the proposal, it will be expected that the two sessions of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders will be held on Seventh-day immediately preceding Yearly Meeting of 1923 and annually thereafter.

C. Wilfred Conard on behalf of the joint committee of this body and the Social Order group, reported definite progress in regard to some changes in the eighth Query: it is continued under appointment.

The committee in the Sacco-Vanzetti case reported that in view of late developments, it appeared quite likely that a new trial may yet be granted; the additional evidence in hand seems to be favorable to the defendants.

The Secretary was requested to inform the meeting in regard to developments of the Pennsylvania Church Federation as it affected our Religious Society; he stated that we were asked to send delegates to the annual meeting of the Federation to be held in Harrisburg early in Twelfth Month next; to appoint one of our number as a member of the Executive Council, and to make a very modest contribution to the annual budget; the activity is to some extent an outgrowth of the Inter-Church World movement; it does not advocate cessation of the proper individual functioning of the several Protestant religious organizations participating, but it does urge more co-operative Christian work in the state in joint Church capacity. The matter received weighty consideration; sympathy was expressed with the aims sought, though way did not open at present to do more than appoint delegates to attend the annual meeting above referred to. C. Wilfred Conard, Hannah P. Morris and Wm. B. Harvey were appointed delegates.

Some time was spent in considering in a general way the cases of political or war-time prisoners, seventy-six of whom are still held in Federal penitentiaries, most of them in Leavenworth. Visits had been made to Washington in order to gain fuller information as to the attitude of the Government towards these men. Telegrams in reference to this matter had been received and sent from the Secretary's office. These were read. The difficulties involved are generally known; the time does not seem ripe to urge a general Amnesty Bill before Congress, though it is felt that most of these men should be set at liberty.

Reference was made to the fact of a charter having been granted in the State of Delaware to the Ku Klux Society, its object being to secure financial aid, receive and hold property, etc. Headquarters of the organization is in Georgia. The action was deplored by different members of the meeting, but it was pointed out that the Governor of Delaware could do but little if anything in the premises; in an endeavor to uphold the credit of the State, and perhaps at least to discourage in the future, a repetition of such an unfortunate granting of alien charters, it was felt right to appoint a committee to prepare, if way opened for it, an address to the Governor of Delaware, to be delivered in person. Harold Evans, Frances T. Rhoads and J. Edgar Rhoads in connection with the Secretary, were appointed for the service.

With the Pennsylvania Legislature soon to meet, the subject of Capital Punishment was brought forcibly to our attention; there was discussion as to the character of a bill which might once more be placed on the calendar; it seemed the consensus of opinion that with the lowered moral tone in the community we could perhaps go no further than favor a bill placing the responsibility as to verdict in capital offences upon jurors, but that we should see to it that we let it be definitely understood that we still maintained our former stand which involves the abolition of Capital Punishment. The committee on Legislation and Public Welfare was asked to see that a Capital Punishment bill was prepared and presented to the approaching Pennsylvania Legislature.

The Charlestown committee presented a report; the suggested appropriations were approved and the Treasurer of the Yearly Meeting was authorized to pay $75.00 to Somerton Monthly Meeting, Va., $500 to Salem Monthly Meeting, Ohio, and $400 to Centre Monthly Meeting, N. C.

A communication had been received urging that uniform loose leaf Minute books should be used by all of our subordinate meetings; the suggestion was for various reasons fully approved though it was felt that no definite ruling should be adopted. The Secretary was requested to communicate with Clerks of the Quarterly Meetings informing of approval by this meeting of the proposition; the loose leaf Minute books used by the Men's and Women's Yearly Meeting and this Meeting are recommended. W. B. H.

STONY BROOK MEETING.

To residents of Trenton and Princeton, and vicinity, Stony Brook means a delightfully secluded little stream that meanders peacefully between banks skirted by graceful willows, stately elms and maples, and sturdy oaks, and passes close to "the Quaker church"—as it is popularly called. The house, a small, quaint, stone building, is a real landmark in history, for it stands to-day as it did over one hundred and fifty years ago, and bears mute evidence of that epoch-making struggle early in the year 1777—the Battle of Princeton.

As no meeting had been held at Stony Brook for more than a quarter of a century, residents of the neighborhood responded with real enthusiasm to the first appointed meeting, held within the present decade. That the interest manifested at that time was live and genuine, subsequent meetings, including that held on First-day afternoon, Tenth Month 15th last, have proved. It is interesting to note that the house was filled, upstairs as well as down, with a company numbering some two hundred, in response to Arthur Pennell's request for a meeting.

We listened to living messages from Arthur R. Pennell, Edward T. Binns, Wm. S. Yarnall, James M. Moon and Max I. Reich, who reminded us that "we are not our own, for we are bought with a price." Yet, in order to keep our lives so consecrated that we may be fit instruments for service, we must not only become as little children in our Heavenly Father's sight, but we must ever seek to be refreshed by those secret springs from on high, which are ours for the asking. While the periods of silent worship were not long, they were felt to be times of valuable spiritual refreshment.

RUTH KIRKBRIDE.

The Friend (London) says: "The moral basis for a Treaty of Peace," issued by the Peace Committee of the Society of Friends in England, has appeared in extenso in the Radical Danish daily, Vejle Amstiderne, and in two other Radical dailies in Jutland. Our Friend Peter Guldbrandsen has sent the memorandum to some of the other prominent daily papers in Denmark, with a covering letter to their editors.

THE PIONEER.

Long years ago I blazed a trail
Through lovely woods unknown till then,
And marked with cairns of splintered shale
A mountain way for other men;

For other men who came and came:
They trod the path more plain to see;
They gave my trail another's name,
And no one thinks or speaks of me.

Another's name my trail may bear,
But still I keep, in waste and wood,
My joy because the trail is there,
My peace because the trail is good.

—ARTHUR GUTERMAN, in The Outlook.

CONFERENCE AT BIRMINGHAM.

At Birmingham Meeting House, Chester County, Penna., on Tenth Month 15th, was held what was termed a "Neighborhood Meeting." It was not a meeting for worship, but resulted from an effort on the part of a Committee of the Monthly Meeting to bring the neighbors together in closer fellowship. As in many rural communities a certain indifference prevails in Birmingham as to attendance at places of worship, while as regards social conditions extremes meet.

This neighborhood had been a stronghold of Friends from early times, the first Friends' meeting being held there in 1690, but as the centuries rolled by, Friends left the farms and their successors left the meeting-house for other places of worship or for none at all. To interest them in the past a historical sketch of Friends in Birmingham was prepared by Dr. Wm. T. Sharpless, with references to Wm. Brinton, the first settler, to Elizabeth Webb, "the first prophet of this church in the wilderness" and to other interesting residents, with description of the early life there.

To show the faith by which our Society stands, Alfred C. Garrett gave as his farewell message before leaving for Germany the next day, a feeling and beautiful address on "Why I Am a Friend," while Anne Biddle Sterling, a native of that locality, and who knew it well as a child, dealt with the subject of the treatment of our colored population, pleading for a better understanding of these wards of the nation, and a better observance of the Golden Rule in our association with them.

Shorter addresses of merit followed, and the meeting closed after a two hours' session with many expressions of interest and appreciation on the part of those present who remained to chat in a friendly way. The audience was composed largely of non-Friends—some Presbyterians, Episcopalians and Catholics. The Race Street Friends were cordially responsive and had helped to get up the company. One member of the Farm Bureau, temporarily in those parts, made haste to reach Alfred Garrett after the meeting to engage his interest in a son in Germany in the army of occupation.

It has not been without much effort that this audience of one hundred and fifty persons was gathered. Printed notices were sent out, an advertisement in the local paper spread the news, while perhaps most potent of all the persuasive influences, personal visits or appeals were made to some fifty families in the neighborhood, this last under the inspiration of the Young Friends' Committee, who kindly conferred with us on the venture and accompanied us in some of the calls.

We realize that all is not yet done. But perhaps a door has been opened for an appointed meeting for worship at a later date.

The paper by Dr. William T. Sharpless, alluded to in the foregoing, has been published in full in the West Chester Daily Local for Tenth Month 23rd. He has made a careful search of ancient records and compiled a very interesting history. We would be glad to give it place in THE FRIEND, for we know that many of our subscribers have ties of interest with Birmingham people, past and present, but the paper is too long to be used in this way. We are, however, tempted to quote the following, taken from the body of the paper, concerning Elizabeth Webb.

[Eds.]

While William Brinton was the first settler in this township (Birmingham) and probably the most influential man in the meeting, the real spiritual head of the meeting, the first prophet of this church in the wilderness, seems to have been Elizabeth Webb. She and her husband Richard came to Philadelphia from England in 1700 and settled in Birmingham in 1704. In 1715 Richard Webb was commissioned by the Governor Justice of the Peace and Judge of the County Court. He died in 1719. Their son was a member of the Provincial Assembly. It was Elizabeth Webb who, in 1721, conveyed to Birmingham Meeting one acre of ground on which the first meeting-house was built. . . . We have one or two glimpses of Elizabeth Webb which reveal her in very attractive colors.

In 1710 she returned to England on a religious visit and while there she made the acquaintance of one Anthony William Boehm, who was chaplain to Prince George of Denmark, the consort of Anne, Queen of England. To this chaplain she wrote a letter giving some details about her life and recounting some of her deep religious trials. This letter with the chaplain's reply has been preserved and published. In this letter she says: "I was baptized and educated in the way of the Church of England, and went to school to a minister thereof, whom I loved and honored greatly; he showed great kindness and tenderness to me. In those days I looked on the ministers to be like angels that brought glad tidings to the children of men. When I was about fourteen years of age I went to live at a knight's house, who kept a chaplain; I observed his conversation, and saw it was vain, and I thought it ought not to be so and was troubled in my mind. . . . And I saw that both priests and people did too generally "forget God" as soon as they came off their knees, or from their devotion. . . . When I was about fifteen years old, it pleased God to send the spirit of grace and supplication into my heart, by which I prayed fervently unto the Lord; there was a Divine breathing in my soul; I had no life in my forms of prayer, except that one which Christ taught His disciples, for which I have always had a reverent esteem. . . . When she was about nineteen years of age, finding her views to conform to what she knew of Friends, she joined with them in membership, but had many trials of faith and deep searchings of heart before she felt that she was established in the Divine favor. She subsequently felt a call to preach the Gospel, which she did to all the meetings of Friends in America and many in England, enduring great hardships in her journeys through this sparsely settled country.

On one of her trips to England she had the company of Thomas Chalkley, a minister of the Gospel and a sea captain whom Whittier speaks of as "gentlest of skippers, rare Sea-Saint." Thomas Chalkley has left this testimony with regard to her: "It was my lot to cross the sea from America to Europe in company with this servant of Jesus and her conversation and deportment had a tendency to draw peoples' minds toward God. Heavenly things it was her practice to speak, read and write, so that her conversation seemed to us to be in heaven whilst she was on earth. I have blessed the Lord that I was acquainted with her, she being like a mother to me in my tender years, not only so to me, but she was indeed a mother in the house of spiritual Israel." . . . According to a tradition the blue bottles or grape hyacinths which in my childhood bloomed in such profusion in the field adjoining this meeting-house were brought here by Elizabeth Webb and have escaped from her garden into the fields nearby. And in the early spring when these modest and beautiful little flowers spread their blue mantle over the field "may they remind us of the gentle and saintly Elizabeth, whose conversation seemed to be in heaven whilst she was on earth."

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TOBIJAH AND THE TUCKER TARHEELS.

MARGARET T. APPEGARTH.

Tobjiah had his hands full. More than full! For this is the story of "when pappy went to fight the war and never come back to the mountings." And without pappy, Tobjiah had the whole family on his hands. Somehow they seemed even more than they actually were, owing to their names: straight out of the Bible these came, for onct upon a time pappy and mammy had had a Bible—indeed they had, but when they made the moving—would you believe it?—that Bible "got losted!" So now that they were so completely out of a Bible it was a great comfort to mammy that parts of it were left securely fastened on her children. There were Tobjiah, Habbakuk, Solomon, Queen-of-Sheba (all in one piece you said her, or just Quee for short!), Bethlehem and Boanerges. For the next-to-the-last baby they had selected Pildash, thinking it would be easier to shout across the hills when he reached the running-away age. Meanwhile they called him Dash, for short.

The children never tired of questioning about this Book they came from.

"How come you ever found us in the Bible?"

Finally, in the secret of the family, they admitted that they had never read the front part of the Book at all,—it took a powerful lot of spelling to read even a page. ("Indeed it must!" gasped the little awe-struck Tuckers.) But way over in the back they had been fortunate enough to find some pages labelled in big letters "Proper Names." And if proper for Bible people, how very, very proper for the little Tuckers! It was the luckiest thing in the world that they had had a name all picked out for the newest baby, for you will remember that when they moved over the hills of North Carolina their Bible "got losted." But the name was firmly fixed in everyone's mind all ready for the baby: the very best name of all, pappy thought, for he had discovered that the oldest man in the world had been called "Methusaleh;" and before he went to war he used to pat his new little Methusaleh Tucker on the head and say: "Now quit your squawling, Thusey; I reckon you'd best save your breath till you gets old like pappy."

Methusaleh, however (who should have been a boy, of course, but wasn't), had her own ideas of life, and being quiet was not one of them.

There is something entirely different about Carolina mountain life. Even after you get the rocks out of them they lie, bias-fashion, upon steep hillsides and many a tarheel farmer has been known to tumble out of his own cornfield into a neighbor's! But Tobjiah did not have even that small comfort, as there was no neighbor near enough. "Just rocks and rills and templed hills."

And in the mountains of North Carolina life is especially different, somehow. All the log cabin homes look as if they had fallen by sheer chance into little clearings on the mountain sides.

O that Tucker log cabin! With its rough-hewn logs warped so wide apart that the cat and all her kittens could slip in or out of the chinks by day or night quite easily; and through those cracks br'r'r'r'r! how the mountain winds did whistle on chill evenings! But there was the open fire-place where mammy cooked the meals right on the hearth ("spits" and "cranes" and "baking boards")—just such a fire and just such a cabin as the one where Abraham Lincoln used to read and study and ponder years upon years ago. But, ah me, there was this difference between Lincoln and Tucker, for neither Tobjiah, Bakuk, Solomon or Queenofsheba could read or write a single word. Mammy had no book to teach them letters from, for one thing; and what's the good of reading anyhow, she probably thought, when there were nine hungry mouths to feed and Tobjiah must hoe and plant, Queenofsheba must be forever going down the hill to fetch a pail of water, while Habbakuk tended pigs, and Boanerges chopped wood, wood, wood! Thusey had the only really pleasant Tucker occupation, since lying on her back and howling came so very natural to her.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

SELECTIONS FROM LETTERS FROM ESTHER M. WHITSON.

CHÂLONS SUR MARNE,

Sixth Month 11, 1922.

The other day one of the nameless babies in the Pouponnière died of pneumonia. There was no one to go to the service, so Mlle. Merle asked me if I would get some one else to go with me as representing the hospital. The priest came with three small boys in surplice carrying the cross and holy-water. The blessing was pronounced very rapidly, water was poured over the tiny box, and off we started down the avenue. The procession consisted of, first, the three boys in surplices; second, the fat, square-jawed priest; third, the white frame with the baby-box on it carried by four men in livery; fourth, two nurses in mufti, one a Unitarian and one a Quaker.

We walked on and on and on till we came at last to a little hilltop where we looked down on a field of crosses. Passing a quarter-of-a-mile of them, we came to a tiny grave. The priest babbled some more, sprinkled more water and handed my companion the sprinkler. She, in innocent hypocrisy, sprinkled also. (We learned afterward that we were supposed to cross ourselves with holy-water.) We rather enjoyed the novelty of the parade through the streets, seeing the peasants bare their heads in respect for the dead, but we could not but feel the sadness of it. . . . It was not our way at least. After the final phrase was uttered the priest mopped his brow (the temperature was over ninety that day), called "Alex," and started his boys out of the cemetery. We, too, departed, leaving the body with the porters and the gravedigger.

Sixth Month 23, 1922.—The most exciting thing since the "inauguration" is a WEDDING in our midst. One of the French nurses fell in love with an army officer about six months ago. We all went to the marriage in the Catholic Church. . . .

Two priests and a bunch of choir boys conducted it. One boy rang a bell to indicate when we were to stand, or kneel, or sit. This made it easier for the unaccustomed Protestant to be at ease.

After about two hours of religious exercises, every one was supposed to rise and pass before the altar of the bride and kiss a highly-polished cross of brass, which was held by the priest. This was an unsanitary performance, and the two pews of Protestant nurses kept their seats in solemn unbelief. The fact is Mlle. Merle had told us not to do it; we should betray unbelief if we did, being members of another sect.

The Reception was held in the evening at l'Hotel de l'Europe. There had been a dinner in the afternoon but we had to be "on duty," so were not present, but in the evening we went. The men were officers in uniform. The women pretty and Frenchy. There were about twenty-five in all, the "middle-class" French I was told, not cheap but far from wealthy. We had music and dancing and games. The music was good, but the dancing was terrible—round and round and round. At ten-thirty we had a course supper. I declined the wines. My! Oh, my! this queer, wet country!

I am glad I do not live in Europe, where the rich are so exclusive and the poor are so wretched. The problem of poverty and luxury is a solemn one, and it is not easy always to know what is right. Hearts are draining blood of hate from the past war while at the same time every mother who bears a son wants him prepared (by military training) for the next one. Life today is a problem, isn't it! We need to think broadly, in order to see through the clouds of differences the dawning of international friendship.

Sixth Month 18, 1922.—Home must be pretty. France is pretty, too, in an odd, flat bright-colored way. The other evening I went out for a ride on my "wheel." The evening light was the same as at home only it reflected pink over churches, army barracks and low, flat fields of scarlet wild poppies. Yellow mustard is plentiful; bluebells are abundant, too. But imagine the scenery as I rode along—fields of green, fields in scarlet; fields in yellow, and next to them masses of blue! It was rather flashy, blowing there in the evening breeze, but it spoke a strange language, and I knew I was far from home.

Today is First-day (the day after the dedication of the hospital). Some English Friends are still with us—T. E. Harvey and wife, Hilda Clark, Edith Pye and others. We, the staff, are about "all in." After supper we gathered together with these splendid people and sat in solemn silence. It was the first united husband I had felt since leaving home, and oh, how it seemed to fill an aching void with comfort! T. E. Harvey broke the silence in his low voice, full of feeling, as he knelt in prayer. Edith Pye followed, and one or two others. To me these kindred spirits are most welcome. They bring a great blessing of comfort and assurance. Of course the French girls cannot feel it as we do. A number of the English girls had never been to a Quaker meeting.

THE "INAUGURATION." Well, the day began dull, but the sun came out about nine o'clock. The grass was green, the geraniums were blooming. Over the doorway of the main entrance hung the flag of the French Republic, and on either side of it blew out the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack. A temporary lattice-work of green vines had been constructed around the posts on which they hung. The yard and gardens were serene. The painters had put the last touches on the clock and the children's play-room at noon. At two o'clock the musicians arrived (forty of them) and took their places under the trees. The people began to fill the yard and garden. There were about five hundred people. I have referred to the English delegates. Who should turn up from America but, first, Robert and Katherine Maris; then Francis Bacon, from Berlin; next, Walter Abel, with his camera and his dusty shoes. We nearly ignored conventionality in the sheer joy of their nationality. Mlle. Merle moved about quite at ease although pulsing with responsibility, I know.

Indoors everything was tidy. There were flowers on the tables and every nurse was at her post. The band played "The Marseillaise" and Mlle. Merle led the way, followed by "the royal family," as we called the group with her—the Prêfêt, the Priest, the Doctors, the Mighty Rich and the English and American delegates. It was a day of days. How we had talked and planned and hoped for that procession! How we had mimicked Mlle. Merle, and how she had joked about leading the patriarchs! A wedding could hardly have been a happier moment for her. She explained to them in French.

When they came to the hall where the Memorial Tablet hung on the wall, Dr. Maris made a short speech about Friendship, and unveiled the Tablet:

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL OF THE MISSION DES AMIS.

by English and American Friends and their co-workers who during the agony of the World War and the years that followed

LA MAISON MATERNELLE DE LA MARNE

"And a little child shall lead them."

After the inspecting procession had passed, we followed to hear the speeches. The President of the French Committee made the first address with many cheers from the crowd. The band played the French national anthem. Then T. Edmund Harvey spoke and was the first to make the people smile, but as he continued he became grave so that some were in tears, as his quiet voice uttered their native tongue. He spoke without notes and he "takes" with the people. They say he uses beautiful French, but I could not understand all he said. Then the English anthem was played. As there was no American to follow, a Frenchman spoke, and the "Star Bangled Banner" ended the program. The aids then served all sorts of pastries and cakes. It takes the French to provide dainty pastry. At five P. M. we rushed indoors to our work.

HELP COUNTERACT THESE RUMORS.

The Service Committee needs the help of all its supporters in counteracting reports that famine conditions no longer exist in Russia.

That famine does exist has recently been confirmed from two authoritative sources. Allusion was made to these last week in our "Notes from the Service Field," but it is so important that Friends should possess the facts of the matter that we give below more complete details concerning them.

The first confirmation lies in a survey of the needs of each family in the Friends' district, made by Russian investigators under the supervision of the Mission. A letter from Carl Borders, dated Sorochinskoye, Russia, Ninth Month 23, 1922, gives the following details concerning this investigation:

"We are very much interested to see the results of our survey which was conducted under our own supervision and according to our questionnaire. The questions have been designed to show precisely what food resources will be available in every individual family after a sufficient amount has been left for seeding.

"I have on my desk a summary of the results from the first three volosts (townships) completed. Michaelovka Volost is one of the worst off of our area. It has a population of 7,150 and needs rations for 6,084 at once. By the end of the year we should be feeding there 7,022, or practically 100 per cent.

"Grafskaya Volost is one of the better ones. Here is a population of 7,632. Our survey shows 3,085 should be fed at once, and that by the end of the year we should be feeding 6,422, or 84 per cent.

"In Nova Sergeevka, which we regard as one of the best off of our Volosts, the figures are not yet complete, but there are sufficient in hand to show that of the 6,609 population, 2,675, or 42 per cent., should be fed at once. We hope to have the summary for this survey complete for the entire area at a very early date and will well inform you of our results at once."

The second confirmation of the famine emergency was made by trained American investigators entirely independent of Friends. It is outlined in the following despatch which was cabled from Moscow, and which was published in the Philadelphia Public Ledger:—

SPECIAL CABLE DESPATCH.

(Copyright, 1922, by Public Ledger Company.)

Moscow, Oct. 17.—Graham Taylor and Allen Wardwell, of the Commission on Russian Relief of the National Information Bureau, who came to Russia to conduct an investigation of the Russian famine situation for the benefit of the contributing public, are returning to the United States with the report that the famine during the coming winter will be as bad in some districts as it was last year.

Allen Wardwell, in an interview with your correspondent, said the splendid work of the American relief organizations will have been in vain unless relief work is continued. The famine area is more limited than last year. It covers the Tartar, Bashkir and Kirghiz republics and other districts east of the Volga with millions of peasant inhabitants. The famine in those regions, he said, would be more severe than in the winter of 1921-1922 because the population has already eaten all the livestock, dogs and cats.

The commission traveled miles without seeing plowed or planted fields. Men and women were seen here and there pulling plows themselves or wielding hoes and spades.

The members of the commission, who visited Samara, Kazan and Orenburg in the Urals, said that though the optimistic crop reports of the Soviet authorities and various relief organizations might have been justified when the crops first began to appear above ground, there was no question now that the harvest was insufficient for the needs of the population.

There will be no surplus and no grain for export purposes. The population above all needs animals to cultivate the ground and thus terminate the vicious circle of famine years. (The Friends' Mission, as one phase of its work, has already begun importing horses for the above purpose.)

FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS—POLISH FOLK-EMBROIDERY.

Here is a chance to relieve suffering in Poland by means of your holiday shopping! The Service Committee has just received a fresh consignment of embroideries made by Polish refugees. These goods, which consist mainly of runners, pillow-covers, and square table-covers, possess the simple beauty of folk-embroidery. They make gifts or personal possessions of high value, while the funds received from their sale will be used to aid the Polish refugee women during the hard winter which is before them.

These embroideries are on exhibition at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Interested persons who are unable to come to Philadelphia will be sent samples for selection upon request to the Secretary of Women's Work, Care of American Friends' Service Committee, at the above address.

The Service Committee also has for sale copies of two Christmas postcards containing reproductions of drawings by Viennese children.

SHIPPING HERE AND THERE.

Last winter the American papers harped on the demoralization of Russian shipping and the interference with relief work arising therefrom. There was at times delay in the expedition of goods in Russia; but that this was only to be expected, is indicated by the fact that there was, and still is, similar delay in America. Almost two months have been lost as a result of lack of cars due to the railway shop strike; while a considerable amount of flour has been damaged by being shipped in cars that were out of condition. Now a dockmen's strike may still further delay shipments which the Service Committee is trying to get off to Russia for the winter. Word from the field says that there is now no congestion on the Russian railroads and urges that relief shipments be made at once, before the winter snows make transportation more difficult.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Tenth Month 28, 1922—76 boxes and packages; 3 anonymous.

Contributions received during week ending Tenth Month 30, 1922—$2,906.79.

THE CHURCH AND INDUSTRY.—The Chicago Daily News in a recent editorial on "The Church and Industry," said: "The church, which must stand at all times on the side of righteousness and justice if it is to fulfil its mission, should make a constant appeal for the exercise of the spirit of good-will which inspires fair dealing. The 50,000,000 church goers of America have only to hear and heed the appeal in order that the industrial evils of the time may disappear. If the church is able to inspire its adherents with the desire for 'peace to men of good-will' its opportunity to take a leading part in putting an end to industrial strife lies at hand."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—Master Thomas has recently spent a month in visiting in the Middle West. He was a fraternal delegate to the Five Years' Meeting, held at Richmond, Indiana, and from there attended Ohio Yearly Meeting at Barnesville. He then spent some time in visiting West-town communities and families in Indiana and Ohio. Such visits are very helpful in making a closer contact between the School and distant alumni, and in bringing to them a more intimate knowledge of what is going on at Westtown.

Ample quarters are now provided in Industrial Hall for the Agricultural Department. The teaching of Agriculture has of recent years been carried on in the Botany room, but the adjoining room, formerly used by the Home Economics classes, has also been taken over, and both are remodelled, and furnished with modern equipment. The old "sled-room" in the basement is also being put in shape as a work-shop, to be supplied with forges and other iron-working equipment for use by students in the Agriculture and Manual Training classes.

The work in Home Economics is now being carried on in Room 16 in the main building, pending the erection of the new Home Economics building, recently authorized by the General Committee. Work on this building has just been begun. The location chosen is on the western slope of the girls' lawn, about midway between the gateway and the girls' porch, north of the tennis courts.

The Lake House is very frequently in use by groups of people from outside the School, especially over the week-ends. Recent gatherings there have been some representatives of the Young Friends' Movement, a group from this vicinity and the West Chester neighborhood who have spent winters at St. Petersburg, Fla.; and the League of Women Voters of Chester and Delaware Counties.

Samuel H. Brown, Edith M. Cook and Caroline L. Nicholson are carrying on advanced work at the University of Pennsylvania, mostly on Seventh-days.

The following class officers have been chosen: Seniors—President, George P. Lippincott, Jr.; Vice President, Mary E. Harold; Secretary, Edith D. Lippincott; Treasurer, James C. Roberts. First Class—President, Ingram H. Richardson; Secretary, Ruth Biddle; Treasurer, Edith Satterthwaite.

BARNESVILLE SCHOOL NOTES.—Barnesville Boarding School opened the twenty-sixth of Ninth Month with an enrollment of eighty-three children, forty-five of whom are girls and thirty-eight are boys. This is about the same number as a year ago. We have the usual number from Ohio and Indiana, some from Iowa, two from North Carolina, one each from Alabama, Massachusetts, Maryland and Canada. There have been some slight changes in the faculty since last year, William O. Foster leaving and Chester Emmons who has recently been attending Penn College taking his place in charge of Boys' Dormitory. Tacy E. Smith, a former Earlham student, takes the place of Elva Hodgson, who was married during the summer to Albert Maxwell of Plainfield, Indiana.

The year is starting out with the usual school activities. Two literary societies which have been in existence for a number of years have been organized and the usual games are being played on the playground. We are starting this year a course in Home Economics which we hope will prove of great advantage to our girls. Along with Manual Training for the boys it will add to the efficiency of the course.

Nutting and roaming around over these beautiful Belmont County hills gives much enjoyment to Boarding School life. An evening camp supper with games in the moonlight also has been an enjoyable experience of the opening weeks and we are looking forward to many pleasant days ahead.

Lectures by Paul Jones, Secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and by a returned worker from Russia are promised us in the near future.

LAST winter a conference of Ministers, Elders and Overseers of the Yearly Meeting was held at the Arch Street Meeting-house. The program on that occasion was somewhat too long to allow a reasonable time for discussion of the important topics that were presented, with this exception the meeting was felt to have been a very helpful one, the chief regret being that it had to be limited to the meeting officers as just enumerated.

Those who were chiefly responsible for that conference felt at the time that a duty rested upon them to give a like privilege to our membership at large, and with this in view the suggestion found favor that probably the wisest course would be to divide the Yearly Meeting geographically into three groups.

We are glad therefore to be able to announce that under the care of Frances Tatum Rhoads, George L. Jones, Rachel A. Carter and Samuel L. Jones such a meeting is already planned, to embrace the three Country Quarterly Meetings in Pennsylvania, Concord, Caln and Western. The Conference will be held at Media Meeting-house on Eleventh Month 25th, from five to nine p. m. The following program has been arranged:

A cordial invitation is hereby extended to a Conference embracing the membership of Concord, Caln and Western Quarterly Meetings, to be held at Media Meeting-house on Eleventh Month 25th, from five to nine p. m.

THE following letter from Leslie P. Hill, should interest scores of our readers who have a very warm place in their hearts for Cheyney Normal School:

"I am writing at my first opportunity as requested to say that we have had a very promising opening with a record attendance of 105 students. We have turned away scores of students because of our inability to give them accommodations. We have here only students of standard high school status, or of actual normal school grade. It seems that we are bringing our student body up to a better quality of preparation year by year. What we need here now most urgently is physical equipment, dormitories, class rooms, laboratories, gymnasium, training school, homes for teachers, a new dining hall and kitchen. All of these extensive improvements suggested here go together, and we are obliged to approach the next session of the legislature with a liberal building program requiring a substantial sum of money. We feel that the work we are doing here is so important that the law makers of Pennsylvania will not fail to put our program through.

We are very happy in having the full confidence of Dr., Finegan and the whole Department of Public Instruction as far as we have had contact with that department. We are happier still in the broad, liberal attitude which that department takes in our work. Cheyney is to be given the same recognition in every way that is accorded to the other thirteen normal schools in Pennsylvania.

"We are fortunate this year in making a start towards the improvement of our program by the addition of work in Latin and French. Katherine Robinson, a Wellesley graduate in the romance languages, has come to teach these subjects along with some English. We also strengthened our Natural Sciences here by calling to us Henry Hudson Phillip, a graduate of the University of London.

"The third important factor in our development here this year is the coming of the Home for Destitute Colored Children, which is to be conducted by a Board of Managers chosen from the Society of Friends. This Board has bought the adjacent Edkin farm, and are now erecting a fine stone building which will accommodate fifty little boys. These boys will attend our training school, and afford for our student teachers much more desirable experience than they have had in handling average class groups, and in all the problems of discipline.

"I sincerely trust that the members of the Richard Humphreys Foundation will continue to visit us here, and to help us as they have always helped by their presence, kindly counsel, and considerate interest.

THE Friends' Esperanto Society of Great Britain owes its origin to a small conference of Friends held at the Guest House, Bewdley, nearly a year ago. A second conference has just been held, and it is claimed that the International Language has made quite an advancement during the year.

"PATHWAY TO GOD," is Alexander C. Purdy's new book which is soon to be off the press. His book, "The Way of Christ," has been widely used. Alexander Purdy is known personally to many of our readers and as the author of numerous periodical articles he is widely known.

FROM the office of the American Friends' Service Committee comes the news of the marriage at Warsaw, Eighth Month 23, of Grace Hoff, one of our workers in Poland, to Wladyslaw Skosaczewski. An exchange remarks, We would term this, if not an unmentionable, at least an unpronounceable venture in international good-will.

THESE figures are significant. Haverford College has an enrollment of 212; Earlham, Indiana, 458; Guilford, North Carolina, 188; Wilmington, Ohio, 245; Penn. Haverford College has enrolled 212 students. It reports a high grade of scholarship in the student body and an excellent tone and feeling among the fellows. The resident students in the Graduate School number six and come from Maine (1), North Carolina (3), Iowa (2). It is hoped that Robert L. Simkin—a Haverfordian of 1903—will be able to spend part of his year's leave of absence as a member of the Graduate School.

The College has received 3000 volumes for the Library from the family of John E. Matzke, Professor in Leland Stanford University. Two of his sons recently graduated from Haverford. The College library now numbers over 90,000 volumes.

To succeed Walter S. Hinchman in the English Department, Austin K. Gray of Cambridge University, England, has been appointed for the year.

It is expected that the Matriculate Catalogue of Haverford College, which will be a solid volume of about eight hundred pages, will be available for distribution within two months. It will cost two dollars and will be of interest to all Haverfordians.

THE statement has appeared in print that there is a prospect of a visitation of young English Friends to America next summer. We hope there may be more than rumor in this.

EDWARD THOMAS, of New York City, formerly of Haverford College, has written for an engineering magazine an article that is attracting attention—"Compulsory Publication of Labor Turnovers." The essay has been printed in tract form for a more general circulation.

At their next general conference it is probable that the Methodists will face a demand for a change in their articles of religion. The founders of Methodism sought to make their labors perpetual by inserting a clause in the constitution providing that the general conference should not have power to alter the articles of religion nor to adopt any new standard of doctrine out of harmony with the old. One of their ministers says: "Some of the articles are an inheritance from the early church fathers, and we presume to say are not held by scholars of the present day. Some of the statements do not convey a thinkable idea, and certainly their authors do not claim to have been inspired."

It is difficult for a twentieth century Methodist to measure his ideas by the same measuring rule used more than a century and a half ago, where other than matters essentially fundamental are involved. If true of Methodists it is true also of others.

"Oh God, our Father, whose best gift is friendship and who alone canst give the power to be a friend, fill our hearts with the cleansing passion of Christ's love; and help us so to show the spirit of His friendship in self-forgetful love for our friends that they may find it easier to believe in Him."

FRIENDSHIP.

Friendship is never manufactured. It comes, like the sweet miracle of love. Which is to say that it comes in every known way, like a lightning flash, or like a slow, unnoticed growth. Knowing this, perhaps, we accept our friendships too much as a matter of course, forgetting that they demand the finest stuff that is in us. We rise to the emergencies of friendship, to the sudden needs of our friends; but in the daily grind we lose something of the beauty and the glory.

On my Friends' calendar I read a scrap about loyalty being the cement that fills in the cracks. We admit that there are cracks to be filled in, we being human and self-seeking, jealous even of our dear and much used friends when we know them to be more lovely or happier than we. We need to live our loyalty then and at scores of other times. We need to practice the loyalty that is in us. For loyalty is an ingredient that must exist in all friendships from the greatest to the casual. It not only fills in the cracks, it is the very essence of friendship, a deep-lying thing which sets friendship forever apart from acquaintance. It is very like that love which is "never selfish, never resentful, never glad when others go wrong, always slow to expose, always eager to believe the best, always hopeful, always patient." And like that love it is enduring and makes possible the enduring structure of that great gift we call friendship.

E. T. R.

AN ADDITIONAL THOUGHT.

In a short article under the heading "Home Again" which appeared on these pages a couple of months ago, the need of properly supporting our home meetings was emphasized. The absolute truth of this need and responsibility is too evident to dwell upon, and it is certainly something we all need to think over.

But like most good things, it may be carried too far by over-zealous or unthinking individuals. Not that there is any danger of over-supporting our own meetings,—for that is not likely to ever exist,—but there is a danger of becoming too much wrapped up in ourselves and in our own particular methods of worship, if we allow them to claim our attention to the exclusion of everything else. Looking at it from the other side, and perhaps also from a rather selfish angle, may we not consider whether a true understanding of our neighbors' methods would not be of tremendous advantage in helping us to perfect our own?

The early Quakers stood for toleration. We need something stronger than mere passive toleration; we need aggressive understanding if we are not to be a small group living in a self-satisfied manner,—“to ourselves,” if not “for ourselves.” In theory we may not mean to live thus; actually and honestly, how much do we really know of the Christian work our neighbors of other denominations are doing,—to what extent are we working with them? Are we content to stand for negative principles and be accepted as advocates of a somewhat aloof method of daily Christian service?

It is a danger we may all have to face, and there is but one solution. A true appreciation of the efforts of others will put us in the proper frame of mind to attack our own problems, and will aid us in working with others toward the realization of our common purposes in Christian living.

M. C. M., Jr.

"For the love of God is broader
Than the measure of man's mind,
And the heart of the Eternal
Is most wonderfully kind.
But we make his love more narrow
By false limits of our own,
And we magnify his strictness
With a zeal he will not own."

What We Strive For.

R. Barclay Moon.

Calls for service are heard on every hand. We see people suffering at home and abroad both in body and soul. We long to help if we only could, we say. To most of us the opportunity does not come to do the great things in the world. Circumstances seem to hem us in, and for one reason or another we can not do the things we would like to do. But just here is the danger point, because we can not do the things we would like, we are apt to do nothing at all. This is the mistake made by the man with the one talent. He was not condemned because he had only one talent, but because he did not use what he had. Let us be sure that we do not make the same error that he did. "And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, to another one; to each according to his several ability." Let us not waste time envying the man who has more talents than we have, but let us make sure that we are making good use of the one talent that has been given to us.

The trouble with the man who had the one talent was that he did not have the desire for service. You remember the saying, "One man can lead a horse to water, but ten can not make him drink." You can pull and push a horse up to the watering trough and force his head into the water, but if the horse is not thirsty you can not make him drink. You have to make the horse want to drink—create a desire. There is an easy way whereby a small boy can make the horse drink, where the ten men fail. Just give the horse a handful of salt half an hour before taking him to water! All that is needed is to create the desire. And the same is true in our religious life. What is needed is to have created within us a desire to do God's will. One man can lead a person to Christ, but ten can not make him accept Jesus as his Saviour. The passing of good laws in themselves will not make men righteous. Such laws are a help, but righteousness cometh not from without, but from within. We must have created within us a desire.

And what is this desire? What is it we really want? Not an easy goal. Not a Woolworth's five-and-ten-cent-store kind of religion. Paul has found the goal that we should all strive for, when he says, "It is no longer I that live; but Christ liveth in me." We may say that we can not attain to such a standard, and many of us will not. But think how the world would be changed if every one of us earnestly sought each day so to live as to say, "It is no longer I that live; but Christ liveth in me."

"Where There's a Will There's a Way."

Faith Borton.

The proverb is an old one, familiar to us all, but I dare say very few of us have ever thought of applying it to the Young Friends' Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. For one thing, we have taken calmly for granted the idea that the organization would run without our help. We had an Executive Secretary and her secretary at the office. Everything was satisfactorily attended to by them. The rest of us, therefore, need not bother. So, I think, many of us have reasoned, and poorly. We forgot that the Committee was ours, to be used as we desired, not to be "run" by one, or a handful of persons in the Twelfth Street office. The officers for whom we voted last spring are our representatives, and would like to hear what we want. Let us change our old-time attitude, then, of "letting so and so do it" into one, articulate and forceful which shall say to those representatives, "This is my desire. We must work together to bring it to pass."

As we think of the Young Friends' Committee, a large and somewhat vague grouping comes to mind. Let us make the picture more definite before we go on. One part of it is found in the most prominent centre for Young Friends, Westtown. In that School alone are enough people to make a strong group of themselves but there are many more. At Haverford, for instance, we find quite a large group of Young Friends living in the very place where Friendly tradition has grown for generations. Besides these two places, there are other schools and colleges near by where our members are gathered. Then, too, we must not forget the large number who are near enough to Philadelphia to join in our work and fun at the office once or many times a year. When this group is marshalled before us we find a body of some eleven hundred, a sizable one, indeed! What might we not accomplish with a united "will!"

We all have some idea about what Young Friends should be. As one member of the group I should like to offer a few suggestions as basis of discussion, at any rate, of our united purpose.

In the first place, Friends, in these days of international thinking and doing we can no longer afford to be provincial. In the business world the barriers of race and nation, creed and country have been broken down. We must see to it that those barriers no longer exist anywhere for us. We need the fire and freshness of experience which Young Friends from Germany can give us, we need the cultural touch and keenness of thought that the Orient can bring us. We need the depth of understanding which the youth of England, tried in the fire of long years of war, can give us. There are many ways to get these contacts and I shall suggest only a few. One is by keeping in touch with our members who have found service in fields "across seas," sharing in their life as much as possible. Another is by visiting, when the opportunity offers, Young Friends in foreign lands. Another is by conferring with these people when it is possible. A friend of mine, living in England, wrote me a short time ago, "Jordans was a fine experience, but it needs repeating." I agree, and hope for the near future.

The foreign students in this country have a great deal to give us. I know of no more soul-satisfying joy than entertaining some of these students in one's home. If you've never tried it, don't let another Thanksgiving or Christmas vacation go by without knowing the joy of it for yourself. Mary Moon can tell you how to get in touch with some of these fine young men and women. Sharing simply and sincerely what we have to offer them is a bit of international service any one of us can do.

The best way of all to make international contacts is by sending some one as our representative to a foreign country. For this reason, I hope we shall find it in our hearts (and pocketbooks) to consider well the possibility of a "visitor helper" being sent out by us for a year to Japan, Germany or Poland. Such a person could carry to young people abroad the message of good-will we can not take ourselves, he could live a life-of-service in the community, returning to enlighten us on thought and feeling in the country to which he went. I can think of no finer way for Friends to broaden their own horizons, or to serve another country.

To keep a representative like this on any field requires money. We all hate to collect it, and generally begrudge giving our donation when the unlucky collector comes our way. My one suggestion in regard to finances is that we have a kinder attitude towards the fund and the collectors who are doing a job we all despise. It's astonishing how much easier it makes the drive if there are a lot of "cheerful givers." If we think the Young Friends' Committee is worthwhile, it's worth supporting, not only spiritually, but financially.

One division of our organization has not been given enough work to do. The Chairman of the Editorial Committee may not agree with me. If she does not, however, she will pardon my saying that I think there should be more for her Committee, at least, to do. This would be accomplished if our Young Friends' Number ran a "Correspondence Column," to which letters were sent from any or all of us. I should very much enjoy hearing in that way from people of my own age who are at work on something that interests them. A column like this would give us a chance to "air our views" on just such topics as that of the "visitor-helper" referred to above, the Amistic Day parade, or any piece of work that Young Friends anywhere find interesting. Why not have Esther Whitson tell about the Châlons Hospital, or Wistar Wood his work in China? Esther Rhoads could tell us a lot about Japanese young people and Cleaver Thomas of his work in Poland. I'd really like to hear about it. It seems to me the possibilities of a correspondence column alone are great enough to threaten the existence of anything else in the Young Friends' Number.

Not only our older Friends are working for peace. We have some Young Friends who are giving Friends' peace principles their careful thought and loyal support. At the present time, indeed, two of our number are constantly being visited with inquiries concerning their belief in placable settlement of disputes. The reason for this is that in a Mt. Holyoke College class-room they maintained that war was unnecessary and useless as a means of settling disputes. Those girls ought to be made to feel that Young Friends are back of them en masse. They are our out-posts, and deserve our thanks.

So also does a group of Young Friends at Mt. Holly and another at Trenton who, at the time of the fairs there, handed out peace literature to those who wanted them. The Trenton Friends gave out an average of one thousand a day for five days. These same people stayed long hours in the booths answering questions about peace and peaceable means for settling disputes. Why not have some of these activities given wider publicity in our Young Friends' Number?

If supporting any or all of these propositions seems an impossibility to you, allow me to offer one final one. You will receive at various times through the year an invitation to come to Twelfth Street just to meet with others for a "social" hour. The larger the group, the greater the chance of everyone having a good time. My idea for this year is that everyone who can, should come to these meetings with a feeling that he or she is responsible for the success of the party. Let's wear cards that say something like this, "My name is so and so. What is thine? and let's be sociable." Then nobody can feel "left out," for we'll all be "in" and trying to give "the other fellow" a pleasant time. I'm sure, if we go in this spirit the social hours will seem far too few. Let's try it and see!

A most gratifying number of people voted for officers last spring, but the officers find it difficult to carry out the wishes of people who do not express them. Let's then, above all, be openly co-operating with those who work on the committees, giving cheerfully any suggestions or criticisms we may have. With the co-operation of the large group we can make Young Friends a strong, vital organization. If you agree with me, give your help when and where it may be needed; if you don't, tell us why in the next Young Friends' Number and start that "Correspondence Column."

LIFE.

"Life is a gift to be used every day,
Not to be smothered and hidden away,
It isn't to be stored in the chest
Where you gather your keepsakes and treasure your best;
It isn't a joy to be sipped now and then
And promptly put back in a dark place again."

A DOOR TO A WIDER COMRADESHIP.

There are many young Friends who have had the enlarging experience of a year or more in service overseas, but it happens that I am now the only one returned to Philadelphia from such a service in the Far East. It has occurred to me to wonder how many of you know that you are represented by at least nine young Philadelphia Friends in China and Japan. These people are professors, teachers and Quaker ambassadors. Whatever their calling in life, they are trying to practice it in such a way as to reveal to the new generation a totally new plan and philosophy of life—the simple yet supremely difficult way of Christ. I say a "new generation" advisedly, for this generation in the Far East is wonderfully new. I saw yesterday the announcement of a speech on the topic, "Is the Youth of America Really Young?" We think we are immensely different from our parents; but the contrast fades by comparison with the boldness of a Chinese boy in a Y. M. C. A. or a Japanese girl in college. In the Orient we are really

"Standing on the top of golden hours,
[With] human nature seeming born again."

In Japan there are thousands of college boys and hundreds of college girls reading all the German philosophy, all the English economics and sociology they can get hold of. It was no uncommon thing to see a student on the street-car perusing a treatise on Marx or a collection of social statistics in English. Last winter there were almost riots in the parks of Tokyo, when the Diet was considering the Manhood Suffrage Bill. Girls whose mothers never spoke to a young man except their relatives, are going out on picnics or to dances with their friends. It is a new age.

In China the moment is even more thrilling. The best men and women of China are full of perplexity and doubt as they try to wrest from the corrupt military governors the leadership of a people too ignorant to exercise the franchise they possess. There is a chance not only to educate the leaders of a decade hence, but to influence and strengthen those of the present.

It is a humbling thing to see how the youth of the Orient turn to us of America for enlightenment—and often too an enlightenment to us when they point out the fallacies and weaknesses of our pet theory, or still worse, our daily practice! The Orient is like a field that has lain fallow time out of mind, till the oldest inhabitant cannot remember when it was plowed. And now the plowing has started, and because it is a very great field, from which one-fourth of all people must live, there are a great many plowmen. Some plow crooked, some grow weary, some break their plows on the stones, and with some the team runs away. It has been a great experience to help guide even one or two plowmen for a short while.

But where are our nine young Friends? They are hard at it, out in the field. But when a visitor comes from home you may be sure they take time off to talk with him and show him. If he will stay a year or so they put him to work. The opportunities of a one-year worker are different from those which come to one of longer experience. But they are rich to make him a link of good-will and comradeship between East and West. One who has made friends with some young people of the Orient, and understood a little of their history, their affections and loyalties, their home life and their social ideals, cannot fail to have a larger outlook and a wider sympathy than ever before. And by just so much will he add to the spiritual power of his meeting at home. By just so much will he be stronger in his efforts to bring in the Society of Christ. For he will always have in mind, not only the welfare of his own country, but the good also of that other country that was once for a time his home. And so in simple friendship the foundation is laid for the friendship of the nations.

SEVERAL FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF JAPAN.

MARGARET S. JAMES.

Yokohama and Tokyo are no longer mere dots on a map, but real places to me now.

After landing from the good ship China my first sensation was riding in a comfortable rubber-tired kuruma (jinricksha) over smooth streets. I always imagined one slid from side to side and bounced about quite a bit, but this was a very different sensation. As I glided happily along I was much impressed by the agility and grace of the Japanese people, especially the way the women and children bowed and bent about with babies strapped to their backs and geta on their feet. The men seemed able to carry impossible burdens compared to their size.

A little later when I went to the station to take the train, the clatter, clatter of the geta drowned out all possible conversation, and the rate at which the people navigated in these stilted foot gear was quite astounding. But my greatest thrill came a few days later when I was spending a week at Karuizawa with the Binfords—namely, my first ride upon a motorcycle.

One morning about eleven o'clock Gurney and Elizabeth Binford and myself started for Myogi in the Binfords' new Harley-Davison motor car! Aside from two sweaters, our well-filled picnic basket was the only piece of baggage we carried. Several times as we packed the food, we laughed at the large size of the basket intended to hold only three persons' dinners and suppers, but as the last articles, six nice, fresh ears of corn, were tucked carefully in, the lid only just closed, so the size of the basket was no longer a joke.

We sped down the road and soon reached the first of the sharp mountain curves. As we wound rather slowly down the mountain, choice views appeared on every side,—distant mountain peaks and beautiful cloud effects, narrow ravines with rushing streams bordered with pretty wild flowers, great groves of pine and cryptomeria trees, and sometimes one lone pine standing like a sentinel near a mountain pass. When we were nearly half way down the mountain we stopped and ate our lunch in a cool spot by the roadside. The railroad which runs through these mountain passes through twenty-six tunnels, and occasionally we spied a train just entering or leaving one of them. As we neared the bottom of the mountain, the road became wider and soon we were traveling along the main streets (the one and only) of several little villages.

Finally we reached Myogi and Elizabeth Binford and I dismounted and climbed the steps leading up to the old monastery, while Gurney Binford began looking over his machine. Now I began to realize why the Binfords wanted me to get my first impressions from "old Japan" before I settled into the great cosmopolitan city of Tokyo. Here is Japan of four hundred years ago! Here it is still, to the one who makes the effort to find it. Not a tourist haunt, but a place of Japanese pilgrims. It all belongs plainly to lovers of real beauty—the wonderful dry stone walls, forty feet high, hewn by hand and fitted into the most graceful curves imaginable; the curving stone bridge, moss covered, and the stone lanterns of various shapes; and then the monastery with that exquisitely curved roof—all situated in God's greatest temple, a grove of great cryptomeria trees, tall and stately, God's witness for no doubt a thousand years. The sunlight shining through and the shadows on the moss-covered steps were particularly beautiful that day. It was quite a climb up the one hundred and ten steps to the very top, but well worth the effort when one could gaze on the magnificent view of the valley below.

In about half an hour's time, Elizabeth Binford and I wandered back to the motorcycle, as we had agreed to start back promptly at 3.30 in order to reach home before dark that evening. We were soon all three ready-set for going, but Harley-Davison did not move. After repeated attempts to start him, he still refused to even make encouraging signs of moving. Soon a crowd of interested spectators had gathered around us—men, women and children, numbering at least forty. After two hours of pushing the pedal and intermittently examining the whole anatomy of Harley, we finally prevailed upon Gurney Binford to drink some coffee from our thermos bottle and eat some crackers and cheese in which we all shared, after which our spirits were quite revived. A little later it was decided to push the motorcycle to the top of a hill not far distant and see if a slope would encourage his internals to get to going. This also failed, but landed Harley in front of a tea house where Elizabeth Binford had known the mother and her two daughters for eleven years. They are an old Mito family. They served us luscious Japanese pears and urged us to spend the night with them. A man was unloading cotton here from an automobile. After another hour's work and the coaxing of two men, the machine still remained quiet and exerted no power to move. So at last the man driving the auto consented to tow us to the nearest town. As the beautiful full moon was rising and the country was full of the twilight shadows and the evening calm, we rode on in state, Elizabeth Binford and I standing one on either side of the running board of the car and hanging on to the top, meanwhile acting as signal men between the driver of the car and the steerer of the motorcycle.

When we reached the town, which seemed all too soon to me, we stopped in front of a hotel and prepared to disentangle ourselves from the auto. Our arrival soon caused a crowd to gather, and before the rope was untied and the auto had departed, we were surrounded by a group of people. Foreigners were not so unusual in this place as in many country towns, I was told, but I thought I must be somewhat of a curiosity, as twice I felt little fingers feeling my skin to see if I was like a human being, I suppose.

We sent a Japanese telegram from the post office to tell them in Karuizawa that we would not be home that night; and then as soon as the motorcycle was placed in the small yard outside the hotel and carefully covered with its water-proof armor, we proceeded to enter our quarters, first removing our shoes, of course. Our rooms for the night were on the second floor opening into a narrow passage which overlooked a pretty little garden, a sort of open courtyard in the middle of the hotel. Gurney Binford soon appeared with towels and tooth brushes which he had just purchased, and even the luxury of tooth powder, highly scented! Our next performance was to prepare for a bath, and I was introduced for the first time to the customary manner of bathing in a large, oval, wooden tub of hot water in which dear knows how many other persons had already bathed that day. We were supplied with kimonos which served also as sleeping robes. It is great fun discovering just what are essentials under such circumstances.

A Japanese hotel has no dining-room, so each one eats in the pleasant privacy of his own room. We squatted around our little low table and enjoyed more contents from our basket with the pleasant addition of hot tea. After the day's excitement it was no hardship to retire early, especially as we could still gaze at the beautiful moonlight flooding our rooms. Perhaps I am too good a sleeper normally to pass judgment on the comfort of a Japanese bed. However, I hereby testify that I slept soundly all night on the thin mattress on the floor and the little head rest for a pillow, and further I rose feeling really rested.

You would never guess what we had for breakfast—six good ears of corn, nicely roasted in the hotel kitchen. They came from that wonderful picnic basket of which I have spoken. Of course we properly began by first eating a sour pickled plum and drinking tea à la Japonaise.

Soon after our breakfast Gurney Binford discovered why it was the motorcycle had refused to go, and when its trouble was remedied (by removing the over-abundance of oil in the crank case), we started homeward. The delightful ride up the mountain in the early morning was a most fitting ending to this most thrilling experience.

Bedford Deane.

Though known personally to very few to whom these words shall come, there are some of our readers who met Bedford Deane when in England at the All Friends' Conference, others have been told of his earnest endeavor to carry forward the tasks set by the Young Friends' Movement, and there are still others to whom he was only a name, but who will be saddened to learn of his death last month; all who read what follows should feel the appeal of his short life and should have their own faith in the all-sufficiency of Divine Grace quickened within them.

One who knew him well writes: "Young men and women who knew him in college will fight better and pray better because of his friendship." . . . "He was one of those people, though himself but a youth of twenty-two, whose presence creates an atmosphere of confidence and moral support. He moved and spoke as if he was sure that the Eternal was with him."

The Friend (London) gives the following brief notice:—

The news of the death of Bedford Deane, after ten weeks' illness, did not come as a surprise to those who knew of his illness, but to a very large number of people in the Society, in the Student Christian Movement, and elsewhere, it brings a deep sense of loss. Illness had prevented his attending the Young Friends' Conference at Manchester, and although he afterwards recovered, he was taken ill again. His heart, already affected, was unable to bear the continued strain, and developed malignant endocarditis, from which he died Eighth Month 13th. After the funeral at Leigh-on-Sea Cemetery on the 17th, a Friends' meeting was held at Crowstone Congregational Chapel at Westcliff, the minister, A. D. Belden, who was a great friend of Bedford Deane's, allowing the premises to be used just as Friends desired. About two hundred were present at this meeting, when the thought of Bedford Deane's loving spirit presented a claim on all to take up the work he had so well begun. "To know Bedford was to love him," said someone in the meeting—"henceforth to love him will be to know him."

A Neave Brayshaw has written the following brief appreciation:—

"It is not quite four years since I came to know Bedford Deane. In the summer of 1918 he left Bootham School, and a few weeks later he and two or three others stayed a short time in Scarborough, where we understood that together we were entering into a wonderful friendship.

"That autumn he entered University College, London, as a medical student, a career to which he had looked forward from his childhood days. It was his hope to go out as a teacher in the West China University, and he soon began to form friendships with Oriental students in England.

"About a month after the beginning of his student life he reached the age of eighteen and it was necessary for him, a day or two after his birthday, to go before the tribunal, seeking exemption from compulsory military service. This he could have had for the asking if he had been willing to join the Officers' Training Corps, but being unwilling to do so his plea was rejected. He lodged an appeal, but within the fortnight the Armistice was declared and the matter was at an end. Before the close of the year a terrible attack of influenza from which he barely escaped with his life, left his heart weak, although of this there was little outward sign.

"It was in connection with the work of Young Friends that I knew him most closely. Many of us will always remember his help when we went out in a visitation group, or met in counsel to take thought for our work. We think of his prayer and his messages in meetings for worship and perhaps especially in the more retired devotional meetings. We remember his enthusiasm for the right delivery of the Quaker message, his clear perception of issues, undeflected by sentimentality or the expression of merely pretty thoughts, his wonderful capacity for friendship and understanding, his wise counsel enforced by his humor and his persuasive personality. And, convinced that such a life cannot pass out as if it had not been but that somewhere it remains in the care and in the service of the God of love, we think less of our loss, and more of the enrichment of our lives by reason of his friendship."

You will recall, as already mentioned, that he was unfit, through illness, to attend at Manchester the Conference of Young Friends. In place of his presence he wrote a letter, the final message, as it proved to be, that he was permitted to send.

There is a ring of hope and of strength in this Epistle and coupled with the knowledge that it comes as the farewell call to the great body of Young Friends, the world over, from one who had been most prominent in the Young Friends' Movement, we want to give copious extracts from it. He wrote:—

It may be questioned whether it is useful to go back two hundred and sixty years and dig into our history. But the characteristic of a movement is that it is not to be understood apart from its history. It is a stream of life, and we must know the springs which form its source, just as we must have some consciousness of the great ocean into which we hope and believe it is flowing. Quakerism is a faith which is most vigorous when and where those who embrace it are conscious of this sense of historical continuity with those who have gone before. For the history of the Society of Friends is not a dead thing. He who will, may know loving comradeship with Fox and Penn, with Naylor and Parnell and Penington and many another, he will feel the same rich life flowing through himself as enriched the lives of such rough country folk as Luke Cock and Peter Gardner, and filled their lives with power. We shall know that it is not a matter of indifference whether we go forward blazing further the track they started. It is almost as if we had known them truly in life, and had depended on their leadership. And then we lost them, and we looked around and could see no one else but ourselves to step into their shoes. And as we hesitated and wondered how we could help with our little lives, it is as if we knew they trusted us and were looking to us to cast aside all that is holding us back and give ourselves freely and fully in the service for which so many of them gave their lives.

In another sense, too, Quakerism is not to be understood apart from its witness in individual human lives. As we see what the message meant to these, we shall find its meaning for ourselves. We shall know what the message really is. Already we have found something which played a large part in their lives—the fellowship of those on a common service. This is the first condition of our work, that we should not be afraid or ashamed to know God together, so that His presence is with us continually in all our concerns. Religion cannot be a natural part of our lives unless God is our common friend.

We have a great word-picture of the fellowship of those early days in Francis Howgill's testimony:—

"The Kingdom of Heaven did gather us, and catch us all, as in a net, and His heavenly power at one time drew many hundreds to land, that we came to know a place to stand in and what to wait in, and the Lord appeared daily to us, to our astonishment, amazement, and great admiration, in so much that we often said one unto another, with great joy of heart, 'What? Is the Kingdom of God come to be with men? And will He take up his tabernacle among the sons of men, as he did of old? And what? Shall we, that were reckoned as the outcasts of Israel, have this honor of glory communicated amongst us, which were but men of small parts, and of little abilities in respect of many others, as amongst men?'"

You will remember how in the "Beginnings of Quakerism," William Charles Braithwaite tells us that Howgill went on to say that their hearts were knit to one another and to the Lord in fervent love, not by any external covenant or form, but in the covenant of life with God, and they met together in the unity of the Spirit, treading down all contentions about religion or its practices. The more they found opportunity for waiting together, the more were they strengthened in their hope and faith, and holy resolutions were kindled to serve the Lord and declare his message by word and life.

This joy many of us know already, and many more will find it during these days. Once we have known life on this level, once we have reached through the barriers of shyness, of convention, and have made contact with one another in the common first-hand knowledge of God, we have found a richness in life which makes all life else poor and unreal.

BEDFORD DEANE'S LAST MESSAGE TO THE YOUNG FRIENDS' CONFERENCE AT MANCHESTER, ENGLAND, 1922.

There is another tendency in the Movement to-day. We are conscious that we have been losing sight of Jesus. In our reaction from evangelicalism, and from an interpretation of his life which did violence to our moral sense, it has been easy to overlook the uniqueness of his life and the moral supremacy of his character. Whatever we may think about his humanity or divinity, the fact remains that no one else has perfectly manifested God's love in human relationships. More than that, we need his comradeship as much as we need the comradeship of each other. We cannot do without him in our lives, for he is our leader, and he is living with us now.

The service to which we are called makes an urgent and personal demand of us. It is not enough to share the social life of the Movement, and to jog along being generally decent to everyone. We need in the privacy of our individual lives to make the resolve to take our place in the stream of life, asking God to take our whole life and use it for his service. We cannot play at being Quakers. If this sense of historical continuity is a real thing, then at least we cannot give less than life service where our fathers gave their lives.

The need of the world is great. Wherever we turn, to Ireland, Germany, Russia, the need for healing forces is overwhelming in its urgency. Often our own lives are not easy; the Meeting to which we belong is dull, maybe; our Young Friends' Group is not strong; we are misunderstood. There are innumerable difficulties, and a need so great as almost to crush us. But we are met here in fellowship so that we may look above and beyond all these things and reach out to the power and life which will carry us through every obstacle. We, in our Movement, are standing for a life which will send us forth in this generation, Children of the Light. As we are sincere, we shall be able to help. Criticism will be disarmed as our lives show that we "have been with Jesus."

NINTH MONTH.

BITS OF EXPERIENCE.

SELECTIONS FROM LETTERS FROM ESTHER M. WHITSON.

CHÂLONS SUR MARNE,

Seventh Month 11th.

Really, I have something to write about. I have had a half-day off and a bit of adventure. I had talked of riding to Ste. Menehold, and Mlle. Merle suggested that I go one way on my "wheel" and return on the train. It was a glorious day,—cool but sunny. I carried a bicycle-map, but was not sure of the road. So the first thing I did was to find myself on the road to Bar le Duc; but I kept on a bit hoping to turn to the left and strike a short cut to Lépine. My short cut led into a pine woods on a hill-top, and a view of great distress! for as I gazed across the fields of poppies I spied the spires of Lépine on the opposite hill and no road across. So I walked and rode my silly "wheel" back to Châlons again and took the high-road to Lépine. By this time I had wasted one whole hour by my own stupidity.

At Lépine the sign was very clear,—33 kilometers to Ste. Menehold. I was extremely thirsty, so leaving the wheel under a tree, I went into the cathedral. No one there! I made a bee-line for the sacred-well water. Holy or not, faith-healing or not, I drank. On the road again, I coasted down the hill. A kilometer is less than a mile, so the mile-posts did not seem far apart. The ride was charming because the views were pretty. I never saw such wild flowers—purple flowers, white flowers and countless scarlet poppies. A stretch of pine woods—lonely, lovely and very fragrant—and at the foot of a hill, a few houses.

On the next hill a heavy army truck passed me. My word! Look at it! Why, it's a U. S. army truck! No one but an American boy ever wore his hair like that! and his shirt blowing out on his back! I wanted to say, Hello! but "plugged" away. He stopped for water on the hill and as I passed I glanced at him. No, perhaps it was only another chattering Frenchman! but when U. S. A. passed me again he slowed down and asked in French, "Are you going to Ste. Menehold?" I answered in French, "Yes." In French he replied, "Will you ride?" In French I answered, "If you do not mind taking my bicycle?" He jumped down and loaded the wheel into the rear. I was tired and took the high seat with him. It was jolly good to have a lift! I asked in French, "What is this?" pointing to the U. S. A. In English he answered, "That means United States of America." In English I replied, "Oh! does it?" In English he replied, "I am from Chicago. Where are you from?" I tried to imagine that this was Barclay (brother) on an old Liberty truck and the times he must have gone along these same hard French roads.

The lad beside me was not half bad for company; said he had been in France since 1917, was discharged from the army here and does not want to go home, now that the States are "dry." He said he was with some seventy-five U. S. soldiers out beyond the huge cemetery. (Romaine.) He stopped in Ste. Menehold, but told me if I wanted to go further he would gladly take me. I remembered that in Les Islettes lived nurse Evans, an English woman—a Friend—who had been at the "Inauguration" (the opening of the new hospital at Châlons) I remembered, too, that Clermont was only a little way beyond, so I concluded to make the best of my opportunity by going to Clermont en Argonne and go back on the train.

And so I, even I, stood on the same shell-shot hill and looked upon the same valley where B. had so often passed—the place that the Mission people saw daily. Yes, the peasant people were living still in the portable houses made by the Unit workers. But now brave attempts are being made to rebuild. A hospital had been built, new rows of barracks, a hotel-café sort of place, but all around were the remains of the underground homes. Attempts were being made to rebuild the little chapel. Americans can never know what these people suffered. It was good to see happy children at play, but it was saddening to witness the pathos of the few quiet old folks. I thought of Ruth and Ray Hoffman and wondered if this was the very place where there was once a Quaker meeting (at which their marriage was solemnized).

I asked how far it is to Grange le Compte. First, however, I went to the station to see if there was a later train for Châlons. The man sized me up as English and told me there would be a train one hour later (than the one contemplated) and made clear the time of its departure on his red fingers. It was a pleasant ride to Grange, although I had to ask the way once or twice. I knew there would be no Americans there, so I stopped at a house where a méchant chien (savage dog) roared at me and a rosy French mother silenced him. "Where is Grange le Comte?" "This is it," she answered, "and yonder houses beyond the barnyard." I looked. Yes, there was the old railroad siding, now only a stony roadbed. The lady seemed socially inclined, and I asked her if she had lived here long. She said, "Yes, I was here when all the good English and Americans were. I remember Balderston and nurse Holmes." Said she was "bid and strong and helped the men work." She showed me a shanty which had been a shelter for some of our fellows but is now a pig-pen. I thought of "Old Jerry" (the Automobile on car-wheels for service on the railroad) as the noise of a tractor plowing the rough soil attracted my attention.

As I rode back to Clermont I had to bump myself to keep believing that it was I, seeing these places. Being weary, I went to the station in good time and asked for a ticket to Châlons. The man looked at me! Why, that train had gone, the next would be six o'clock next morning. I raved the best I could in French and the man knew he had told me wrong. He tried to console me by saying there was an English family in Clermont who would give me a room for the night. Never! I must get home that night. Mlle. Merle would never forgive me! I found the barracks of P. W. I did not know him, but I knew he had an auto. He remembered B. He talked very slowly; he was very sorry, but he could not possibly do anything for me, his auto was being repaired.

It was eight o'clock p. m. All telephone and telegraph service was closed for the day. I would get home that night! so started down the hill towards Les Islettes, praying that a camion would pass me. I would ask! But nothing passed me. I asked a kiddie where nurse Evans lived, and she showed me the house. But the lady was out. I calculated fast just then. There was still a bare chance of some vehicle passing if I stayed on the high road, so I went back and stopped on a bridge and waited. As I sat thinking, a veil and grey dress came speeding down the road and nurse Evans found me. "Now these go over there, my dear, and lie down on the grass till I come back," she said. "I have another call to make and then we will go home."

And so I came to Nurse Evans' two-room château, and to the best cup of tea! Forever and henceforth I am sold to English tea! She was all sympathy and cheer and hospitality. She knew the Missionites, past, present and to come. She called me at four a. m. I dressed and drank her delicious coffee and departed deeply grateful. The train took two hours—stopping and backing and waiting—before it reached Châlons. Mlle. Merle stood at the door to receive me like a prodigal. I told my story. She was not angry. She only said, "I guess you know I did not sleep last night."

THE Young Friends' Committee met at Westtown during the week-end of Tenth Month 14th and 15th. Two large questions occupied us. The most important was the question of a possible Visitor Helper in Japan. Such a person is not only of much use in the field but when he or she returns after a year of service a stronger link is welded between those at home and those who are still away.

The other question under discussion was the work of the committee for the coming year. There has been some rearrangement of the sub-committees—the International Committee succeeding to and enlarging the work of the Mission Committee, and the Extension Committee following the Field Committee.

We appreciated the presence and helpful interest of the Westtown members of the Young Friends' Committee.

The next meeting of the Committee will be on Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 1st.

END OF THE YOUNG FRIENDS' NUMBER.

En Route to Germany.

[Most of our readers know through former issues of THE FRIEND or otherwise of the sailing of our friends Alfred, Eleanor and Philip Garrett and Agnes L. Tierney. A few days since the following letter addressed to THE FRIEND and "intended for all their friends" was received. We gladly give it place the first opportunity.—Eds.]

S. S. Resolute,
Tenth Month 24, 1922.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We are expecting to reach Plymouth at six to-morrow morning. The day is fine and we are on even keel after several days of rather severe forward pitching which laid low numbers of our fellow passengers. Our little party seems to take to the sea very kindly.

This is the most luxuriously fitted up boat we have ever voyaged on. If it wasn't for the jar and motion we should think we were in a New York or Philadelphia first-class hotel. The season of the year makes it possible to enjoy these comforts at very reasonable rates. Only eighty-six first cabin passengers and still fewer in second cabin. We feel almost as though we had a private yacht. We are told that half the original first cabin list withdrew on account of the enforcement of the prohibition law. It is a relief not to be surrounded by flowing bowls and imbibing bipeds, although we probably all present the appearance of evil with our glasses of lemonade or ginger ale.

Amy Winslow and Gretta Smith, two fine young Friends from Indianapolis, are en route to relief work in Vienna.

Young Harriman, the President of this steamship line, with his wife, is on board. He is very youthful in appearance—scarcely thirty I should think, with a refined, sensitive face. A slight stoop and a withdrawing air gives one the impression that he shrinks from the notice he attracts everywhere. Their names do not appear on the passenger list.

The second day out we were enlivened by the appearance of a flock of land birds that had evidently been swept out to sea by a storm. They were so exhausted that they had lost all sense of fear. Fancy a hermit thrush hopping along the rail and onto our steamer chairs and a dozen little golden crowned kinglets, the most exquisite and smallest of our birds except the humming bird, nesting in our hands for a little warmth and rest. There were also juncos, a white-throated sparrow and another that we thought a field sparrow. The sailors and passengers caught numbers of the birds and put them in the conservatory. Two little kinglets met in a gardenia tree in the rotunda and such a rapturous reunion as it was. They billed and twittered and cuddled up to each other all the evening. But alas! the kinglets couldn't be fed for they must have insects and when morning came five lonely little inanimate forms were laid out on a conservatory shelf. The scene was so affecting to Alfred Garrett that he wrote a story about them. At least twenty-five other birds are still alive, including the hermit thrush, a phalarope which fell exhausted on the deck the next evening, and a stormy petrel which seemed paralyzed for a time. If they are set free in England what will become of the poor lonely hermit with no mate or companions?—a hermit indeed! Will the English robins and larks be kind to their American cousins?

Most of the names on the passenger list are foreign so our interesting relations began at once. From Germantown, however, are the Klauders, wife and daughter of Charles Z. Klauder, the architect, very charming and interesting people. We soon made the acquaintance of Madame Bimislana Lamprecht-de Petchenko, a Russian lady whose first husband, the famous scientist Boris de Petchenko, was killed by the Russian revolutionists in 1918. She afterwards married a German manufacturer named Lamprecht, who was educated in Warsaw and loves the Russian people. Madame is now living in Berlin and has been so moved by the sufferings of the Russian refugees of whom there are 500,000 starving in Berlin that she has been to America to enlist sympathy for the children, of whom there are 50,000, mostly without homes or food or opportunity for education. She obtained Secretary Hoover's interest and sympathy and has formed a strong committee in New York. She now returns to Berlin to get statistics and particulars to send back to Hoover and to her committee.

One evening as Madame Petchenko, the Klauders, the Krempps (an Alsatian with an extraordinarily beautiful American wife) and we four were gathered about a table in the "Winter Garden," Madame proposed that we should form ourselves into an auxiliary committee to present her cause on shipboard. We did this, and subject to the Captain's approval, arranged for an entertainment to bring the passengers together. The Captain proved to be most sympathetic. He arranged a meeting between young Harriman and Madame. She looked upon this as a direct intervention of Providence, for she had tried in vain to see him in New York. He entered most heartily into her proposals and assured her he would gladly serve on her New York committee.

With all-inclusive and cordial intention we asked if the second cabin passengers could be invited to our entertainment. The Captain said that he could not give permission, but that he would ask President Harriman. It was heartily given, so personal invitations were issued to them and also to those in first cabin and some of their talent invited to contribute to the program. We are much grieved that our first essay in democracy should have resulted in a revolution! Our motives were impugned, condescension for the low purpose of money-getting was suspected, and excited and angry German gutturals filled some of the native Americans with wonder and alarm. Attempts at peace-making seemed at first successful, but secondary revolutions occurred which resulted in a group of them failing to live up to their agreement and less than a dozen of the passengers appearing on our decks. Among them was a dear old Catholic Padre from Bavaria. He is returning from America where he has been trying to get money for an orphanage near Munich. His self-sacrifice and deeply spiritual nature are apparent to all. To be so sweetened and deepened by contact with suffering is a witness to the keeping power of the Spirit.

Alfred Garrett made the introductory remarks at the entertainment and then Madame Petchenko gave an eloquent and moving address in German which nearly everybody could follow. Without any direct appeal for money $328 were contributed at once. One man promises to build a school for the children.

On Seventh-day evening as our committee was breaking up, I suggested that we should have a Friends' Meeting the next day as there were to be no regular religious services. It was cordially approved. In the morning Alfred Garrett saw the Chief Steward. He responded very cordially to the idea. I am sorry to say that we didn't have faith enough to post a notice of the meeting, but we spoke to a few about it. We were amused when we went to the "red room" to find the chairs drawn up in rows fronting a table arranged like a pulpit, draped with the American flag and with a Bible lying upon it. Eighteen people gathered in a quiet corner. Among them was Captain Dempfer who is to be an associate of our younger Captain when he takes the Resolute around the world starting in First Month.

Alfred Garrett explained clearly the nature of a Friends' meeting. After a time of silence I spoke on the necessity for a spiritual interpretation of the facts of science and a spiritual use of the material resources of the world if life is to become at all endurable for the majority of people; a beautiful prayer was offered by another for recognition of the Divine spark in every human soul and for the abolition of racial and national antagonisms. Alfred Garrett read a few verses from Acts—"He hath made of one blood all peoples, etc." After a considerable period of silence the meeting for worship closed and then Madame Petchenko gave a little account of her work and mission to America. We felt an enveloping atmosphere of understanding, sympathy and devotion in our little meeting and received fresh courage to pursue, though faint.

There is on board a group of cultivated people of German parentage whose home is Milwaukee. I had some pleasant conversation with them last evening. They had kept aloof, but finding we were Quakers they made it easy for me to talk with them. They are going to Berlin to help relieve the distress of their suffering relatives. A young Viennese professor in a college at Charlottenburg had joined their group.

He has found a position in some great heating and lighting firm in New York and is returning to bring his family back with him. He deplors the exodus of the scientists and learned men from Germany, but says they must live. The group was agreed in the belief that the present generation of babies in Germany will not live to grow up. They are born weaklings with no power to appropriate lime for their bones.

The sympathy and god-speed of our friends followed us to the ship. We are deeply grateful for it all and are going forward with greater faith because of it.

Sincerely yours,

AGNES L. TIERNEY.

TOBIJAH AND THE TUCKER TARHEELS.

MARGARET T. APLEGARTH.

On a certain afternoon that began like any other afternoon, you are to picture Queenofsheba down by the brook washing the clothes with a vigorous rub-a-dub-dub. Dash splashed around in the brook making a perfect nuisance of himself, stumbling over boulders; and Quee was being rather stern with him, I fear, when suddenly she stopped in the middle of a sentence and stood there with Dash dangling in midair. For an apparition was approaching! "A ghost!" she trembled. "But are there ever haunts afore sundown?" No, of course not; don't be plumb foolish, Queenofsheba, can't you see it's just a white-robed lady on a whitish horse, riding along up the bed of the brook, looking much relieved to see somebody ahead. Even somebody with a small boy dangling in midair at the end of an arm!

Queenofsheba dropped poor Dash, and stared at this Lady From Far Off, longing to run, but rooted to the spot. All the women she had ever seen wore sunbonnets, yet here was a person with something entirely different—covered with "artificials." Queer; but nice! Then the Lady smiled, and Quee felt the stiffening begin to return to her startled knees. "Is there a house nearby?" the stranger asked.

Quee nodded. (Her tongue was still tucked up close against the roof of her mouth from fear!)

"Then could you show me how to get there, for I've lost my way; and maybe your father could direct me."

"Pappy went to fight the war, and he never come back."

"Oh, I'm so sorry! But your mother—is she home?"

"Yep, mammy's around. Fetch your nag this way." So Quee and the Lady went up the hill to the log cabin. And nothing was ever quite the same again for the Tuckers.

For although the Lady had lost her way and had seemed in a hurry to find it again, she gave one glance at that lonely cabin with a hill sitting in its front yard and another hill sitting in its back yard and no neighbors to be seen for miles, then she sat right down in mammy's wobbly splint-seated chair and started in talking with this backwards mother who probably had had no caller in years. Ma Tucker must have been "saving up" for company, for she simply couldn't get talked out—all about how pappy went to war, how Thusey never quit yelling ("Now what makes her, anyhow?")

At supper time the lady turned to little Boanerges and said, "Now tell me, Boanerges, where did such a peaceful little fellow as you ever get that fierce and war-like name?"

"Pappy fetched it out of the Bible," explained a chorus of small Tuckers, "pappy fetched us all out of the Bible!"

"And then the Bible got losted," Boanerges added with gentle regret.

"Oh, what a pity! And haven't you a Bible now?"

"No," sighed Ma Tucker, "but it wouldn't do us no good if we did have one, since nary a Tucker can read now that pa's all gone. I reckon Bo and Dash ain't never even seen a Bible, nor Methusalem, either."

"Well, that's soon remedied," cried the Lady From Far

Off. "Wouldn't one of you like to go out to the saddle bag on my horse and bring me the Bible inside?"

Every little Tucker made such a wild dash for the "Bible nag" that they almost took the log cabin along with them as they squeezed pell-mell through the doorway.

"Ah me!" sighed the Lady to herself, wishing she knew some get-rich-quick way to work wonders in that gloomy house that had no books, and indeed, no anything else to speak of; the queerest furniture you ever saw, with Tuckers sitting around on empty kegs for chairs, and one curious bed in the corner—so lumpy that it looked like snow-crowned peaks of the Alps; and not so very snowy, either, when Thusey was always being ordered to quit her wallowing around on top of it. The Lady couldn't help but wonder where she herself should sleep that night; one bed would certainly be popular with ten sleepers claiming it!

When the Book was brought the lady smiled and said, "In the place I come from there are lots of other Bibles, so this one I give to you right now. Yes, for keeps! If you like, I'll read you stories from it, shall I?"

They "liked!"

As little thirsty plants drink in the rain, they sat around her, afraid to miss a syllable.

THE NEW MESSAGE WORK: A SPIRITUAL SERVICE.

"The withdrawal of the Friends from Germany is a source of deep regret to me. We need them. The state churches are as empty as our hearts, and the longing for a new and intensive contact with the World-Father is, in my opinion, universal.

"We cannot do it alone. We lack the traditions which you have, and which we cannot make up in a moment."

Such words as the above—in this case written from Darmstadt, Germany, when Friends were closing their child-feeding there—express the call which has given rise to the Message Work of the American Friends' Service Committee. In several countries where Friends' service has been carried on, groups of seekers, who had previously found no satisfying religious associations have turned to Friends for new hope and inspiration.

Such groups need the service of the Society of Friends just as much as famine sufferers, and a concern has arisen that they should not appeal in vain. English Friends began work through the Friends' Council for International Service in pre-war days, and now have centres in many parts of Europe. To further the American concern, the Service Committee last year appointed a sub-committee which is known as "Message Committee"—its interest being the spiritual message resultant from Friends' service.

The work of the Message Committee in no sense be regarded as sectarian propaganda. It is an attempt, not to proselyte, but to serve; and divides itself into two main phases.

The first consists in visiting those who are interested in the Friends' message, translating and publishing literature explaining Friends' ideals, and co-operating with English Friends in the work of Friends' centres in Europe. Under a concern for such types of service, Alfred C. and Eleanor Garrett and Agnes L. Tierney—all of whom are members of the Fourth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia, Yearly Meeting—have just sailed to spend the winter in Europe. They will make their headquarters in Germany, but will also visit a number of other countries. Other Friends will probably follow them at a later date.

The second division of the work is that of building upon the foundations of international good-will laid by Friends' service abroad. The Message Committee's activities in this respect include encouraging American teachers who are in sympathy with Friends' ideals to accept positions in Europe, and suggesting that professors who spend their sabbatical year abroad, and also American Friends who are students in foreign universities, locate where they can keep in touch with one of the Friends' centres. Furthering international visits is another aim. Under the latter heading the committee is now making itself responsible for a visit to the United States of Pani Maria Rachel Jagmin, a Polish lady who has been active among the "Friends of Friends" in her country.

In order to carry on its work, the Message Committee is appealing for contributions to the extent of $500, and also for a special fund with which to finance Pani Jagmin's visit.

A Bulletin (No. 53), dealing with the aims of the work, will be sent upon request. The Committee would appreciate it if all Friends going abroad would concern themselves to make as many contacts as possible with this work; while those interested in any of the opportunities for service suggested above are requested to correspond with the Committee through the office of the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A CHANCE TO SERVE.

A national campaign is just getting under way to raise funds for the Service Committee's annual budget for European relief work, which has this year been set at a total of $4,350,000. Murray S. Kenworthy, former chief of the unit in Russia, has been speaking almost daily for the last month and will be doing so for two months to come. His engagements stretch all the way from Boston to Chicago; and in each community, committees are being organized to follow up his work with a definite local campaign. Beulah Hurley and Miriam West, who have also just returned from Russia, will likewise undertake speaking tours.

Committees have been organized in several sections in the East and the Middle West. A Boston Committee consists of more than fifty prominent residents under the chairmanship of Dr. Charles W. Eliot, ex-president of Harvard University. The Committee in Baltimore includes the Governor of the state, the Mayor of the city, the Archbishop of the Catholic Church, several prominent representatives of other denominations, the presidents of Johns Hopkins University and Goucher College and three prominent physicians. In Chicago, Jane Addams is a moving spirit of the work. A nucleus of Friends in Indiana is just preparing to organize that state for campaign purposes, and has set out to raise $100,000 for the service work. In North and South Dakota, the Governors of the states are appointing committees to collect funds that will be distributed through the Service Committee.

The Committee has faith that every Friends' group will do its part in helping to carry out the year's program; for without the active support of Friends none of the work can go forward. Upon request to 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., suggestions will be sent to any community as to definite ways of co-operating in the service. The program outlined for the year is a big one, but the needs in Europe are bigger yet. Biggest of all is the opportunity for service open to the Society of Friends.

WHERE SOAP AND TOWELS ARE PRECIOUS.

(Extract from the Diary of a Quaker Worker in Russia.)

The wife of the glazier who put in our double windows for the winter was washing her little daughter when a Quaker worker called the other day. She had a tiny bit of soap she had begged from the wife of our carpenter, who receives a little in his Quaker employee's ration. She said it was the first soap she had used for years. The little girl scarcely recognized the precious, almost priceless mailo. When she had finished washing the child she told her to put on her clothes. "But why don't you give her a towel?" the Quaker worker asked. The glazier's nice wife looked a little pained. "We have none," she answered, "not even a little one—they all went to save us from death last winter." The little girl put on her clothes without drying.

Now there comes to us a man who has two towels to sell, the last two in his household. He is over sixty, but he complains as do so many old people in Russia that he is an "all round orphan." He has no money and he wants to sell these two pieces of textiles to get some. He sits down on the cook's bed in the kitchen, takes off his old hat, and waits till Anna Antonovna is less busy over her preparation of a can of baked beans for lunch. The old fellow remarks that it is cold out and that his wife died not long ago. A sad figure is this wretched old chap with his two soiled towels. Nobody wants to buy them. Nobody seems to care very much whether he lives or not. Certainly nobody but the Quakers will ever feed him, if he is fed at all, throughout the coming winter.

FRIENDLY NOTES.

ON Tenth Month 12th, the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society of Philadelphia, under the leadership of J. Henry Scattergood, made an historical pilgrimage to Montgomery, Delaware and Chester Counties. Their first stopping-place was at Merion Meeting-house, built in 1695, and the oldest house of worship in Pennsylvania. It is also unique as being the only meeting-house in all the Society built in the form of a Tau Cross or Cross of St. Anthony. The peg which succeeds the peg on which William Penn once hung his hat, the old horse block, the date stone and other features of the house were pointed out to the visiting Antiquarians by Charles E. Hires, who also distributed a handsome booklet, which he had prepared, with views of the meeting-house and grounds, as a souvenir of the visit. Charles F. Jenkins made a short historical address covering the founding of the meeting, and the Welsh Friends who settled in Merion and adjoining townships. After an interesting visit the Antiquarians proceeded to old St. David's Church, General Anthony Wayne's home, and the scene of the Paoli massacre, completing the excursion with lunch at the home of J. Henry Scattergood.

ANY who have an interest in old meeting-houses should not neglect the quaint and maybe forlorn little house in York, Pa. It is in the heart of the city, occupying a quarter of a square of valuable property. It belongs to Baltimore Yearly Meeting, held at Park Square, as do the other small meetings in the neighborhood of York. A correspondent has sent us the following for insertion, which we were unable to publish at the time of its receipt:

Friends recently held services at the Warrington Meeting-house in northern York County, Pennsylvania, to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary of the opening up of a tract of land in that section in which the first religious meetings west of the Susquehanna River were held, and where the Society of Friends was among the first to establish religious meetings.

In 1722 Sir William Heith, who was then Governor of Pennsylvania, obtained consent from the Indians for the survey of 200 acres west of the Susquehanna which he called Newberry, and the first meeting organized was the one of that name. Six miles west of Newberry Meeting, the Warrington Meeting was established. On a twenty-five-acre tract decided to it by John, Thomas and Richard Penn, a log house of worship was erected. This was supplanted by a stone structure—the one in which the anniversary services were held, and which, together with the one at Newberry, are landmarks in the history of Central Pennsylvania.

The anniversary services were attended by scores of people, among them many descendants of the founders of Newberry and Warrington Meetings. The official records of those meetings in Warrington Quarterly Meeting are kept by Baltimore Yearly Meeting (Hicksite), of which they are a part.

A BOOK we should read is characterized in a recent book notice or review thus:—

The story of Tom Bryan's rapid career from hosiery warehouse to theological college at Bradford, University at Glasgow, Social Settlement in Walworth, mayoralty of Southwark, lectureship at Woodbrooke and first Wardenship of Fircroft is one of the romances of adult education. Herbert G. Wood and Arthur E. Ball have told the story in a little book published recently by George Allen & Unwin. Among Adult School folk especially this absorbing record should win popularity.

THE National Child Welfare Association is preparing a series of panels for use in public schools to commemorate some great pioneers in important public affairs. Four series of portraits have so far been published. Two "Pioneers of Justice" are William Penn (Justice to weak races) and Susan B. Anthony (Justice to women).

AGAIN referring to the new London Book of Discipline, Part 1, about which too much cannot be said, Ernest E. Taylor, of Malton, England, writes: "At two gatherings of Friends I have attended lately the suggestion has been made that individual Friends or Preparative Meetings might incline to present copies of 'Christian Life, Faith and Thought' to those ministers of religion and local preachers likely to appreciate it. It has been suggested that if such gifts were made, this should be done by hand, so that some verbal statement could be made which would at once interest the recipient in the book.

"I venture to communicate this information in the form of a letter, in case those to whom this new book appeals strongly may incline to do something of this kind either themselves or through their meeting."

WE endorse all that The Friend [London], has said in the following. We welcome the visits of the Friends' Fellowship Papers. It holds a place all its own and we hope American Friends may swell the list of subscribers. The trouble has, of course, been financial, but the signal of distress hoisted two months ago has brought in so many letters of encouragement that those responsible feel that a further effort must be made for continuance. As to the past, there is a small debt, and with regard to the future, if 700 promptly paid subscriptions could be ensured, ends would almost be met. The number recently to hand is strongly international, representing America, Poland, France, Syria and Germany.

THE Prime Minister, at the Victoria Hotel luncheon recently, before his Methodist audience, did well to recall John Wesley's emphatic pronouncement on the criminality of war. These are his words:

"If, then, all nations, Pagan, Mohammedan, and Christian, do in fact make this their last resort, what further proof do we need of the utter degeneracy of all nations from the plainest principles of reason and virtue? Of the absolute want, both of common sense and common humanity, which runs through the whole race of mankind. . . . And surely all our declarations on the strength of human reason and the eminence of our virtues are no more than the cant and jargon of pride and ignorance, so long as there is such a thing as war in the world. Men in general can never be allowed to be reasonable creatures till they know not war any more. So long as this monster stalks uncontrolled, where is reason, virtue, humanity? They are utterly excluded, they have no place; they are a name, and nothing more."

That fine declaration, added Lloyd George, should be inscribed on the walls of the League of Nations, where they can be read forever.

AS OTHERS SEE US.

The question of how far we may give heed to what others say of us, has lately been raised in The Friend (London); one writer remarking that he "shudders to hear" complimentary phrases quoted about the Society of Friends, when we must be conscious of our many failures and shortcomings, etc.

Perhaps such expressions will not hurt us so long as we listen to the spirit expressed by the small boy who had just listened to a talk about the work of the American Friends' Service Committee, including some grateful expressions of the German children, who had been having "Quaker feeding."

"How ought such letters to make us feel?" queried the speaker.

"They ought to make us feel that we must be as good as these people think we are!" promptly answered the eager little boy.

Edward N. Vallandigham has lately written a pleasant book on "Delaware and the Eastern Shore," giving much of interest to the historian, and to the lover of Nature also. It is well illustrated, and presents in both text and picture "Some Aspects of a Peninsula pleasant and well-beloved," as the author says.

The chapter on "Early Churches and Religious Movements" contains this paragraph:—

"The Friends in proportion to their number have exercised a singularly powerful influence on the Peninsula, and they have made the contemptuous term 'Quaker' a title of honor. Their greatest strength was, almost from the first, in and about Wilmington, in which each branch of the Society has a large, plain but seemly meeting-house. Elsewhere in Delaware the sect is weak, but there are little groups of Quakers from end to end of the Peninsula. Perhaps the smallest house of worship in America is the Quaker meeting-house of brick, built at Odessa in 1685, and said to have been a station on the 'underground railroad,' which carried escaped slaves to safety in Canada." (This is now used as a meeting-house by the colored people.) "There is another old Quaker meetinghouse in Talbot, not far from Easton. Wherever the sect is found, its folk stand for what is best in life, private or public.

"The Quakers of the Peninsula have kept the peace through six wars and have tended the sick and wounded in all those conflicts. They have also been a silent example of civil and domestic peace, of thrift, order, cleanliness, to their neighbors, of whatever creed or politics, and their philosophy of life, to which a war-weary world now seeks to give a grudging and qualified assent, shines with quiet light upon the placid face of many a man and woman speaking no longer the 'plain language,' and wearing no longer the badge of drab raiment."

The American Friend lately published an interesting article entitled "Down to the Sea in Ships—A Story of Whales and Quakers," by which it appears that an effort has been made to preserve a true history of the business of whaling in a motion picture film. The article states: "If 'tis true the whaling industry made and was made by New Bedford, so is also true the statement that both were made by Quakers. Quaker blood was on many a whale-ship, and many a vessel was owned and officered by leading Quakers. And the annals of the New Bedford of a hundred years ago read like a monthly meeting record."

The author goes on to tell how the revival of interest in whaling has come about, and adds, "Then, too, the Quakers have been before the public so much recently because of their sincere acts of practical Christian love, that interest in any phase of Quakerism is natural."

Some enterprising young men have seized upon this widespread interest, and have expended much thought and time and money in this effort to reproduce the New Bedford of the past. The old whaler Charles W. Morgan, manned by a retired captain, who chose his own crew, was sent to the Caribbean Sea, and as whales have become more plentiful of late years, it was not difficult to get some genuine pictures of whaling, as it is shown in action.

The "Quaker Scenes" were made at "the old Apponagansett Meeting-house, half way between Allen's Neck and New Bedford," which was first occupied in 1790. Some people descended from the early Friends who worshipped there took part in the scenes, "which centre around the old-fashioned Quaker wedding."

Did the article end here we might be left with a feeling that precious old things were being handled by those who did not really care for or understand them.

But the writer proceeds, "If you who see the picture feel as I felt as I faced some of those scenes during the camera work, your blood will tingle and your eyes will moisten."

"If we to-day who think we are beyond plain clothes and absolute silence, and must move on with progress and do something—work for outward results which we are able to hold in our hands and say, 'We're alive; see what we've done'—if we to-day might only at the same time be more genuine in our spiritual concerns! I do not believe that plain clothes and silence alone produce that, but when you have them all in combination, there is power."

He adds, "I think the head electrician too, knows what I mean. He came to me after the photographing of the silent meeting. His unsolicited remarks were somewhat as follows:

' . . . I have managed electrical equipment for movies all over the world and in every conceivable situation; . . . but I can honestly say I never helped in the filming of any scene that even compared with the profound beauty of that silent meeting.' And his lips quivered as he spoke."

The Heart of Quakerism.

(The substance of an address given at Guilford College, North Carolina, nineteenth of Ninth Month, 1922.)

T. Edmund Harvey.

It is not easy to express in words, or even in thoughts, the deepest things of life. There are experiences which our best thoughts can only imperfectly express, and our words fall short of our thoughts. The heart of Quakerism can be described but imperfectly, for it involves an experience which goes beyond words and beyond the thoughts that lie behind words. To understand it we must get in touch with the life behind word and thought of which they are the imperfect and partial expression.

The Master used two ways of teaching men spiritual truths; sometimes it was by sharp, glowing, short sentences, which struck like swords or went home like quivering arrows into the conscience of the hearers; sometimes again it was by embodying His lesson in story form, like the germ within the husk of a seed; men would carry the parable away and not realize until later the life that was in it. As in that day, men to-day need not a worked-out system or philosophy, but rather seed thoughts, that will live and grow with their changing lives.

The greatest teacher of ancient Greece did not claim to impart truth to his disciples; Socrates compared his office to that of a nurse, helping to birth the ideas in his hearers' minds. If we in our day are to help to birth the living thought in the hearts of men, we must find, as each generation must find, a new translation of truth into a language which men can understand. We must not simply be content with the words, or even the thoughts, in which our fathers expressed the truth; for words lose their meaning as the years go by, and thoughts are imperfect and grow old, though the truth behind them remains young. Thus the living heart of Quakerism must find new expression in each succeeding age.

Near the outset of George Fox's public ministry, in the year 1648, occurred a remarkable scene which helps us to realize the message which found expression throughout his life thereafter. He had gone to the great church at Nottingham, and he tells us how he saw the people there "like fallow ground" and the preacher "like a great clod of earth" preaching from the pulpit, words which had no life in them. The preacher had taken as his text 2 Peter i: 19: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts." For once Fox could not wait till the sermon was ended; the truth he saw burned so brightly, so urgent was the message. "The more sure word of prophecy," said the preacher, was the Bible, the book which of all others Fox knew and loved, as but few since his day have done. Leaping up upon his seat in the church, the young man cried: "O no, it is not the Scriptures!" It was, he told them, "the Holy Spirit, by which the holy men of old gave forth the Scriptures." Not the words, not even the thoughts themselves behind them, but the very life from which these thoughts sprang, here was the sure and certain guide. In his own experience George Fox had come to realize that the Divine Spirit that had taught the old prophets was not just speaking to men from far off and from long ago, but here and now; making the ancient words of the Bible live, and appealing directly to the spirit of each individual. The preacher, with all his learning, was speaking what he knew but at second hand, through the medium of other men's experience. Fox was no scholar, and his explanation of the truth he saw might be imperfect, but his whole soul was aflame with the eternal verity with which he had come into actual contact, the reality of the Divine Presence, here and now, in the midst of human life. The Divine message was bigger even than the Bible. It did not communicate itself alone through the pages of a Sacred book, but came directly to the listening heart of man. Everywhere he saw in men the possibility of this communion, and to this Divine witness present and striving in their hearts he made his constant appeal. "To that of God in you I speak," he would say to his opponents. All his ministry, throughout His strenuous life of toil and hardship, was based on this first-hand experience of the Divine presence and his faith that all might share it who would listen to and follow the leading of the same Divine voice.

George Fox directed his hearers to the light of Christ "which lightens every man coming into the world," the light of Christ within them. In later years men have spoken of this as the doctrine of the Inner Light. Fox and the early Friends, however, were not trying to teach a theological dogma, but to bring men to test for themselves the truth which they shadowed forth by this word-picture of the "universal and saving Light." Sometimes they used other metaphors, and in his later years especially, George Fox was fond of using the beautiful symbol of the Seed of God to describe the Divine presence in human life. In the thought of the Seed, which we find in the Gospel parables, there is conveyed the idea of the new birth of the inner life of the soul, which is like the mysterious change which takes place when the grain is buried in the ground and the outer husks perish and are transformed, while the germ puts out its shoots. It is a metaphor from a life-process, and it conveys, too, the thought of such growth being a function of the spiritual life, just as it is of the natural. As the seed of this new life grew into flower amongst the fellow disciples of George Fox, its expanding life unfolded. It made men realize more fully the implications of Christianity, alike in industrial and in social life. It brought a new spirit into their treatment of human affairs, involving the readjustment of relationships between buyers and sellers, masters and servants. It led to a new vision of the injustice of the established penal system, and in course of time challenged the ancient and deep-rooted institution of slavery. The fellowship of men and women who were brought to share in this experience and in the joy of common worship showed in their relation to each other another aspect of this growing life that held them together. There was no thought at the first of the founding of a new sect; they were all simply "the friends of Truth;" they were naturally the friends of one another; they tried to be friends to all men. Unconsciously they grew into a society, and that society, the Society of Friends.

Quite early in his ministry George Fox was asked to become a captain in the army of the Commonwealth and declined, because he felt that his life was dedicated to a service in which war was no longer possible: he had come under the authority of the Spirit that "takes away the occasion of wars." Little by little the early Quakers came unitedly to the same standpoint. The story of Thomas Lurting, "the fighting Quaker turned peaceable Christian," as his own little book quaintly calls him, illustrates the wonderful way in which this positive ideal of peace grew up naturally and without argument in the lives of these followers of the Light. When a boatswain's mate on one of Blake's man-of-war, Lurting came across two soldiers who had attended some Quaker meetings. When they had gone away, he and one or two fellow sailors gradually came to meet in a quiet spot for worship, absenting themselves from the formal services conducted by the ship's chaplain. They won their way through persecution and hardship to the respect of captain and crew, and were chosen for the most dangerous tasks, as being the most trustworthy men on the ship. Then one day quite suddenly, as he was pointing a gun at a Spanish fort, there came a flash of further insight, as Lurting realized what his action meant. "What would it be," he thought, "if I should kill a man?" He could fight no longer, when he once realized all that it involved. He consulted his friends and fellow worshippers and found that he had not been alone in reaching this conviction, and once more, in spite of danger of death for disobedience, he and his friends were faithful to their conviction. His own simple narrative records how he faced the angry captain, relying only on the unseen Helper who had led him to this new life, how he persevered in after years when carried off repeatedly by the press gang, and how with marvellous courage and wisdom, when the merchantman of which he was mate was captured by Algerine pirates, he was able to recover his vessel and to land his captors, who were now in his power, as freemen in their own country.

The story of Thomas Lurting shows how, in isolation from their fellow believers, a few unlettered men, as they followed faithfully the guidance of the spirit of Christ, came to carry out an ideal of human relationships which is but rarely realized even to-day. Three generations later John Woolman, the humble tailor and farmer of New Jersey, following in apostolic simplicity the same guide, was able to lead the whole Society of Friends of which he was a member, and ultimately a far wider company of men and women, to understand that slavery was incompatible with the very nature of Christianity, and to effect a silent revolution of life which not merely made its abolition inevitable, but pointed the way to the solution of the social and industrial problems with which today our world is burdened. His "plea for the poor" or "A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich," as it is more widely known, sets forth in simple and beautiful language the essential social implications of the Christian faith as perhaps no other writing since his day has done, and as we read the story of his unselfish life, in which he strove increasingly for the attainment of right, socially and personally, and above all to identify himself with the lot of those who suffered hardship and wrong, while he dealt with the wrong-doers themselves as their friend and brother, we feel that his appeal for the way of life which he urged goes far beyond the circumstances of his own age and country. What higher social aim could we frame for ourselves than that of John Woolman? "To turn all that we possess into the channel of universal love becomes the business of our lives!"

JOYOUS COURAGE.

I LIKE the man who faces what he must
With step triumphant and a heart of cheer,
Who fights the daily battle without fear;
Sees his hope fail, yet keeps unflinching true
That God is God; that somehow true and just
His plans work out for mortals.

GEORGE CADBURY.

AN APPRECIATION.

"Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?"

Through the passing away of George Cadbury, at Birmingham, England, the world has lost one of its great men. No one could be in his company for even a short time without becoming aware of his intrinsic greatness, and this grew upon one the more one knew of his character and work.

It is not proposed here to attempt a biographical sketch of George Cadbury, but rather a brief appreciation by one who knew him well and loved him deeply.

Any one trying to describe him would, I think, speak of him first as a great humanitarian. He loved his fellows. He saw the world in terms of men and women and children, as individuals to be known and helped, and if there was one call to which his nature answered more swiftly than another it was to the cry of wronged or suffering children.

Perhaps next should be put his genius for business. He possessed an unerring instinct for the right course and the right moment, and when to this is likened his power of hard toil and concentration, his success in business is not surprising. Combined with his genius for business, or perhaps a part of it, was a power of quick and accurate judgment of character. In this he was rarely at fault.

When wealth came to him he retained his simple tastes, and it would be difficult to find anyone who acted more conscientiously in obedience to the doctrine of stewardship. He gave royally. No one will ever know the extent of his benefactions. They were manifold and far-reaching, not careless or haphazard but the result of careful consideration. Also, their results were watched and reviewed and frequent counsel given to insure application to the best advantage. Extravagance or carelessness in the administration of funds was abhorrent to him.

There was about him a rare thoughtfulness for others. He was quick to discern a need or an embarrassment, and if the person concerned appeared worthy of help he would give it gladly and ungrudgingly, not material help only, but sympathy and understanding advice as well.

Some would describe him as a dreamer, and he certainly dreamed noble dreams for the help of his fellow-men, dreams of a truer application of Christianity, a higher social order, a finer international relationship. But he was much more than a dreamer. He was dowered with the capacity for giving concrete expression to his dreams and in this he was the most practical of men. Once a purpose had been formed nothing was allowed to stand in the way of its realization, difficulties ceased to exist, or existed only to be overcome.

There was about him an extraordinary tenacity of purpose and conviction. It would be almost correct to say that he did not hold but was held by his convictions.

His was a most devout spirit. His whole life and thought were permeated by his faith. In his letters, in conversation, in the midst of business, when meeting some group of visitors interested in social questions, when speaking from a political platform, his faith found expression simply, unostentatiously, as a matter of course.

He was a true Friend, an elder and recorded minister, and few can have done more in recent years for the extension of Quakerism, but he was keenly alive to the shortcomings of the Society and in intimate conversation would often denounce them in no measured terms.

With such gifts it is not surprising that he accomplished much.

To him is mainly due the extraordinary growth of the factory at Bourneville from a small concern to one with world-wide connections employing perhaps 10,000 workers. He was always most careful of the interests of those who worked at the factory and gave much thought and care to schemes for their welfare. Perhaps the enterprise which lay nearest his heart was the founding and extension of the Village and Estate of Bourneville, and the Trust to which he transferred its control and all his financial interest in it. As is well known this is a Housing and Town Planning experiment to provide good housing conditions for working men. The Estate now consists of over eight hundred acres with three villages. The assets stand at £367,000 and the revenue last year was £12,000. The village has been visited by thousands from all parts of the world and has been a powerful stimulus to Housing and Town Planning reform.

Another very special interest was the Adult School Movement. For fifty years George Cadbury acted as a teacher, and thousands of men passed under his influence during that period. It was largely his experiences in the homes of these men that led to his interest in Housing reform, and when he founded the village of Bourneville, it was of the members of his class that he was specially thinking.

His interest in social and religious work led to the founding of Woodbrooke Settlement, his desire being that those interested in the work of Friends, the Adult School Movement, and other forms of service might there have an opportunity for study, experience and fellowship. Woodbrooke took root and developed, and set an example which led to the establishment by others of kindred institutions until a group of five came into being dealing with preparation for Foreign Mission work, Bible Schools and social service. George Cadbury rejoiced at the union of Christians from many churches to which this led, and when a scheme for federating the institutions was adopted he gave liberally to it. The words, "That they all may be one," was a prayer often upon his lips.

Always interested in politics he used to describe himself as a Radical, and as time went on he became increasingly identified with the Labor Party.

In the interests of fair play and political honesty he entered the newspaper world by the purchase of the Daily News. He believed strongly in the influence of the press, and was always most eager that this influence should be thrown on the side of justice, freedom and righteousness at home and abroad.

This is a very imperfect appreciation of a rich and noble character, but perhaps it may serve to give some little idea of its worth. Had George Cadbury been willing to receive them, honors and titles would have been bestowed upon him. He refused, but he lives to-day and will long continue to do so, in the deep love and esteem of all who knew him. Of him it is true in a very special sense, "He rests from his labors and his works do follow him."

BOOK REVIEW.

"EUROPEAN DESCRIPTIVE AND THOUGHTFUL VERSE," by MARGARET COPE.

There is always pleasure in coming across literary work which has an intimate touch, that makes one feel that the author is thoroughly familiar with the places described, and also intimate in another sense, revealing the sincere thoughts and emotions of an artistic personality.

The slender volume of poems by Margaret Cope, of Awbury, Germantown, recently published by the John C. Winston Co., is a collection of word pictures of countries well known and loved by the author, with some occasional contemplative verse, as is suggested by the descriptive titles, "Pictures from the Pyrenees;" "Cathedral Reveries;" and "Seven Years After."

Embodied in the work is a prose account of the author's journey from Italy to England after the declaration of war in 1914, which is interesting in itself, and doubly so on account of its historic association.

One would know that these poems, imbued almost every line with a keen sense of the loveliness of the bountiful colors of nature, were written by an artist, accustomed to see the beautiful where many of us would pass it by; and the pictures so drawn bring vivid scenes of the far-off subjects to the mind's eye, as in "The Valley," "Avignon," "Pré St. Didier" and many others.

A different tone pervades those poems written in Switzerland—a horror of and protest against the utter cruelty and seeming needlessness of the war that was then engulfing the world, in contrast with the spirit of peace and restfulness conveyed by the majority of the other poems, and these few composed as the Swiss were mobilizing for defense, will bring back to the reader the sense of astounded incredulity and horror that was everywhere felt when the magnitude of the catastrophe was realized.

Those poems under the heading of "Seven Years After," written in England and Brittany, are full of feeling and very rhythmical—it is perhaps not legitimate to criticize poems in bulk, but these seem to be on a little higher poetic plane than the others. Notably, there is "Ears have they, but they hear not," and "London Chimes," the latter reminding one of some of the musical old London street songs of a couple of centuries ago.

Taken all in all these poems are well worth reading, and owing, too, with many a pretty picture and thoughtful phrase, and many of them expressing the author's deep faith and mystical religion.

Two poems, short, but pregnant with poetic feeling, are quoted in full below.

A SIMPLE PICTURE.

Sweet patient face! In the Cathedral vast Counting thy beads, after thy life of toil!
Dost thou not hear thy Saviour's voice at last?
"Thy faith hath made thee whole."

I know not what thy life of toil may be
On faith confessed! I only see thy face
Beneath its spotless fluted cap, with eyes upturned, Waiting thy Saviour's grace.

Bells Chiming.

Go, go in peace, thy soul's release
Is sure, for thou believest.
To meek in heart will God impart
What thou in faith receivest.

Followed by other verses denoting the chiming of the bells, ending with the clock striking the hour of Vespers, "Faith, Hope, Love, Joy, Peace."

EVENING—A L'ABBAUE DE ST. JACUT.

Liquid fire, and pearl, and opal,
Glimmering, shimmering, reaching far
To the shores across the water
Where the purple shadows are;
And the flaming sky above them,
Stretching wings of gold and gray
Into heights of pearly azure—
Far away—ah, far away—
While the Convent bells are ringing,
And the little waves are singing
Round the bay—all round the bay.

BRETAGNE, Ninth Month 30, 1921.

The Intelligencer gives the following and every self-respecting religious paper should rejoice that Lansdowne has shown us what some of us should do.

Lansdowne Monthly Meeting has sent a letter to the editors of the leading Philadelphia daily papers protesting against the undue prominence given to unsavory news matter in the reporting of social misdemeanors of persons of this and other States. Such news is not demanded nor desired by the self-respecting and law-abiding readers and is considered by them as undesirable reading for the young and inexperienced members of their families. They urged these editors to use their influence to have their respective papers emphasize not the evil, but the things of good report.

In the Far East.

William C. Allen.

BATAVIA.

We were sorry to leave Singapore with all its charm and pleasant hospitality and Christian associations, but were glad to be relieved of one thing when we reached Batavia. We got from under the curse of dealing with money changers. It seems as if every city in the Far East has its own kind of money and, though the traveler may be but a few hours or days in a given locality, he is compelled to exchange his money for that of the last place he visited. It is impossible even with the greatest care to avoid having some little money left over as you go from city to city—you do not come out even. The "shaving" exercised by these local dealers in money is altogether frightful, and much good value disappears in these minor but necessary financial transactions. You exchange one dirty patched-up set of notes for another, and so it goes on indefinitely. "They are robbers!" exclaimed a man the other day, when speaking of the money changers. I do not wonder that they desecrated the temple with their unholly trade in the time of our Lord and that He overturned their tables. In Java we met with stable currency once more.

That reminds me: there is considerable difference in the terms on which we could secure guilders in Java on our letters of credit. Sometimes a Dutch banking institution would offer us 252 guilders for every one hundred dollars of United States money, whereas the International Banking Corporation at the same hour would offer us 258 guilders for a draft of the same amount. It sometimes pays to do a little shopping when purchasing money abroad.

When we reached Java our first great impression was that we had come across a different variety of mosquitoes, to say nothing of an infinite variety of hitherto unknown tongues. Of what use are mosquitoes, anyhow? How unfortunate was that unhappy incident of the Tower of Babel! How often have mosquitoes and linguistic differences induced sulphurous explosions from travelers who are otherwise guileless and desire to do well! Probably God forgives them more than they realize.

Batavia is about three hundred years old and has some 200,000 inhabitants. It lies in the lowlands close to the sea. The old town is one of winding streets, ditch-like waterways, quaint old houses and architecturally carries the appearance of a Dutch city. Here are the wholesale commercial establishments and the great banks. A few modern buildings accommodate some of these big concerns. In other cases the old homes of wealthy residents have been modernized for business purposes. When you go to make a business call it is quite likely that you ascend an antique staircase with a handsome balustrade and back in loft-like rooms discover the offices which you seek.

The new city of Batavia is known as Weltevreden. It is totally different in appearance. It is the fashionable shopping district. Here are the foreign hotels and residences. From its wider thoroughfares radiate the leafy-shaded streets flanked on either side by stone walls and pleasant-looking old houses with pretty gardens and grand old trees. This part of Batavia is not as beautiful as Honolulu or Pasadena, but I like the big generous rooms of these ancient houses with their tiled floors and high ceilings and broad doors permitting an uninterrupted sweep of the tropical breeze through the whole house. How cramped and close and chopped-up seem the California bungalows in comparison. Those nifty Dutchmen knew how to build very comfortable homes near the Equator.

The old and new towns are about three miles apart, and are connected by a long street, in the midst of which is "The River," which in reality looks just like a broad canal in steady old Holland, but which offers sights never seen in that delightful country. "The River" is a straight but filthy stream enclosed between thick stone walls with steps leading down to the water at intervals. At these openings all day long are seen the Javanese, Malays and Chinese washing themselves or their clothes,—if you can say that they "wash" in such atrocious fluid—adroitly stripping themselves and their children with a fair degree of modesty in the heart and the life of the city. We had a faint apprehension that our own laundering was done under such conditions, but never dared to make an investigation. I do not overlook the comical little tram-trains that operate between Batavia and Weltevreden. They are pulled by square-shaped little engines propelled by compressed steam. The steam is pumped into the boilers at the end of the line, and if it holds out, as it generally does, you reach your destination. If the steam gives out, you are for the moment "gone!"

In Batavia we had our first introduction to a typical Javanese hotel, the Hotel des Indes. The Dutch diet we had from Singapore on the Dutch ship—its heavy food with meats and fried done-overs and little else—were forgotten when we met with the generous supply of fruits and vegetables in this excellent hostelry. All the hotels of Java, if the traveler is going to be comfortable, are very expensive, but are very efficiently conducted. The Hotel des Indes, like others, consisted of a large central building, where were the offices, dining-room and exchange, whilst on three sides about one hundred feet from the central building were the bungalow-like one and two-story buildings where were the rooms for the guests. Our apartments were two large rooms with very high ceilings and great windows and slatted doors opening out to lovely porches on both sides so that the air by day and night could be enjoyed by us. The front porch was furnished as a living-room and there we spent much of our time when attending to indoor work or receiving callers. The building was constructed most substantially. The porches had heavy handsome railings which gave a vastly different aspect to our surroundings from what we would be able to acquire even in America where the construction appears to be so much lighter and less enduring in character. Handsome stained glass screens separated the porches belonging to the different apartments. Our outlook was across the few acres of the park in which the hotel was situated and this included a view of some umbrageous trees within one hundred feet of us, among them two great banyan trees fully thirty feet in diameter near the base, with enormous spread of graceful boughs and darkening foliage. Our comforts here were so generous compared with the trying experience we oftentimes have met with since the war that I am glad to tell about them. Java has some splendid hotels.

In Batavia we obtained our first introduction to the church people and missionaries whom we had come to see. It was the beginning of a delightful experience connected with meeting the brethren of whom I hope to tell more later. One of our interesting visits in Batavia was associated with "Children's Day" at one of the places of worship of the American Methodist Mission. The work there is among the Chinese and, as in Java, they speak the Malay language only, the service was conducted in that tongue. The little folks were in high spirits and behaved very well. All were well-dressed and very clean. There were numerous hymns and once more I heard praises sung in a language that was new to me. The childish voices were soft and beautiful, reminding me somewhat of the Polynesian tongue, but the tunes were familiar. Part of the service consisted of recitations in English and Malay by the children. All did well—particularly one small girl in a very pretty light pink frock. At one period all were given paper crowns and solemnly filed outside and then in an extraordinarily short time gaily marched back and stood in front of the pulpit where they joined in song. Then we addressed them. I like to tell young people in different countries the grand old story of Him who loved the little children and of the many privileges in many lands that are enjoyed by those who have given their fealty to Jesus Christ.

TOBIJAH AND THE TUCKER TARHEELS.

MARGARET T. APPELGARTH.

Nobody understood at all why the Lady should gather the little dumb girl into her arms and onto her knees as she kissed her, crying: "Oh, but Beth has the loveliest name of you all, the very loveliest, for wasn't it in Bethlehem where Christ was born?"

A silence fell. At first she thought this was because the Tuckers were impressed. But when she looked into their faces lighted only by the flickering logs upon the fireplace she saw that their expression said as plain as day: "Well, what of it? We're waiting."

"D-don't you know who Christ is?" she stammered.

"Nope!" The little Tuckers shook their heads, and Ma Tucker added: "Taint as if I hadn't always aimed to tell 'em lots of things, but I been so took up with work and tiredness. Eight kids is plenty. I reckon they knows who God Almighty is, all right, though."

"Oh, yes," added the Tuckers, God Almighty they knew. He was where you went when you died good. But when they heard the whole story of Bethlehem they agreed it was by far the dearest name of all, and smothering their yawns, they begged eagerly to sit up all night and hear some more—for wasn't this their only chance in a lifetime to catch up with news? But it was far too late already; so Tobijah dragged from underneath the bed another mattress on which all the boys lay down, while the others slept sideways, like sardines, upon the lumpy bed. And because she was the guest, the Lady From Far Off was given the edge nearest the fireplace, furthest from those draughty chinks between the logs.

Next day the lady spent the morning telling the wonders of a school for boys where she longed to have Tobijah come. There he could learn new ways of farming as well as get book-knowledge, and—would they believe it?—but some Christian children from up north had sent money to pay for some boy's schooling one whole year! some very special boy, they wrote. And it had dawned on her that Tobijah was special! Could they spare him for this chance?

"Such a hub-bub! Solomon was sure that he and 'Bakuk could hoe and plant and harvest. Boanerges also boasted of his powers. Dash volunteered to mind the pigs! So when must Toby start? And how long must Toby stay? And wouldn't it be fine when Toby was a scholar! My!

There was no calendar in the cabin, of course, so before she left, the Lady notched the door-jamb with nine nicks. "Each day cross off a nick," she ordered, "and on the ninth morning start for school, Tobijah. I'll be watching for you! Good-bye."

So nothing ever was the same again. For in their endless loneliness she had awakened a new interest. And there was the precious Bible, too! (They kept it wrapped in mammy's patchwork quilt.) Moreover, every morning Tobijah marked off a nick upon the door-jamb till the ninth dawn came. And then solemnly the Tuckers escorted him to the rising of the nearest hill.

"Nary one of you must come farther," he ordered, trying hard to swallow a queer marble in his throat.

Queenofsheba clutched his arm: "Stuff your head jam-full, Toby Tucker! And now I reckon we'd best turn back, for Dash and Thusay have come a right smart piece for babies."

So Tobijah traveled on alone, while the marble in his throat grew boulder-size. And he thought it was a powerful misty morning. But the sun had never risen quite so pink or clear; the mist was all in Tobijah's eyes, I fear.

"Hi there!" yelled Queenofsheba from way off, "Mind— you—care—for—mammy's—shoes! Save—'em—till—you—gets—there!"

From the far bend of the woods below Tobijah waved obediently. He could not yell on account of the marble that felt like a boulder. But what had struck Quee, anyhow? He hugged the shoes closer under his arm; he reckoned he knew without being told how to be careful of the onliest shoes in the whole Tucker family!

At noon he ate a hunk of bacon and dry bread, then tramped on and on and on till sundown, when he slept in a farmhouse. Dawn saw him off once-more, and toward noon he spotted "it" down in the valley: neat red roofs that covered clean white houses: SCHOOL! Another mile, then he sat down to put on mammy's shoes. They felt too tight! He dusted off his tight homespun breeches and stepping jauntily upon the pebbled driveway, tried to act exactly as if he'd come to school in the valley a dozen times before. But the marble that had spent yesterday in his throat was now bouncing around in his heart, and I don't know what he would have done if his Lady From Far Off had not been near-to, watching for him at the window, so that the worst was over before it began. And Tobijah started in school.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

KING GEORGE has again shown his interest in the free churches of Great Britain. When informed of the organization by the Evangelical Free Churches of a movement in support of world peace, he said:

"The king feels it to be pre-eminently the duty of the churches at the present time to declare their faith that the only warfare worth waging is against those evils which have throughout history brought upon the nations the horrors of war.

"His majesty wishes the free churches all success in their high endeavor."

[Signed] STAMFORDHAM.

IN mid-summer the W. C. T. U. of Tuckerton, N. J., were willing to gather a Peace Meeting in the Methodist Church building and invite other denominations. About 100 persons assembled on a very warm night and were addressed by Hannah P. Morris.

As the W. C. T. U. has a Peace Department the members were glad to revive their interest and asked for our literature.

FRANCIS R. TAYLOR spoke Tenth Month 28th, to members of the Women's Club of Reading on Internationalism and World Peace.

On the afternoon of Eleventh Month 14th Harold Evans spoke at the Mercantile Club, Philadelphia, to the Council of Jewish Women on Internationalism and World Peace, and Watson W. Dewees was asked to show our educational Peace slides.

In 1904 the Intercollegiate Peace Association had its inception at Goshen College, following a conference of representatives from Mennonite, Dunkard and Friends' colleges in Ohio and Indiana. During the war the Association did not hold together.

At the Bluffton, Ohio, conference in the Eighth Month so much interest was expressed that the Association has been revived. They are asking the sympathetic support of Philadelphia Friends in their peace work in the colleges.

The Seabury sisters of New Bedford are providing money for oratorical contests. Those interested may be glad to know that the Secretary is Professor Miller of Bluffton College.

ARMISTICE DAY.

The Springfield Republican in its issue of Eleventh Month 23 has an interesting editorial entitled "A Socialist Among the Quakers" with these words:—

"The Quaker contribution to the up-building of well-being throughout the world is gloriously out of proportion to the number of the sect. Having a religion which depends upon the 'inner light'—a type of mysticism—they have translated it into the most practical forms of benevolence."

To many of us looking back upon our splendid inheritance and to the great opportunities which lie before us at the present day, of showing a true spirit of brotherhood and co-operation, it seems as if we have fallen very far short of the splendid tribute paid us in the lines quoted above.

However, it was possible to take a very small part in the peaceful celebration of Armistice Day of the eleventh, joining with the Women's International League, Race Street Friends, and other organizations.

Throughout the city from 12 until 2 o'clock, simultaneous meetings were held at Ninth and Chestnut Streets; Broad and South Streets; Broad and Locust Streets; City Hall courtyard; Broad and Columbia Avenue; Band Stand.

In each place a chairman was in charge and the speakers were sent in automobiles from one meeting to the next.

Among the speakers were Frederick J. Libby, Augustus Cadwallader, Wm. I. Hull, Joseph Morris, Walter Abell, Janet Payne Whitney, Jesse H. Holmes, Ruth Conrow, Wesley Frazier, of Haverford College. American Flags were carried and a banner bearing the words

ARMISTICE DAY, 1922

The Last War Was Fought to End War
MAKE PEACE PERMANENT.

There were hundreds of people present at these meetings, and the interest and attention of the men on the streets was encouraging. Now and again you could hear them say, "No, we do not want war," "No, I would not go again." Numbers of the American Legion spoke pleasantly of our un-antagonistic spirit. Much literature was distributed and even they who battled against the noise of street cars and heavy traffic voted that it was well worthwhile.

The central Public Library took our posters for their thirty branches and a list of recommended Peace Books to be posted on their Bulletin Boards. In John Ashhurst, Chief Librarian of the Public Library, we find a very fine spirit of co-operation. He has samples of all our literature in hand and was much gratified to receive a set of Disarmament posters to file with his thousands of War Posters!

The Y. W. C. A. through its central branch gave us good publicity and the secretary there is interested in Quaker pacifism.

At eight o'clock Strawbridge & Clothier kindly gave Frederick Libby an opportunity to give for ten minutes a talk through their Radio "Can we end war without changing human nature?" As they have a large broadcasting station, this was a much appreciated channel for peace propaganda.

Friends in Bucks County reached twenty-five communities—distributing through the mails large quantities of literature, through newspaper deliveries, at the American Legion parade, and placing upwards of two hundred posters in store windows.

In Moorestown, libraries and public schools were circulated.

In Wilmington again all Friends joined in a public meeting.

Friends' schools of both branches in Philadelphia were sent Commissioner Tigert's Peace Message for the schools and a suggested peace program for secondary schools. The Friends' Colleges and Boarding Schools throughout the country were reached by letters. In Philadelphia the schools in which Good Citizenship classes are held were brought under our committees' work through Maria C. Scattergood's kind aid. In the 22nd ward an interested Friend reached the schools with the Peace message and Oakmont High School through Ruth Conrow had an afternoon peace program.

As THE FRIEND goes to press, reports have reached us of Armistice Day meetings in the Friends' School of Moorestown, and Friends' Select, that Robert Norwood of Overbrook, spoke at Haverford Friends' School, and of a charming Peace Pageant at Westtown.

Haverford College had appropriate exercises. Wm. Dudley Foulke, of Indiana, addressed Swarthmore, and President Park herself spoke to the Bryn Mawr students.

Everywhere we have found the kindest co-operation, all seeming agreed that permanent peace will come in time if we are only faithful in educating the children of this land in truths about other lands, their peoples' ideals, civilization, and in the greatest teaching ever taught on this earth by our Master when He gave us His message!—a message for all time, that all men are brothers.

We have at the present time untold opportunities—only limited by the service and money that Friends are willing to give to this cause.

FLORENCE TRUEBLOOD STEERE.

A Simple Faith.

[This address was delivered by Senator George Wharton Pepper, Ninth Month 14th, at Monessen, Pa., at a convention of First-day schools and was sent us by a Friend with the request that we publish it.—Eds.]

Sunday Schools teach virtues. Life puts them to the test. Many apt scholars can name the three great theological virtues; but not all of these apt scholars are themselves exponents of Faith, Hope and Love.

To-night I intend to talk briefly about one of these three. I mean Faith. I intend to speak from the point of view of a man in public life. I want to lead you to consider the practical value of Faith as between citizen and citizen, as between group and group and as between nation and nation.

When I speak of practical value I mean just what I say. There is no such thing as a sound theory that will not work. There is no such thing as a virtue that fails to pay large dividends in human happiness. That is what I call "practical."

What do I mean by "Faith?"

I can best answer by relating it to Hope. In this life I cannot see ahead. I do not know what to-morrow will bring forth. I do know what I should like to have happen. My review of the past satisfies me that my wish may come true and thereupon my wish becomes a hope.

Hope, in other words, is the giving of substance to a wish.

Very well; I have a hope. Suppose I have it so intensely that the thing hoped for becomes a reality to me—that my certainty about the future equals my certainty about the past. When this happens, my hope is suddenly transformed into Faith.

Faith is the giving of substance to things hoped for. Just as a glorified wish is a hope, so intensified hope is Faith.

You remember that St. Paul in the wonderful thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians declares that Love is greater than either Hope or Faith. Why? Because Love is a relation between people, while Hope and Faith are private affairs of my own. Hope and Faith are lonely virtues. Love is a social virtue. As our lives are social lives, Love is the great determining force which should control them. "Faith: Hope: Love: these three. But the greatest of these is Love."

Granted; but Faith is a close second.

If I hope intensely enough that such a thing will happen, you will presently find me acting upon my hope. My conduct will be in line with my expectation. If the thing is something that I can influence by effort, I shall soon be working to bring it to pass. When we really hoped to join ocean to ocean we discovered that it could be done. We moved the mountains into the sea and made the Panama Canal.

If the thing hoped for is something which I cannot influence by effort, I am driven to exclaim: "Well—God can do it;" and the first thing you know you find me on my knees.

Intensified hope, that is, Faith—makes men work and makes men pray.

The hopeless man sticks around and does nothing. The faithless man is always asking, "What's the use?" The hopeful man is always on his toes. The man of faith is a human dynamo in his community.

In the first place, his general attitude toward his fellow-man is one of trust. Observe, I say his "general attitude." I do not mean that it is a good thing to trust the untrustworthy under all circumstances. But I do make two confident assertions: first, that an atmosphere of mutual confidence is the only one in which human happiness can thrive; and, second, that nothing so quickly transforms the untrustworthy as to treat him as one entitled to confidence. Every man who is habitually truthful is a generator of happiness.

Of course, the cynic can make fun of such a philosophy. It is easy to pick out instances in which the other fellow has made you look like a fool. One of O. Henry's most delightful stories tells of two crooks completely disarmed by one who appears to trust them implicitly. They find out too late that the other fellow is only counterfeiting trust in order to get their confidence and then grossly abuse it. But you can afford to let the cynic grin and still keep your faith in your fellow man.

In the second place a group of people characterized by faith is a tremendous power for good. If one group dealing with another will speak out frankly, tell all the facts and run the risk of being deceived by the failure of the other group to do likewise, there is not the slightest doubt that in the long run this policy will abundantly justify itself.

There are plenty of occasions in political life in which you will be told that you cannot afford to speak out, because if you do the other party will either think you are lying or will take advantage of your honesty. Nonsense! In the first place, it is better to be disobedient when telling the truth than to merit disbelief by failing to tell it. In the second place, if you really are truthful, in the end you will be believed; and to make the other fellow believe in you is to render him a great service.

Lately the attention of all of us has been focused upon certain great industrial tragedies—the bituminous strike, the anthracite strike, and the railway strike.

I call these things tragedies because, fundamentally, they are caused by, or prolonged by, lack of confidence. War is, of course, the greatest of tragedies. It is the climax of human distrust. It is the triumph of hate—the antithesis of love. These strikes are industrial wars. The operator group thinks it cannot trust the union. The union group believes it cannot trust the operators. Then comes a dead-lock. In such a situation third party intervention is the normal way out. But here again lack of confidence is manifest. The union will not surrender to any group whatsoever the right to bind it by decisions; it must reserve to itself the right of decision backed by the enormous power of the strike. The operators are reluctant to make any settlement which does not outlaw the strike,—because they fear the power to strike will be abused. Finally, the high-water mark of distrust is reached when it turns out to be impossible for anybody to attempt even mediation between the two groups without being accused or suspected of trying to make political capital out of the discharge of so obvious a duty.

Fellow-men, in the presence of such tragedies as these the proclamation of a Gospel of Faith is surely timely. We must restore confidence between man and man, between group and group, unless America is to become a jangle. The process may be slow and difficult. It is nothing less than the development of a public opinion so sane and so fair that individuals and groups will feel safe in trusting themselves to it—knowing this, that a public willing to impute good motives and to see the best in every man is a public that cannot do injustice or work an enduring wrong. You and your organization are powerful factors in making public opinion. I call upon you to live by faith; for it is the man of faith who in the last analysis is the just man.

I believe it to be demonstrable that living by faith is the only way to stabilize international conditions. This is not the time or place to enlarge upon this subject. Suffice it to say that the League of Nations is a futile device to keep the world at peace through political action; whereas the way out does not lie along the line of organized coercion but of greater international trust. Most of us do not realize that financial ruin cannot menace one nation without jeopardizing others. Germany has collapsed financially more completely than she collapsed on the battle-field. What will happen if she drags France down with her? What will such a catastrophe mean to Italy? Which of the ten-pins will prove steadfast enough to withstand the shock? I have no suggestions to make in regard to loans and credit, except to say that just as panics may be stopped by a policy of trust between bank and bank, so international chaos may be prevented by a larger measure of faith between nation and nation. And I point out to you that this is one of the ways in which faith justifies itself as a practical virtue; it saves situations which distrust would quickly convert into catastrophes.

Faith, simple Faith, is the thing that I commend to you. Faith in your neighbor. Faith in your public men. Faith in groups whose interest at first seems opposed to your own. Faith in America. Faith in Almighty God.

What more shall I say? For the time would fail me to tell of Gideon and Barak and Samson, and of Jephthah, of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets.

"Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions,

"Quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens."

Men and Brethren! America was founded in faith. Americans must live by faith. And you are Americans.

THE CALL FROM POLAND.

The following quotation from a recent report of one of the Friends' workers in Holoby, Poland, shows why those who know the extent of the needs in that country are concerned to have the Mission continue work there during the coming winter. The worker writes:

"The industries have shown decidedly during the last two weeks that, after a short time of rather better conditions during the harvesting, the people are beginning to dread the winter.

"One widow in Zajaczowka asked me to 'Please write this week and thank the people who send the money to keep the industries going.' Another tried very hard to persuade me to keep her money towards a horse. I explained that this was impossible, as I could not in any way promise any horses, and suggested that she should put the money on one side herself. 'But,' she said, 'When one is hungry, one just has to buy food for the children if the money is in the house.'"

This woman's final sentence is indicative of the condition of thousands of Polish peasants. They need food, they need implements for clearing their devastated land, they need horses with which to plow, many of them need even homes to shelter them. The slender means at their command are insufficient to provide for more than a fraction of all these needs. Only as they are aided by their more fortunate brothers in other countries can they survive the hardships which they are now enduring.

In the Vilna district, which the Friends' Mission is entering this winter, there are 40,000 people living in dugouts, trenches and branch shelters. In many of the villages whole families were wiped out last winter by starvation. Into this stricken district, the Friends' Mission plans to bring food for those who are in dire need of it, home industry work by which the women refugees can help to support themselves, horses for plowing, and for hauling timber that will be used in housing reconstruction.

The American Friends' Service Committee has had special difficulty in raising funds for the work in Poland, because of the fact that most of those of Polish descent in America are affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church and are not in sympathy with the inhabitants of Eastern Poland, which was formerly part of Russia, and which comes under the Greek Catholic Church. Others have declined to support the work because of certain policies of the Polish government.

But the peasant sufferers are not responsible for any of these conditions, and they deserve every bit of help which can be sent to them. The very fact that we may disagree with some of the policies of their government is all the more reason why we should endeavor to demonstrate the ideals of service and good-will among them. "Not they that are whole need a physician, but they that are sick." Funds for the work in Poland, contributed now, can render unlimited service in relieving distress and saving life this winter.

PENNIES THAT HELPED SAVE LIVES.

Some months ago a little American girl, having heard that Russian children were starving, took her pennies from her bank and gave a dollar to a Quaker relief worker who was just leaving for Russia. She wished it to be used in helping some little Russian girl. The American girl has just received a letter from the Quaker worker, in which he tells how the dollar was used. His letter, in somewhat abridged form, is as follows:—

"DEAR HESTER:

"The dollar which you gave, I put some time ago into the hands of a poor little fatherless Russian girl. At the rate of exchange then current, your dollar brought 4,000,000 roubles, and I can assure you that it did a wonderful lot of good for the little girl and her mother. It was enough to buy 50 pounds of rye flour to make delicious Russian rye bread, or to go a long way in buying warm woolen clothes for the winter. The Russian winters are terribly severe.

"The little girl has given me a note of thanks to you. It was written by her mother; for the girl, although eight years old, cannot read nor write. There has been practically no schooling in Sorochinskoye since the beginning of the famine. I am translating her letter of thanks for you. It is as follows:

"Much respected Miss Hester: I send you great thanks for your kindly help, for which I was very glad. I have gone through the very great famine. I ate various sorts of grass, and bone bread. We collected every bone we could find and pounded and ate it. And now we thank your Mission; it saved us from the famine. Mamma had to care for three children. Two died from starvation; but I somehow was saved.

"ANTONINA IVOROVNA GOVOROVA."

"This little girl Antonina would be glad to hear from you. I myself left America last February for Russia. I saw the famine at its worst, and have helped the Quaker relief workers to distribute some 25,200,000 pounds of food and clothing to the starving. It has been a wonderful work, but the end is not yet; the famine will be even worse this year if relief is not continued in full measure.

"With sincerest greetings,

"ROBIN LAMPSON."

How many other American children—young or old—have pennies in their banks, and sympathy in their hearts, to send this winter to the children of Russia?

ONE MORE USE FOR THE CLOTHING.

In the Totskoye district of the section of Buzuluk Uyezd, covered by the relief operations of the American Friends' Mission, hundreds of bales of clothing are being distributed to peasants who need clothes and can pay nothing for them. This is as it should be. The clothes were sent to Russia chiefly for free distribution. But Nancy Babb has a scheme whereby the clothes are used to great advantage in the industrial work which the Friends are organizing as well as in the equipping of hospitals and Children's Homes in this district.

She is aware of the almost unlimited need for wash-basins, buckets, firewood, plates, bowls, and so on in the institutions of her section. Therefore she has put aside a certain amount of this old clothing to be used in exchanges that will bring her the desired utensils. She knows also the need for bolts of linen and pounds of wool in the embroidery, spinning and weaving industries which the Quakers have organized among the peasants.

So it is something like this. If a peasant who possesses four pounds of wool, six arsheines (fourteen feet) of linen, a bowl, a plate, twenty-five pounds of wood, a good bucket, a large basin, brings any one of these articles to the clothing warehouse of the Quakers, he will receive a man's or a woman's outer coat. Varying quantities of any of the same list of articles will buy him a waist-coat, a pair of shoes, a sweater, a work shirt, a pair of gloves, a sewing-machine needle, a scarf, a hat, and so on.

There are limitations, of course, to what any one family can buy; for the scheme is not meant to be an encouragement to "speculators," but to honest peasants who need clothes and who have something useful to give for them.

A CORRECTION.

We regret an error which crept into our article "A Chance to Serve" last week. It was stated that Dr. Charles W. Eliot was chairman of the Boston committee which is collecting funds for Friends' Service work. Dr. Eliot is a member of the committee, and served as chairman at one of its recent public meetings. The Chairman of the committee itself, however, is Richard C. Cabot, widely known as Professor of Medicine, and as one of Boston's foremost representatives in the medical profession.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING was held on Seventh-day afternoon, Eleventh Month 4th, after an appreciated social opportunity, fostered by the serving of luncheon. Among the visitors present were John Henry and Mabel Barlow, J. Rowntree Gillett and H. Tregellis Gillett, all of England. They had been fraternal delegates to the recent Five Years' Meeting. We also had with us some members of our own Visitation Committee, including Hannah P. Morris and Max I. Reich.

The impressive theme in the first meeting was to see Jesus as over all; though yet we may not see all things put under Him, yet seeing Him and coming to know Him as the Supreme Power in the world, we can accept much that we do not understand, and which otherwise would be incomprehensible, and in simple faith hold fast to what may be revealed to us in the assurance that with Him all is well.

The business was proceeded with under a weighty covering, the Divine presence having been implored to meet with us. The session was mostly of a routine character, enlivened, however, by an interesting account given by Esther Morton Smith, of the Committee on Race Relations, of the foundation and growth of the Inter-racial Conferences which have been formed in many of our Southern States, having for their object the securing of exact justice and equal opportunity for all and especially for the Negroes. The counteracting of the malign influence of the growing Ku Klux Klan is another of the objects in view. Many prominent Southern women are taking an active part in these conferences and in the distribution of their literature. Members of our Committee had attended a series of meetings held during the past summer at Blue Ridge, North Carolina, to further this important work.

There is a growing feeling among the members that our Quarterly Meetings have become too formal in character, and that it would be well to devise some means by which more matters of life and importance may be considered in them. The reports of Esther Morton Smith and of her colleague, Sarah J. Kennard, were therefore the more appreciated.

[This brief extract from a letter to Elizabeth W. Garrett of Germantown, though in part repeating what we have already published, will be welcomed by all our readers.—Eds.]

ON BOARD STEAMER Resolute, of the United American Lines.
Tenth Month 17, 1922.

This is by far the largest and finest ship I have ever been on—its appointments are marvellous; but as it is not crowded at this time of year, we got everything at reasonable rates. . . . Our deck-chairs and dining-seats were all engaged beforehand and are splendidly placed.

What could be better or more fortunate than every convenience and comfort that we have—it makes me think of the unhappy people we are going to see, and wish we could somehow share the benefits with them; but how little of physical comfort we can bring! It must be more of the comfort of heart and mind that we aim to convey.

Yesterday a young Pole at the Polish Consulate, who said they had no record of the American Friends' Service Committee, and could not admit us to Poland free—when he saw the word "Quaker" on my application, quite altered his attitude. He said the priests and Jews in Poland did not like the Quakers, but all the people liked them, and the boys were "crazy over them"—they taught the boys games and camping.

He had read about the Quakers in the magazines—he asked me what their religion was like; I said it was like [simple] Christianity; that we were called "Friends" and tried to be friends to all men.

He asked if anyone could join the Quakers—I said "yes." "Could Jews join them?" he asked. "Oh, (I replied) they would have to become Christians first; but they could join them."

It was very interesting thus before starting to find how well known the good work of our predecessors has become in far-away Poland, and is reflected back in busy New York. The ship is now just starting to head down the river—we are off! This is to go by pilot.

ACCORDING to the Public Ledger (Philadelphia), "Twelve Quakers are listed among the hundreds who are seeking seats in the next Parliament. Members of the faith are found in only two parties, the Labor and Liberal, seven of them running on the former ticket and five on the latter.

"The Quaker women candidates, two in number, are Lady Barlow, who is contesting as a Liberal the High Peak Derbyshire constituency, and Dr. Ethel Bentham, who is out for one of the London seats as a Laborite."

PHILADELPHIANS as individuals have not been behind others in welcoming to their homes foreign college and university students resident temporarily in our city. The successful experiment made by Baltimore Friends recently along these lines is worthy of imitation.

Through the co-operative effort of the churches in the neighborhood of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Maryland, and the Hopkins Y. M. C. A., a reception for out-of-town Hopkins men was recently held at the Homewood Friends' Meeting House where the idea had started.

Lewis C. Moon, Secretary of the Homewood Meeting, wished the students to know that the Friends' Meeting House with its library is always open to Hopkins men. The ministers representing the various denominations gave short talks, and each one urged the students to join the church of whatever denomination they preferred and participate in its church life. One of the speakers pointed out that American colleges supervise their students' mental but not their moral training, and he thanked those responsible for this meeting for taking an interest in the latter, and told the students that participation in community life, as well as studies, was an important part of their education.

"THE Light that shines into man's heart is not of man, and must ever be distinguished both from the conscience which it enlightens, and from the natural faculty of reason which, when unsubjected to its holy influences, is, in the things of God, very foolishness."

NOT TOO DOGMATIC.

I remember reading years ago of Martin Luther's severe attack upon the great Copernicus, but not until within the past fortnight have the exact words come to my notice. Luther said: "People gave ear to an upstart astrologer who strove to show that the earth revolves, not the heavens or the firmament, the sun and the moon. This _____ wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy; but sacred Scripture tells us that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, not the earth."

But why drag to the notice of a twentieth century reader an incident so outworn as this? Simply because, as it seems to me, there is so much idle and worse than idle talk going the rounds of the secular and so-called religious periodicals of to-day that is as false in its teachings as this statement of Martin Luther. Luther we very well know was playing with fire when he called Copernicus to account for his teaching. The one had the broad universe of God spread out before him as the text book he handed to his students, the other the misconstrued and misinterpreted statements of the Bible.

We wonder to-day how two men so desirous of teaching the truth could have held and held so tenaciously to the opposing arguments in this historic case, but they did. Each built up his own school of thought and neither yielded to the ridicule, the threats or the arguments of the other. We are face to face with the same conditions to-day, though the field has shifted and instead of astronomy being the battle-ground between the scientist and the preacher it is biology that has taken its place.

No ground is further from my purpose than to enter upon a tirade concerning the theory of evolution. I have not the stores of knowledge to draw from, my facts are too hazy and no inclination prompts me to such an attempt. It cannot escape the notice of a thoughtful reader, however, that much is being written to-day in the weekly religious journals attacking this theory, in not a few cases using the weapon of ridicule in the endeavor to establish the desired ends. It is with a feeling of honest concern on the part of very many of our most religiously-minded people that they see this gaining ground among us.

Let us for a moment note the three great steps that have marked the Church's history as related to Infallibility. The Romanists taught and teach an infallible church, the Protestants under Luther and Calvin an infallible Bible; there came a man near the middle of the seventeenth century who made this declaration: "These things (referring to many truths which he felt were wrongly interpreted and falsely expressed by the priests and preachers of his day) I did not see by the help of me, . . . but I saw them in the light of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by His immediate Spirit and power. . . ." He wrote and said much more touching this same profound truth, but it is a safe challenge to offer, that he never recanted one iota of the great statement here made.

George Fox was a diligent reader of the Scriptures, his knowledge of them was broad and his reverence for them profound, but we shall never find the remotest approach to a hint that he exalted them to the place they held in the mind of the Protestant church of his day. I do not believe you will find in the whole catalogue of his writings the remotest hint of Copernicus and things Copernican. Geology had not opened her wonderful store-house and set the preachers the task they attempted and failed in, and as for Darwin and his school of thought, they were in the remote future, undreamed of. But had George Fox met these inquiries, had they been problems of his day, it is difficult to believe that he would have regarded them with any different feeling of concern than he did those violations of astronomical teaching which had so disturbed his fore-runners.

It is a worth-while question to put to yourself—How came the idea of an infallible Bible ever to have gotten the hold on the human mind that it has? There may be two partial explanations for this: one the careless use of the expressions, "The Word and the words of God," which we find crowding the pages of a certain type of church history; the other the declaration we read at the end of Revelation, which many a school boy as well as many a man of mature years has with-out any show of warrant applied to the whole body of the Bible. It is probably not too strong a statement to make that this is the only real evidence ever advanced in support of the infallibility of the Bible.

It has been written by one whose thoughtful presentation of truth has helped many a seeker to a clearer vision:—

"All the writings in the Bible are religious; in them God and His truth are the theme; taken as a whole, they give us more truth about religion, and better truth, than any other collection of works which has been or can be made. In this sense, therefore, we may call them the book of God, or the word of God. But we have no warrant whatever for saying that God wrote the Book, or that whatever is found in it must be regarded as His utterance. Such an idea is absolutely without foundation, and is indeed irreverent and even blasphemous."

We must not belittle this doctrine of infallibility as something that should be beneath the thought of the twentieth century. I do not know which of the two held the more tenaciously to it, Tom Paine or Charles Spurgeon. One found himself in later life ridiculing it and entertaining the honest thought that he had overthrown what no power will ever overthrow, the other growing, as years advanced, so wedded to the dogma, that George Fox's doctrine pained him, though later, despite the differences in their theology, he became one of Fox's warmest eulogists.

The story of Newton comparing himself with the child gathering pebbles on the seashore is strikingly in place here. The wonderful advances made in the discovery of truth even in a lifetime almost transcend human conception. Yet we must know that this is but finite, which has its limits, while about it and above it is the vast realm of the infinite which only God can measure.

These are the truths we have to deal with when we combat the facts of nature revealed to us through our human intelligence. A popular speaker addressing a large company said not long ago: "The revelations of natural wonders soon to be unfolded to the common gaze will be such as to make the knowledge of the present seem circumscribed by comparison."

One age has read into the Bible narrative a false astronomy; another a geology that will not accord with the records of science and now with a less rancor to be sure than characterized either of the others, our age is confronted with a theory less than a century old that cannot by the rules of the schools be made to tally with the literal rendering of Genesis.

Many a quiet onlooker preserves his soul in perfect calmness for he knows that in due time all truth will be reconciled, for there is but one. He has sympathy with the thought of Tennyson in the lines:—

"There is more faith in honest doubt Believe me, than in half your creeds."

He knows that there are truths never intended to be grasped by the intellect, for there are truths that are only spiritually discerned; he has the conviction also that the eye was given for seeing, the ear for hearing and the understanding that man might grasp the truth of God's outward creation. All this knowledge, we know, is progressive, what one generation gains and appropriates becomes the foundation on which the next builds.

The truths of science are established by experiment; we accept them or reject them on the evidence advanced in their support. We come by the truths of history through a different method of search; as a final resort we accept the statements of witnesses, and we may search for these in documents. Religious truth, however, appeals to neither of these methods. It is established by believing it and testing it. It may be miraculous in its nature; we know God taught by miracle, but with Cowper let us learn that sooner or later all who are really taught of God have to believe—

"That all we behold is miracle,
But seen so duly, all is miracle in vain."

Our day seems to have brought forth an amazing number of what some one has aptly called "amateur theologians." Men whose grasp of scientific facts is far from extensive and who are without the scientific mind and method, yet who honestly believe they are doing God service, in their endeavor to set the youth straight in regard to the statements of Holy Writ.

They cannot be argued down because they accept the one dictum, which is a false one, and they leave the student far more in doubt than they found him.

Surely there is enough infidelity and skepticism abroad, without this band of careless reasoners setting themselves the task which is beyond them. We cannot deny that scientific study has biased many a student and he has turned from his Bible as from something he cannot accept, but we are equally assured that he gains no help from the cautions and pleadings and dogmatic statements of the man of pious intent who applies scientific methods in fields of learning where they should have no place.

But in saying this we have not said our final word. We do not read the Bible as we should. We have the beauty and the importance of this practice impressed upon us by the Church whenever we read the Query on Bible reading, our family life fosters it and our schools make it obligatory, but we fall far short of our ideal and even that ideal is in many cases below what it should be. This is the advice of a Godly man, whose desire to help others in drawing them to a true and a liberal understanding of the foundations of Bible truth has saved many from shipwreck and whose conclusions closely correspond with those of our own Society who in the early days were so definite and clear in their expositions, that I like to class him with them. His advice was: "Read the Book. Consider that here you have the greatest book in the world, the fountain-head of modern literature; remember the past, the souls that have been fed and strengthened on this spiritual food, the deeds that have been done, the lives that have been led, by its inspiration. Hold the Book close, and aim at mastering it. Learn its contents, understand its spirit. Knit it to your life, and shape your life by it. More and more it will convince you that if the dogmas about it are extravagant, they err, not in magnifying it unduly, but only in magnifying it in a mistaken way."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

The scientific we shall find inadequate, because by itself the study of nature cannot lead us to the knowledge of a God who answers the questions of the heart and satisfies its craving. Nature shows us law in every nook and cranny of the Universe, but it cannot reveal a God of personal love. Some people think it can, but the real truth is that, like the Roman Catholic in his cult of the Virgin, they read into the goddess or principle they call Nature that which they have unconsciously borrowed from Jesus Christ. To be strictly scientific in the accepted sense of the term, is to be strictly agnostic. Science has its legitimate field and its legitimate methods, although, like the theologian at whom he so often girds, the scientist is not without his prejudices and his narrow dogmatism. He is to be respected when he speaks according to what he knows. His knowledge is at least something more learned by man about God. Unless we are to fall into an ancient fallacy and exclude God from His universe, we must regard every fact of science as a fresh revelation of His creative activity and power. Nevertheless, scientific knowledge lies on a plane different from that on which the knowledge we seek is to be found. . . . [It] cannot help a man to resist a present temptation or to face death with Christian confidence and hope. Science by itself is, and must always remain, powerless to give us a God who will draw out the tendrils of the human heart towards Himself.

JOHN WILHELM ROWNTREE (1868-1905).

The modern method of enquiry by experiment and inference, by inductive generalization and subsequent verification, has been amazingly fruitful in the better understanding of physical nature. But the very precision of its intellectual processes, and the inevitableness of the garnered results are sometimes urged against it, as tending to cramp or warp the perception of other kinds of truth. It is charged sometimes with leading men to reject or despise other kinds of truth which have not been discovered by the same sort of process, and which cannot be verified by experiment, weighed in the balance, or analyzed in the test-tube. Doubtless there is some ground for this reflection. In any department of human activity the too-exclusive exercise of any one faculty or set of faculties tends to bring about a one-sided development; and the neglect of any faculty tends to its atrophy. Perhaps the worst that can be said against devotion to the discovery of truth in the physical sciences is that it tends to impose a necessitarian or determinist view of existence. When we find in physics that through all there runs an inescapable relation of cause and effect; that nothing happens except that which follows from antecedent causes; we are apt to conclude—though quite erroneously—that the whole world is ruled by fate, by fixed and determinate necessity, affording no scope for free-will or for the operation of moral forces. Such a view would reduce the universe to a mere mechanism and remove all moral responsibility from man; a view to be sternly repelled.

The Heart of Quakerism.

(The substance of an address given at Guilford College, North Carolina, nineteenth of Ninth Month, 1922.)

T. Edmund Harvey.

Our thought language is no longer that of George Fox; our problems are in many ways different from those faced by John Woolman. Can we re-express for our own time something of the truths they made so real to the men of their day?

For some of us at least the keyword for the life and thought of today is found in the idea of personality. In the mystery of human personality there is also involved the mystery of God's revelation of himself to man. As we come to discover the Divine worth of human personality, all life takes a deeper meaning; problems international and racial, social and industrial, all are illumined by its light; and that light for us as Christians streams not only through the one tiny eyelet within our own souls, but through the great window of personality of Jesus Christ. Personality is the highest and the most wonderful thing that we know, and the supreme revelation of God comes through it for us in that redeeming life. We need not think of God in human terms, and in human terms we see His self-expression in Christ, reflected in the pages of the Gospel, reflected in the lives and writings of the early disciples, reflected too in some measure in all the lives of his saints, men and women who, despite mistakes and imperfections and countless differences from each other, bear the marks of being members of one family, the family of their Master and Lord, whose outpoured life has touched and transformed them and made them His.

Quakerism does not offer men a philosophy but it is an experimental method by which men and women come to realize together more and more of the meaning of this self-revelation of God, His unique self-revelation in the life and teaching of Jesus, in his sacrifice upon the cross, in his manifestation to men as triumphant over death, and in his presence in the midst of his followers, collectively, as they strive together to do His will, and individually, as they come into touch with the spirit to find assurance of the Divine forgiveness, and power of guidance to go forth to work and to serve their fellows in His name. It is this self-revelation of God in Christ which enables us to hope on, in spite of sin and failure, to believe in the Divine love behind the world's suffering, and in the Divine presence that is beyond death and above it. We believe in a Divine personality, revealed uniquely to men in Jesus Christ, revealed too in His church, not by any fixed forms or institutions, but through the lives of all His true followers, all those who bear His likeness imprinted in their hearts and characters; revealed also in some measure, however dimly, in every human soul, even though the likeness is distorted by ignorance and wrong. There is something within us which responds to the Divine appeal that comes through Jesus Christ and through the lives of His followers. Into the darkest nature penetrates some beam of the Divine light, and it comes there not only as a ray of life but a ray of love, bringing with it the hope of an answering opening of those stubborn shutters of the will which so long have closed the heart to its healing beams. Through the personality of Jesus Christ a constant radiance falls upon our own lives and their problems and upon the lives of our fellow-men. They are seen to be no longer isolated from each other, and linked together not alone by common need and common suffering, or by the common burden of wrongdoing, but by a hope in which all may share, since every heart is open to the same Divine light and capable of a new birth of freedom in response to the Divine quickening.

As the Divine radiance reaches us in a threefold-way, through the personality of Jesus Christ seen in history, in the Bible, in the lives of his followers; through glimpses of truth caught and passed on by hero and prophet, sage and poet, and through the direct message that comes to us as individuals, as we seek the Truth wholeheartedly in thought and act and will, so, too, we have to express in a threefold way the life that has been given to us to share: in the inmost communion of the spirit, where we have intercourse with the unseen Helper: in our relationship to our fellow disciples and our joint worship together; and in our work for and with our fellows in the world without who have not yet come to the same experience.

In this threefold expression of the meaning of the Divine indwelling in the life of man, the Society of Friends, like the great fellowship of the Christian church within which its life consists, has been making since its origin a great experiment in unfolding the implications of the Divine meaning of personality and working them out in daily life. In the individual life, in the life of church fellowship, and in the relations of Christian disciples to human society there must ever be growth, and this is sometimes the still growth of the expanding flower, and sometimes the marvellous adventure of the opening chrysalis or of the bird trying its wings in its first flight. The free fellowship of the Society of Friends and its simple worship affords to both types a special opportunity of development. The basis of silence as the background of worship offers a training-ground for us to practice the holy experiment of individual communion with God, and gives to the united worship of the church a universal language which needs no learned interpreter. But the Quaker worship is not merely the act of individuals praying together at the same place; it is a united act, in which the worshippers seek to come into fellowship with each other as well as with God, and to meet in His presence as a group of His great family. In that worship all are priests, even though it may not be given to all to speak words of prayer or counsel. This priesthood, in which all fellow-disciples share, knows no distinction of sex or rank; it may be adorned by learning, but it is not conferred by it: its one essential vestment is that of the pure life and dedicated will. The church government of the Society of Friends has been developed on the basis of this universal priesthood and on that of faith in the real presence of the Spirit of Christ among His disciples. For more than two-and-a-half centuries it has thus been possible for men and women, meeting in this spirit, to reach their decisions without taking a single vote, the clerk or moderator who makes the minutes recording what he believes to be the sense of the meeting and submitting his drafts to the meeting for correction and approval before they are adopted. The resultant decision may differ from that which would be arrived at by taking a vote, for a vote may save time but lose everything else that matters. The Quaker method is slower, but it is the way of friendship, the outgrowth of the family spirit.

Similarly, in the relation of the individual member and the fellowship of which he is a part to the wider world without, the Christian ideal of the worth and meaning of human personality must lead to the quickening of conscience with regard to social and industrial evils and in regulating in a brotherly spirit the dealings of race with race and nation with nation. The relationships of friendship which bind to one another the members of a Christian society are a fore-taste of the wider fellowship which must be extended throughout the world, the fellowship which disciples seek when they pray: "Thy kingdom come." The peace which reigns inside any true Christian community is no negative thing, but the outcome of love and mutual trust, finding a place for the life and work of all members. So too, the peace which the Christian must strive for in the world will be no mere negation of war and its evils, but the harmonious and active co-operation of nation with nation, of race with race, of group with group within the nation, in a healthy life of creative energy.

We must have the joint effort, the joint experiment of such a society of friends if this ideal is to be made real to the wider world. But at the back of all we need to have the individual touch with God, without which all religion must fail. The Divine presence at work here and now in our lives is the background of all our hope, as of all that is good in the world and in man.

All life, if we see it aright, is a venture of faith. The great task of upbuilding the City of God, the heavenly commonwealth, upon earth is the Divine adventure to which we are all called. It begins for each in the individual soul. Here the path of prayer is like Jacob's ladder, along which the angels of man's aspiration rise and the angels of God's blessing descend. By the lives and personalities of those who have trod this pathway we may surely judge that it leads to a place where it is good to be, no far off heaven above the clouds, but one very near at hand. For God is here in the midst of his world, in the midst of our lives. His great revelation of Himself in Jesus Christ is no isolated lonely story, enacted far off in a strange land and long ago. The God revealed in Jesus Christ speaks to our hearts still, as we look on the beauty of nature and rejoice in its loveliness and in the life of its children; something answers within us still, as we recall the words of Jesus above the flowers of the field and the birds of the air. We are puzzled by the mystery of life and death, and on a sudden Christ's saying about the sparrows, not one of which falls to the ground without our Father, comes to our mind. We bow before the greater mystery of suffering, we are burdened by the sense of our own wrongdoing and the world's wrong, and we realize then what it means to us that God reveals Himself to us still through a Christ suffering and dying for men; that wonderful prayer from the cross: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," brings us still the Divine promise of pardon, the revelation of the very heart of God. As we go about our work, the world is no longer a meaningless labyrinth; there are Divine messages written for us in nature, written in the lives of men, and spoken in our own hearts. In the light of Christ's personality we have faith in our fellow-men, we have hope for ourselves. We have not been left in the dark, alone. The very cry of our souls as we seek for truth, for right, for God, is evidence of His presence. The healing light of God which streams into the world through the central personality of Christ, flows too into each human life that will receive it: within reach of us all is the Divine presence; closer than we think, the Divine love. We have still to learn the depth of meaning in the words of the Lord, when He said: "The kingdom of Heaven is within you."

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING gathered at the usual time, 3:30 P. M., Eleventh Month 9, 1922, at Germantown.

More than the usual number of Friends were present at the meeting for worship. We were much favored in hearing from our English Friends, Joseph Rowntree Gillett, and John Henry Barlow.

The business meeting was held as usual in joint session. In the absence of our Clerk, Alfred C. Garrett, Harold Evans was chosen to take his place.

After the calling of the names of the Representatives, reports of the various Committees followed.

A report was read from the Committee on changing the time of holding our Quarterly Meeting. It was decided to hold it at four o'clock instead of three-thirty as heretofore.

Two communications were received from the Select Meeting; first, in regard to holding both sessions of the Meeting for Ministers and Elders of the Yearly Meeting on Seventh-day, thus leaving Third-day morning open for the regular business of the Yearly Meeting.

Second, in regard to holding a joint Conference with Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting on the subject of "The Ministry," if way should open for such a conference.

Esther Morton Smith gave an interesting account of her visit to the South during the summer in the interest of the colored people.

It was our privilege in the evening to hear from our four English Friends of their travels in this country.

E. S. B.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Media, Pa., on the 13th and 14th inst. The session of Ministers and Elders on the afternoon of the 13th was favored with the company of Joseph Rowntree Gillett, who with his cousin, Dr. Arthur Gillett, has been in attendance at many meetings in the vicinity of Philadelphia the past fortnight. The Meeting confirmed the judgment of Chester Monthly Meeting that a gift in the Ministry had been bestowed upon their member, Roland Evans. The simple method of making this confirmation never seemed more beautiful or impressive to some present than it did on this occasion.

The proposition under consideration that the character of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders be so far changed as to bring the Overseers also into closer official recognition of this meeting was further considered. The conclusion was reached that it would be well for Overseers to meet from time to time with Ministers and Elders, but no plan for an organic union at this time was advanced.

The Quarterly Meeting proper proved to be in some respects a memorable occasion. Several strangers were in attendance, among them J. Rowntree Gillett, and Mary Sibbitt of Wichita, Kansas.

The outstanding message, as at least one reviews the meeting, was the impressive and appealing call to make every preparation for the testing times of life—the crises, which whether in individual, national or international relations, we shall all have to meet.

Other speakers followed with messages in unity with this and a feeling of true worship possessed the meeting so that the time for closing to not a few could have been postponed.

The business session, convening about 1.45, after lunch, was too much crowded for full satisfaction; the Clerks handled the matters that came before us with dignity and alertness, and by 4.50 were able to announce that all items had received attention. It was decided to hold the session of the Quarterly Meeting of Eleventh Month, 1923, at Westtown School. The subject had received the careful consideration of joint committees of the Meeting and the School. The most interesting features of the Meeting were two addresses, one by Esther Morton Smith and the other by Anna Cope Evans—both of Germantown Meeting. The former presented in substance the address she gave at Philadelphia and Abington Quarters, the latter, in the interests of the Social Order Committee, stressed the duties of stewardship. As alluded to in the report of another Quarterly Meeting these addresses, full of present-day problems, out-reaching in character rather than introspective and self-centered, seemed to throw out the challenge that our Quarterly Meetings may have a wider service for the membership than has ever characterized them.

The League of Nations.

Mary Elkinton Nitobe.

[We have made little comment on the League of Nations in THE FRIEND, but having recently received through one of our "Contributors" a paper written with THE FRIEND in mind, we are glad to give it place. The writer has had exceptional opportunities to gain fair impressions, and what she tells us is but a tithe of the information she could furnish. Her husband, Inazo Nitobe (a member of Baltimore Yearly Meeting) is Secretary of the Japanese delegation and fills a most important place in the Assembly.—Eds.]

Now that the Assembly of the League of Nations has for the third time ended its annual sessions, I must renew my correspondence. There is little time to wield the pen while attending its meetings and the many Commissions which labor with the important subjects on the agenda.

The first Assembly was, naturally, largely devoted to organization and the second to establishing the work of the League of Nations along the channels opening before it. Both were hampered by unlooked-for restrictions—an unhappy fact not yet eliminated or likely to be for some time to come; but this year we have stronger hope. Not only has the third Assembly shown itself on a firmer basis, but the scope of its usefulness has been enlarged and the confidence reposed in the League is unmistakably growing. That this is true, is in great measure due to the quiet and unassuming methods, the exceptional judgment of the Secretary—General Sir Eric Drummond—and to the devoted, able staff he has created in the Secretariat. Both deserve the warmest praise and I am glad to say they have received it, both from the Council and from the Assembly.

As you may know, the Council is the Executive body when the Assembly is not in session; but must make yearly report of its action to the latter, as must the Secretariat of its work. The Assembly comprises fifty-one States-members, and is very jealous of its parliamentary rights. There is a rotation of presidents in the Council and whoever occupies the chair there at the time of the opening of the Assembly becomes temporary president in this body. The election of a president is the first item on the agenda of each annual session, and the vote has no bearing upon the candidates as individuals, but only upon the state-membership. Belgium had the vote in 1920 and Monsieur Hymans was the representative chosen. Holland held the honor in 1921 and Monsieur Van Karnebeek was in the chair. The latter you have since known in the United States, and both were very able presidents.

It was thought best that a South American representative should be appointed this year, and the choice fell upon Chili. M. Augustin Edwards had proved his ability as chairman of one of the Commissions (a difficult one) last year and had now the confidence of fellow delegates. He did not fail to confirm their good opinion of his qualifications for this post in the Assembly. There was no unnecessary dallying over the agenda.

It is true that most of the discussion occurs in the Commissions and that one usually finds more to interest one there than on the floor of the Assembly. There are six Commissions to which are committed the various items on the agenda. These items are grouped under the following headings:—

I. Legal.

II. Technical Organizations, of which the most important sections are Economics, Finance and Transit and Communications.

III. Disarmament.

IV. Budget of the League, including of course the expenses of the Secretariat.

V. Social and Humanitarian Questions, under which come Health, Opium, Traffic in Women and Children; and to which were referred such urgent and important matters as the Repatriation of Prisoners and, recently, the relief of Refugees in the Near East. In both cases Dr. Nansen was appointed High Commissioner by the Council.

VI. Political—including Mandates and Minorities.

There is also a small Committee appointed to consider the propriety of bringing forward freshly proposed items for the agenda; to decide whether these shall be taken up by the Assembly at a present or a future sitting, if at all, and to which Commission they should be assigned, if consideration is approved.

The delegations are requested to post on the bulletin-board the desire of each and all for representation on any or all of the Commissions, so that there is absolute freedom to take part in the discussion of any question which may concern an individual State. I assure you no delegate need be idle or unheard. Some of the Commissions worked exceedingly hard, and almost superhuman effort was required of the Staff.

Fundamental progress was made in the project for the reduction of armaments, and the next Assembly is looked to as bringing forward a definite and practical plan. All along the experts here have said that Land Disarmament is a problem which must be dealt with and solved by the League of Nations, and the effort was begun in the first Assembly; but it is one of the points at which the League of Nations has been definitely crippled by the non-co-operation of America, in its attempt at reconstruction and not the welfare of mankind.

It is a notable fact, and to some of us a very shameful one, that the United States is the chief culprit in the private manufacture and the non-control of the sale of arms. Sometimes I think Friends must be ignorant of this situation and unaware that the Disarmament Committee of the League of Nations has wrestled with the problem of land disarmament since the autumn of 1920, with its hands tied by the United States. We all rejoice over the achievements of the Washington Conference, but—"Consistency, thou art a jewel!"

Lord Robert Cecil, Dr. Nansen and Professor Gilbert Murray continued to be the leading spirits in the moral force of the Assembly. Lord Robert is always to the fore in ethical and humanitarian questions, and it is he who is most outspoken in regard to what all feel—the impossibility of any further deferential waiting for the United States to adjust her political hostilities. The League of Nations must go ahead and do the best it can under present limitations, hoping for days of further enlightenment.

Professor Murray's presentation of the report on Intellectual Co-operation was accompanied by one of the most beautiful addresses I have ever heard. He seemed inspired to give us, in his quiet manner and with his exquisite English, a wonderful sermon on conciliation and the true spirit of co-operation. He was rapporteur to the Assembly, for the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation.

The most stirring events of this Assembly were, first, the Meetings of the Disarmament Commission—in which the British, French and Scandinavian delegates took most active part. Among the last-named, Dr. Lange must be particularly mentioned as a man of ethical ideals and large ability. The crux of the argument lay between Monsieur Jouvenal and Lord Robert, who was finally made rapporteur to the Assembly from this Committee, and who felt a real step forward had been taken in its decisions. Secondly, the prompt action in responding to Dr. Nansen's appeal for help for the refugees in the Near East. Thirdly, the admission of Hungary by unanimous vote, and, fourthly, the laborious efforts of the Council to aid Austria by evolving a financial scheme that it is hoped may enable her to stand upon her own feet once more. The intensity of interest shown by the Assembly and by those who attended its sessions was very striking. All were disappointed that the protocols could not be signed before the Assembly broke up; but the open meeting of the Council was held a few days later and was a memorable occasion. Lord Balfour presented the case, and other members followed, giving the adherence of their countries. He showed, for the first time in our hearing, extreme fatigue. The entire Council was unutterably weary; but one felt alarmed by Balfour's unwonted evidence of his fatigue. They have been under a fearful strain—the men who have devoted themselves to this supreme task, and to the experts of the Secretariat much is due for its achievement.

BIDDEN TO A FEAST.

Who among us but knows that disinclination to fulfil a dinner engagement, the invitation for which we had accepted gladly? Then the prospect was pleasant. Now the time has come for action and 'tis not so easily done as said. We prefer to remain where we are; to be easy in our old clothes; to drift, instead of squarely facing a new situation; to be ourselves, without disturbing constraints. Our own table is in fact very much to our liking. And so, "Better to bear the ills we have, than fly to others which we know not of."

Ah! but when one has returned from the dinner, rich in a legacy of kindness and new experience, how "worthwhile" it after all was. Even our very clothes and boots retain a "post-nuptial" lustre, and we are glad, truly glad, we went.

So simple a parable scarcely needs paraphrasing. Christ's invitation to COME stands. It is likely we have already accepted. God give us grace to take the further step and help us with the wedding garment.

LIFE.

"Life is a gift that the humblest may boast of
And one that the humblest may well make the most of.
Get out and live it each hour of the day,
Wear it and use it as much as you may;
Don't keep it in niches and corners and grooves, You'll find that in service its beauty improves."

—EDGAR A. GUEST.

O, God, in every temple I see people that see Thee, and in every language they praise Thee. (Words of the poet Abdul Fazl, which he wrote at the command of the Emperor Akbar as an inscription for a temple in Kashmir.)

In each man's life there comes a time supreme,
One day, one night, one morning or one noon,
One freighted hour, one moment opportune,
One rift through which sublime fulfillments gleam,
One space when fate goes tiding with the stream,
One Once, in balance 'twix Too Late, Too Soon,
And ready for the passing instant's boon
To tip in favor the uncertain beam.
Ah, happy he who, knowing how to wait,
Knows also how to watch, and work and stand
On life's broad deck alert, and at the prow
To seize the passing moment, big with fate,
From Opportunity's extended hand,
When the great clock of destiny strikes Now!

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The appeal issued by the two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings to the "Churches of Christ in All Countries" called "Christendom for a Warless World," has been endorsed by London Yearly Meeting, by a number of American Yearly Meetings, and by the Five Years' Meeting.

At the meeting for Sufferings held in London Tenth Month 6th, the Peace Committee reported that in undertaking the distribution of the appeal they "had made an official approach to most of the Churches and religious denominations. They had been greatly helped by the National Free Church Council, which had included 10,000 copies with other communications to their ministers. The appeal had been sent to 362 papers and periodicals and reference to it had appeared in a large number. It had also been sent to a number of prominent writers. It had been inserted in full as an advertisement in the British Weekly and the Challenge. Three papers published leading articles on it. The Manchester Guardian printed the appeal in full. Sympathetic replies had been received from some religious leaders.

"All preparative meetings had been communicated with and supplied with suggestions for following up the distribution. Already forty meetings were known to have taken the matter up. Some 26,000 copies had been distributed so far." (The Friend, London.)

Word has also come that English Friends are expecting to finance the printing of 100,000 copies to be distributed throughout England and the Colonies this autumn.

The Philadelphia committee has authorized Alfred C. Garrett and his wife and Agnes L. Tierney to confer with the Council for International Service as to the translation of the appeal and its distribution on the Continent and has written to Carl Heath offering $500 for this purpose.

In America 20,000 copies have been distributed through the Church Peace Union to a selected list of clergymen of various Christian denominations, and 3000 copies have been sent on request of clergymen and others from our own peace office.

"An account of the letter, with extracts from it, was sent to 350 daily papers and to 30 of the leading religious journals of the country." Copies of the appeal with a covering letter have also been sent to various religious bodies.

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America is prepared to distribute the appeal to some 91,000 clergymen, of whom a list is obtainable, if Friends can raise the funds to cover expenses. Other means of reaching religious bodies and individuals are under consideration.

There has been some sympathetic response from those who have received the letter.

AUSTRIA 1922-23—POVERTY-STRICKEN.

Professions.—The plight of Austria to-day illustrates the fact that war devastation is not limited to the destruction of walls and bridges. Austrian buildings were not shattered by cannon fire; but the nation's economic fabric has been disrupted by the conditions imposed by the treaty of "peace."

How real is the resultant social devastation may be judged from an incident reported by a Friend who visited Vienna last summer. She was out walking with one of her Austrian acquaintances, the wife of a well-known Viennese lawyer. They passed a spot on the sidewalk over which coal had been shot into a cellar window. A few grains of coal-dust remained on the sidewalk, and a woman of the laboring-classes was scraping it up with her hands. On seeing her, the lawyer's wife exclaimed:

"I wish I could do that! We need coal just as much as she does; but we cannot get it in that way. We are forced to suffer in silence."

Due to the depreciation of the krone, which is now quoted at 75,018.75 kronen to the dollar, and to the consequent rise in the cost of living, adequate salaries are practically unknown in Austria, and the salaried classes are for the most part suffering acutely. Doctors, lawyers, professors, lack the means to provide themselves and their families with the common necessities of life. Visitors to Vienna are brought down to reality with a shock when they are shown a "professor-feeding." When university professors are in need of relief feeding, one realizes that the nation is suffering in a way unheard-of in the past.

The permanent reconstruction of Austria, and of Europe, depends upon precisely these trained and thinking classes which are now caught in the grip of national poverty. Unless they can be kept in efficient condition during this trying period, permanent reconstruction will be set back a generation. For this reason it is planned to enlarge the middle-class relief work of the American Friends' Service Committee in Austria. Most of the professions in that country are organized in the form of brotherhoods, and help to those families most in need can be tactfully rendered through such organizations. Funds for this work are urgently needed by the Service Committee, and should be sent to its treasurer, Charles F. Jenkins, at 20 S. Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE NEW VILNA DISTRICT IN POLAND.

Members of the Friends' Relief and Reconstruction Mission in Poland have just completed their third visit of investigation to the new district of Vilna, where work is being undertaken this fall and will be continued through the winter.

This district is located about 350 kilometers northeast of Warsaw, along a battle-front more completely devastated, and more difficult to repair, than any met with in France or Belgium. Its remoteness from industrial centres makes the reconstruction slow, while the Polish peasants have not been aided by the rest of the world to nearly the same extent as were the refugees on the western front.

Most of the land in the Vilna district, which has not been cultivated for years, is overgrown by young birch forests, and the mission worker who reports the investigation states:

"I should think it was practically impossible to get the land into order with a one-horse plow and home-made harrows. There is very little land under cultivation. Some has been dug with spades, but in many fields young forests have sprung up with the potatoes, as the peasants were unable to get rid of the roots. In many instances the peasants have been unable to sow the land which they have tilled. Housing needs are terrible in the extreme. There are 40,000 people in the district without houses, living in dugouts, trenches and branch shelters. One of the investigators writes:

"I have measured dugouts in different places, but they seldom vary in size, three by four yards, and a tall man cannot stand upright without striking his head on the beams. The stove occupies most of the floor space, the heat and constant damp create an atmosphere fetid enough to strangle most people, without the addition of the eleven to fifteen human beings who herd into it with all their possessions, the family cat, a chicken or two and sometimes a pig."

In one township eighty families were entirely without shelter, and this number did not include families living in dugouts or crowded into houses with other families.

An investigator states in regard to one portion of the district: "Two things struck me forcibly—the small number of children and, during the earlier stages of the journey, the fact that the dugouts and shelters were not overcrowded. On inquiry, I was told that the other occupants of the dugouts had died last winter."

Lack of food is acute. In many villages, large numbers died last winter from starvation. Skerelle, for example, possessed 34 families, of which four were completely wiped out. In another village 25 people died of starvation. In the village of Visciczo, the priest said that 20 adults in his church died of starvation last winter, while children's deaths were not counted.

The investigators concluded that the northern part of the Vilna district is a genuine famine area; and that it will be necessary, if life is to be saved, to have some sort of feeding scheme this winter. The workers state that even the richest of the peasants with whom they talked would be fed if they were in the Russian famine zone.

Conditions such as these breed epidemic diseases. Typhus has not yet appeared in epidemic form, but isolated cases are beginning; for instance, 10 teachers out of 350 have it. Refugees are returning slowly from exile in Russia, and their numbers are expected to greatly increase during the late autumn and winter months.

Another great need is that of horses. The population consists almost entirely of peasants whose only means of livelihood is agriculture, and who cannot support themselves unless they have horses to work with. In one township there are 102 families which possess no horses at all.

It is in such a district, then, that the Friends' Mission is opening the new portion of its work for the winter. Its program will consist in providing food rations to those who would otherwise starve, establishing home industry work by which the women can help to support themselves, giving medical relief, and lending horses to the peasants for plowing and for hauling timber that will be used to reconstruct their homes. The difficulties which beset the population of the Vilna district are probably as severe as any which must be encountered in Europe this winter—for in addition to famine, they must face the devastation of the battle-front.

The American Friends' Service Committee will be glad to receive contributions, allocated especially for use in Poland, to help these innocent victims of war and European post-war conditions.

NO ONE DIED IN ZAVIDNOVKA.

In only one small village in Kuzminovskaya Volost did no one die from the hunger. The reason for this is explained in the following letter of thanks. It happened that this village was in a somewhat better position to resist the famine because it had for ten years owned more land per soul than any of the other villages in this district. Consequently it was just able, by eating over a hundred of its horses, one hundred and twenty of its oxen, in all about four-fifths of its stock, to hold out until the Quaker food arrived. The letter addressed to Anne Herkner of Grachovka outpost and to the Friends' Mission reads: Letter of thanks to the Society of Friends from the Village of Zavidovka.

The village of Zavidovka consists of 240-odd souls. Thanks to the help of the Quakers and the careful supervision of Anna Antonovna who looked after the regular issuance of the pyoks (food rations), all the people remained alive during the hunger period of 1921.

For this benevolent care for all of us who were threatened with death the citizens of Zavidovka send the most heartfelt thanks to the Quakers and their representative Anna Antonovna to whom the village owes its life.

Until the issuance of the Quaker rations we had used up our resources, exchanging even our clothes for bread, and remaining almost naked. We cannot find words to express our feeling of gratitude to the Society of Friends for the food with which you have fed us and the clothing with which you have clothed us.

All the gratitude expressed above is attested to by the signatures of the literates and the thoughts of the illiterates.

A Peace-Day in Washington.

Whenever Friends make expeditions to our Capital City in any representative capacity, it would seem well to make a brief report of such expedition to the Friends whom they represent. We accordingly will present such a report in brief. William B. Harvey and I, representing primarily the Joint Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings on the Appeal to the Churches, spent the 17th inst. in Washington with the following results:

We had an interview with Chairman Kelly of the House Committee on Appropriations, who has been holding hearings with naval experts in regard to details of the naval appropriation bill. We had heard that a very vigorous "drive" was on foot for a considerable increase in the naval appropriation for the coming year, and requested the opportunity of presenting both the religious and the American point of view in opposition to such increase. The committee-room was filled with officers in their "gold-braid" uniforms and the outlook appeared rather ominous; but our interview with the Chairman of the Committee was quite reassuring. He informed us that the only matters under discussion at present are matters of technical detail, and that there would be no increase in the naval appropriation already agreed upon; that the struggle in Congress last spring and the stand taken by the President and the Director of the Budget had been decisive, and that although the Committee on Appropriations had been at that time unsuccessful in keeping the navy personnel down to 60,000 men and had been obliged to increase the number to 86,000, it was now able to proceed with the policy of standing like a rock against any further increase.

Chairman Kelly gave every evidence of being in very great earnest in speaking of his committee's determination to hold the appropriations at their present point. We, of course, assured him to the best of our ability that the Society of Friends would give such a policy their whole-hearted support, and further that we would most gladly welcome and support any further steps such as those taken at the Washington Conference a year ago in the direction of a far more drastic reduction and limitation of armaments on land and sea and in the air.

A second rumor which we had heard led us to the Washington headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America. This rumor was to the effect that the War Department, in the conference which it has been holding this week with representatives of the Boy Scouts, the High Schools and small colleges, had offered to supply gratis tents, guns and other equipment for summer camps conducted by the Scouts, the schools and the colleges, on condition that military training should be made a feature of them. The Master Scout and his assistant both assured us that such a policy would be impossible of realization for two reasons. That, in the first place, the Boy Scouts Association at least was irreconcilably opposed to military training for boys and, secondly, because the War Department itself was opposed to such a plan both because of its expense and because of its inefficiency from the point of view of warfare. Both the Scouts and the War Department, we were told, were in favor of an adequate physical and mental training of boys so that the alarming deficiency, both physical and mental, which had been revealed by the draft during the recent war, should be overcome. We, of course, were in full sympathy with the desire for a general physical and mental development of our young Americans and expressed our gratification at the information that not only were the Scouts entirely opposed to military training, but that their three leading officials were at that moment engaged in drafting a resolution which would preclude any danger of the introduction of military training into their programmes. We thought it right, however, to remind them that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and that in their dealings with the War Department it would be simply the part of wisdom to keep in mind the truth embodied in the classic saying: "Timeo Danaos et donos ferentes" (I fear the Greeks even though they come bearing gifts).

Our third visit was to Dr. John A. Ryan, Director of the Catholic Welfare Society and a representative of that organization on the Executive Board of the National Council for the Prevention of War. Our interview with him was in regard to the distribution of the Appeal to the Churches which our two Philadelphia Yearly Meetings adopted last spring. It was a prolonged interview covering various possible methods of procedure and resulted in a promise to write the following letter which should bring the concern in a concrete way before the Catholic Welfare Board. Dr. Ryan and Dr. Burke, as well as various other members of this influential Catholic organization, are evidently in very great sympathy with the object of our Appeal, and we received the assurance that most careful consideration would be given to it.

WM. I. HULL.

ELEVENTH MONTH 18, 1922.

DR. JOHN A. RYAN,
Director of the Catholic Welfare Society,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Dr. Ryan:—The chief object of our Appeal to the Churches is to secure their consent to perhaps a more fundamental consideration of the implications of Christianity as regards the question of international peace and war in our time. We do not presume, of course, to ask the churches to adopt our interpretation per se; but we do desire to make to them a most heartfelt appeal to consider further the question, perhaps more deeply than they have thus far done.

In these days when the Socialists and laboring men in general, the national Chambers of Commerce, the international women's organizations, and even many statesmen, generals and admirals are striving their utmost to induce the world to repudiate war as a system and to prevent any further war in the future, it seems peculiarly the responsibility of the Christian church, not merely to participate in such efforts on the part of other organizations, but to take the leadership in such movements and to supply them with the fundamental basis and inspiration of the Christian religion.

Convinced as we are of the sympathy of the great Catholic Church with these efforts in general and appreciating most deeply the noble efforts for peace of the recent and present Pope, we can confidently leave to you a consideration of the following alternatives for advancing the realization of our common desire.

The first method might be the distribution of our Appeal (copies of which we will be glad of course to supply you with) accompanied by a covering letter of your own in which you would state your own point of view. Secondly, our Appeal might be left out of consideration altogether or parts of it incorporated in a new Appeal which you yourselves would originate. Our little Society of Friends, of course, has not the slightest pride of authorship or the least ambition to appear publicly in this movement. Thirdly, the question of whether it would be more effective for you to distribute our or your Appeal through the channels of the regular clergy, or through the agency of such church societies as your own, could of course be answered only by you.

We simply wish to assure you of our heartiest desire to be of any service which you might deem us capable of in connection with this matter. Realizing the magnitude and difficulty of the service which we have asked of you, but praying most fervently for your success in it and in the promotion of the great cause of our time in which we are mutually so deeply interested, we are,

Very sincerely your friends,

WM. B. HARVEY,
Secretary.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

"FEAR AND I HAVE NOT MET YET."—(A Secret of Power That Brings a Happy Remembering.)—She was a quiet, unassertive Englishwoman who would have passed in a crowd for ordinary looking, save that there was an arresting sweetness in her face and voice. Also an undefinable something.

What the latter was I pondered over. Was it intellect? She undoubtedly had a quick intelligence, but that did not name the quality giving her that marked personality. Was it her philosophy, arrived at through years and a certain breadth of experience? No, philosophy did not wholly explain it.

Was it resignation, for the war had brought to her widowhood and impoverishment? No, it was not so subdued as that, for one still saw about her brown eyes traces of the tears shed in secret and knew she could not forget and would not. Well, then, was it pose?

The quiet, unassertive Englishwoman drew and held me. I desired to get at her secret of power. And it was revealed as we stood one evening on a moonlit porch in southern California. The place was near the "roaring town" of Los Angeles, the time the post-war days when something like a reign of terror was intimidating women in the large cities from coast to coast. The hour was waxing late when my visitor spoke of leaving, and I urged her to spend the night, emphasizing that I did not like to have her go through the streets alone in the dark. But she refused, pleading a press of business early the next morning, then added, "Besides, Fear and I have not met yet."

I looked at her, slender, drooping, tired, disciplined, alone; and able to say, in that charming, quiet voice, "Fear and I have not met yet!" I envied her, I marveled at her, I would not let her go until she had told me something of the secret of her courage.

"Tell me," I cried, "is this courage of yours inborn, or acquired? Fearlessness is the great possession, for women as well as for men, and I would know the way thereto."

She waited a little before answering: "It was my father. I think, that I have to thank for it. When I was a very little girl and showed fear of anything, he would say to me, 'Now, you are not going to meet anything along your way more fearful than yourself. Go look in the glass and see if you are afraid of yourself.' So when I was afraid I would go and look in the glass and think, 'Well, you aren't going to hurt anything you meet, and you must think the same of the ones who meet you.' And gradually I went along unafraid."

"This stood me in good stead once. When back in England on a vacation I was fond of going about on my bicycle for a whole day out-of-doors by myself. Friends told me that it was not quite safe, but I enjoyed it so much I indulged in these outings. One day I started off early with a nice lunch in my box, and pedaled happily all morning. About noon as I was going down-hill I saw, coming down the hill opposite and toward me, a rough looking man—you might say fierce—tramping with his pack on his back. I thought of my friends' warnings, but knew it was better for me to show no fear. So when I got up to the man, whose close appearance was pretty awful, I dismounted and said: 'Good morning. You look hot and tired and as though you had come a long way. I am going to stop here and have my lunch now. Won't you share it with me?'"

"The man looked at me sharply and asked, 'Do you mean it, Miss?'"

"Certainly," I answered. "We can sit here in the shade by the brook and have a rest while we eat."

"I opened the lunch, which had been nicely packed, and shared equally with him. He ate as though he needed the food, and there was much more than I really wanted. We had a good chat and rest afterward, and then I rose to go. As I was ready to mount my wheel, I saw the man had something on his mind and that he wanted to tell me it. At last he said, 'Miss, you have done something more for me this day than give me food, and I can't tell you what you did for yourself. If you hadn't acted the way you did, I don't know what would have happened to you. There I was walking along, lame and hungry and tired and dusty, and saw you coming down the hill on your wheel so fresh and smiling, with your lunch-box and that gold chain and all, and I said to myself, 'It isn't fair, she to have everything and I nothing,' and I was thinking of helping myself. And then you showed no fear at all, but got off and invited me to share the lunch with you. And all the time you were friendly and not at all afraid; you trusted me. I've helped myself to others' things before, but you—you trusted me. It was different. If you had once showed fear I would have put my hands on you. You trusted me. I'm a changed man."

"We shook hands on it, and I rode away. That lesson of my father's stood me in good stead, did it not?'"

A happy remembering, that: "Fear and I have not met yet."—KATHERINE POPE, in The Christian Herald.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

In a letter from Alfred C. Garrett, dated London, Eleventh Month 3rd, reference is made to his attendance at the Friends' Foreign Literature Commission; he says: "John Woolman's Journal is all translated and only awaits funds to be printed. The workers from Germany who were present pronounce it 'a beautiful translation.' The Committee feel that it is still cheaper to print in Germany than in England. . . . John Woolman ought to be accessible to German inquiries. There is clearly great need for financial backing from the United States. As to Henri Van Etten's 'George Fox,' it is not printed either, but I hope to see the manuscript in Paris and get a chance to read and report. . . . We attended a most interesting session of the Meeting for Sufferings. There were 150 in attendance. 'Select Yearly Meeting' is merged with it now. Our Minutes were read, and then we made brief presentations of our concern. Neave Brayshaw presented his concern (chiefly for Philadelphia) at considerable length, and was granted a minute, etc. . . ."

At a recent Monthly Meeting of Friends in England, the following minute was adopted. Great satisfaction had been expressed with Dr. Jowett's proposed campaign in the cause of peace through the churches of Christendom:—

"Believing as we do, that it is the duty of the Christian to testify that all war is, and must always be, contrary to the teaching of the Prince of Peace, we shall willingly give our support to the campaign in every possible way. We maintain that, to be successful, this great effort must be based upon love, justice and right. Not only is war a negation of all these, but the 'peace' which put an end to the Great War was based upon hatred, injustice and wrong-doing. For four years since the Armistice we, as a nation, have been indulging in the un-English practice of hitting an enemy when he was down—with disastrous results to ourselves and to the world. Peace will only come from an appeal to that which is best and highest in man. In this campaign the Churches must call the people to love their enemies; to do justly, love mercy and walk humbly with their God. To such an appeal there will be a great response. To such an appeal we will give our earnest support."

In that good book of reminiscences just published, "The Best I Remember," Arthur Porritt, for so long associated with the Christian World, says:—

"My own memory occasionally plays me tricks, but it has never let me down so dismally as that of a Quaker gentleman I met occasionally, who knew John Bright intimately, and, as a boy, often went walks with the great Victorian orator. Once as they passed the Crimean monument together John Bright stopped to read the inscription—his own undying words. "The angel of death is hovering over the land; almost I can hear the beating of his wings." John Bright told his young companion how the idea of the beating of the wings came to him through reading the lines of an American poet. But the boy forgot the name of the poet, and has never been able to recall to whom John Bright said he owed his inscription. Could it have been William Cullen Bryant's 'To a Water-fowl?'"

Can any Friend in England or America give any other suggestion than this?

THE NEW BOOK OF DISCIPLINE IN BERLIN.—In a recent letter Joan M. Fry writes:—

"Our Study Circle is of great value to us all, and is slowly growing in size. We are working at a translation of the New Book of Discipline. Ernest Lorenz first makes what seems to me a very good translation, he reads this aloud, and as many of us follow in the English as our books allow. Then comes the most lively discussion, for we are intensely particular to get the right word, and it is delightful to see the eagerness with which we all search, and we are not all by any means of the learned classes. With very few exceptions every one takes some part, and there is much divergence of opinion, much seeking for the real meaning in both English and German, and thereby a very deep appreciation of what is contained in the matter read. But what pleases me most of all is when, after much discussion, we arrive at some solution that satisfies us, and the light that comes over the faces in the circle is a real joy to see."

A GENERAL invitation was issued last spring to an unlimited number of Friends, within specified age limits, to enter a reading contest. A generous selection of courses was permitted and books were loaned. The result of the contest has been recently announced. The first place was awarded to

Robert H. Maris, of Wilmington, Del., the second to Ruth Cawl Dewees, Haverford, Pa., the third to Ruth B. Lippincott, Md. The fact that three States were represented in this list is not indicative that the plan proved to be a popular one. It may, however, somewhat modified, be worthy of another trial.

MACMILLAN Co. announce an early new edition of Violet Hodgkin Holdsworth's "Quaker Saints."

A. KEMP BROWN, but recently returned from a visit to Friends in Denmark and Norway, submitted to his home Meeting for Sufferings an interesting though not stimulating report of the conditions there.

In Copenhagen he had attended the Yearly Meeting and the Friends' Conference, to both of which non-Friends were invited, though he thought the invitations had not been wide enough. In Norway he paid visits in Stavanger and neighborhood, where were many descendants of Friends. He also addressed two meetings on the question of Temperance, but he was too late to go further north. He wondered what was to be the future of the two Yearly Meetings of Denmark and Norway. Can we look to any increase? At present there is a steady decline in membership, due chiefly to emigration, and there were now only sixty-five Friends in Denmark and eighty in Norway. He feared also there was not the same spiritual vigor and earnestness now that there was in the past. Friends there had great need of our help, prayer and sympathy. Union with London Yearly Meeting seemed to be the solution of the problem.

Carl Heath hoped Friends would not take too depressed a view of the situation. He felt there is a vital movement amongst those not actually Friends. Many are keen for the ideas for which the Society stands, and there is a great stirring amongst thoughtful people along lines closely allied to Friends. He believed there was a great work for the Society to do right through the Scandinavian countries.

AMONG those who have been invited by the Editor of the British Weekly to express their opinion concerning Dr. Jowett's Peace Appeal recently published in that paper, is Dr. Rufus M. Jones.

In the British Weekly for Tenth Month 12th he says:—
"I am very glad to have the proof of Dr. Jowett's article. I most heartily approve of calling the Church in America to rise up to its plain task and mission at this crisis of human history. The Church has undoubtedly greatly weakened its moral and spiritual leadership by its attitude during the war, but it is not too late for men of clear vision and prophetic spirit to bring the Church back to its right place of genuine spiritual leadership. I shall be glad to join in any movement of this type and to give my heartiest support and strenuous efforts towards such a movement."

JAMES WOODSIDE ROBINSON, the Minister of Cadder Parish, Glasgow, in his new volume of addresses "Sunlit Hopes," refers to the "beautiful Quaker system of introducing strangers to friends in a city or village" by removal certificates. "This is a fine system," he comments, after quoting a typical letter, "and might well be copied by other societies. . . . The Church should be the nursery for true friendship."

SANCTUARY.

Let us put by some hour of every day
For holy things—whether it be when dawn
Peers through the window-pane, or when the moon
Flames like a burnished topaz in the vault,
Or when the thrush pours in the ear of eve
Its plaintive melody; some little hour
Wherein to hold rapt converse with the soul
From sordidness and self a sanctuary,
Swept by the winnowing of unseen winds,
And touched by the White Light Ineffable.

THE BARLEY LOAVES.

Those who have attended Friends' meeting through a period of years with school children, will recall how frequently ministers have made use of the text from John vi: 9, in regard to the "five barley loaves and two fishes" that Andrew reported a lad to have brought with him "up into the mountain." The value of a child's small gifts, the artlessness of childhood, the Master's love of children—how the changes have been rung upon these points of view and upon others, until at times it might almost seem that the miracle of feeding was in some special sense a lesson for the young and done on their behalf. In what follows a different claim is made. Even the lad's part in furnishing the loaves and fishes may have more than one lesson for adults, while the lad's presence with the multitude reveals a whole system of education much lost sight of in our day.

First as to the special teaching of the lad's act. He had done the natural thing. The simplicity and foresight of the provision he had made for hunger had, doubtless, been very largely instinctive. His method of doing it, therefore, might very properly have been commended to adults as some solution of the burden, pathetically expressed by the disciples in the words, "but what are these among so many?" Had the purpose of the occasion been other than it was, and had it been no breach of that fine sense of hospitality that our Lord felt, the answer might readily have been, "Had all done as this lad has, there need not have been a problem of feeding." On other occasions,—more appropriate occasions, the child was set in the midst and adult pre-conceptions and conventions given the instruction and preface so aptly brought home by the living example pointed out by Andrew. The lesson then and always is, "Except ye be as the little child, in simplicity and instinctive trust, ye shall fail even in the highest things of the Kingdom of God."

All this, of course, very wonderfully anticipates the trend of modern psychology and pedagogy. They are setting the child in the midst and saying (how often to deaf ears!) this way—by an understanding of child nature, will be found what parents and teachers need to know, if they are to discharge their obligations of nurture and training. Unspoiled childhood, in its directness, its simplicity, its earnestness, its trustfulness, should be our schoolmaster to hold us to the first principles of a God-possessed life.

A second lesson in the circumstances of the miracle of feeding is closely allied to this above suggested. It is indeed the natural, and so the most certain means of bringing to pass a child development along normal lines. It was, and in measure it still is, very specifically, the Hebrew method of education. Under this practice children are kept very closely with parents. They share their interests, their pleasures, their successes, their reverses. They know the family aims and attainments from very tender years. Here was a multitude following a great prophet up into the mountain. It was a weary journey, it was very advanced teaching the prophet gave, but the children were there. Turn the pages of the Bible and note how often a similar situation recurs. One thus gets a glimmering of what nurture really means. One comes to feel the force of an outburst like the following in an impressive article in the Churchman by Dr. Samuel S. Drury. "Is it not true that we need, not so much leadership, that vague flamboyant thing, but nourishment, that deep personal instruction which, as it grows, necessitates nobility and a keen charity."

As a matter of fact we are in danger of under-estimating the maturity of childhood. Sooner than many believe, much sooner than some want to believe, the boy reaches the position of understanding the father's interests and occupations and thoughts—the girl comes to a feeling for mother's responsibilities and cares and aspirations. We think they live in another world, we provide special interests for them, special pleasures, special environments. The "beck" of division (let us have Jean Ingelow's wonderful poem, "Divided," in mind) becomes a river. We call across, but our voices will not carry. We have lost the natural hold of the hands that might have trusted us. And so there are those that stand aghast and helpless before an indictment like the following. It is quoted from President Hibben of Princeton—one would hardly charge him with being a sensationalist:

"The modern dress, the modern dance, the modern music and modern manners of to-day, are symptoms that indicat that somehow in this age we have lost our bearings and that the old values of life, once so highly prized, have been forgotten." We shall not want to think the "old values of life have been forgotten." The failure more likely is in transmitting them by a practical type of home life calculated to make children joyful participants in every interest. As this comes to pass in a family the miracle of feeding on its spiritual side gets repeated in every direction. The broken bread of such mingled lives, in sacrificing service, feeds the multitude and is multiplied in the feeding. Nor does there come to be that chasm of division between the young and the old which is very much accepted in some quarters as a necessity, and cultivated as an advantage. The family of God—the Kingdom of Heaven, includes in healthful co-operation the whole circle from youth to old age.

En Route to Germany.

LETTER II.

HOTEL BRITANNIQUE, Paris,
Eleventh Month 7th.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

We came to Paris last Seventh-day and I must hasten to write our further adventures before memory of them recedes too far into the distance.

The first letter ended the day before we landed at Plymouth. That evening we attended a meeting in the second cabin which was addressed by the fine old Catholic padre in the interests of his orphanages near Munich. All the first cabin was invited, but only three or four besides ourselves went. We were most cordially welcomed and found that the lack of evening clothes had been responsible for the absence of numbers of them from our Russian meeting the evening before. How artificial are the barriers that divide men!

The next morning at 7.15 we boarded the tender outside Plymouth Harbor, and saw our stately home move majestically away. About a dozen of us landed at Plymouth and, although so early, many of the first cabin and most of the second were on deck to wave farewell.

It was a fine October morning and the English coast in the soft autumn sunshine looked wonderfully beautiful. Plymouth Harbor is full of variety and interest. We gave a Quaker salute to Sir Francis Drake who looks out to sea from his commanding position on the Hoe.

We drove down to the old wharf where the Mayflower sailed in 1620. A bronze tablet commemorates the event. Near it is another tablet marking the arrival from America of the first trans-Atlantic airship in 1919.

On arriving in London we began to attend meetings with great assiduity, as we were favored to be there for the great week of meetings. First-day meeting at Westminster, a tea-meeting for Henry Hodgkin at the same place, the Foreign Literature Committee, the meeting of the Council for International Service and the Meeting for Sufferings have been of special interest. Our Minutes were read at the last two. There was genuine rejoicing that your Committee was sending out messengers to the fields.

The Meeting for Sufferings opened with a period of worship, during which messages were given and a prayer offered which must have strengthened and encouraged all those present who were going into foreign service. Though poor, yet making others rich with the unsearchable riches, and when we are weak then we are strong, were some of the thoughts developed.

T. Edmund Harvey returned his Minute to America and spoke feelingly of the evidences of increasing unity in American Quakerdom. He had especially appreciated his visit to Barnesville Friends in their Yearly Meeting. The refinement, dignity and weight of these Friends had impressed him deeply, and he longed that they might mingle their influence with the other elements in the Society that are working toward a fundamental unity in diversity.

A. Neave Brayshaw asked for a Minute to visit America to remain through the winter. A. C. G. and I both regretted that one of us had not expressed our sense of the value of such visits to our meetings. We left it each to the other and so it wasn't done. We tried to convey to A. Neave Brayshaw our full unity with his concern. His teaching gift will be of great value among us.

The cordiality and hospitality of the English Friends made us feel that we were going out with their sanction too, and this feeling gave us a still greater sense of responsibility.

We were renewedly impressed by Carl Heath's ability and the unusual endowments which fit him for the post of Secretary of the Council for International Service.

On Seventh-day last we came to Paris and to this hotel, which is so memorable as the headquarters of the reconstruction workers. Here is now the Quaker Embassy of the English Friends. The room is visited by many Friends passing through the city and by seekers who want to know what Friends stand for. On First-day morning a meeting for worship was held, at which twenty-eight of various nationalities and religious connections were present. The two previous First-days there were as many as forty. In the afternoon the regular Monthly Meeting of Friends was held. Seventeen members were present, a number of whom had not been at the morning meeting because of the difficulty of coming out twice in the day. Justine Dalencourt was at both meetings. Henry Hodgkin's brother, Olaf Hodgkin, has been spending the week here. He has been a missionary in Madagascar and is a man of deep and quiet influence to whom people instinctively turn for understanding and help.

Mark H. C. Hayler who was a C. O. and imprisoned three years during the war and afterwards joined Friends, is the head of the Embassy.

Yesterday afternoon we went over the Seine to visit Justine Dalencourt's mothers' meeting. She is eighty-five and still very active in her mission work. A. C. G., E. E. G. and I each spoke to the women and J. D. translated. She found it embarrassing to repeat what we said of her remarkable character and work, but the women were delighted with our appreciation of their leader.

John Fletcher came from Berlin to-day and Carl Heath and Bertram Pickard are expected from London this evening.

This afternoon some of us went to Rachel Williams's school near the Sorbonne. R. W., who is the Clerk of the Monthly Meeting here, was at Guernsey when I was there in 1920.

Rachel Williams's aunt, an English Friend, was a very learned woman, a graduate of the University of Paris and a professor at the State Training College of Stèves and Fontenay. In 1891 she founded the International Guild. The Sorbonne pays little attention to foreign students, in fact does not desire them. Many come who are ill-prepared to take the lectures because they do not know French sufficiently well. Then there are French and other students who want to study or to improve their English. All these find the International Guild a friend in time of need. The aunt was given the decoration of the Legion of Honor in First Month, 1914, for her services to education and was the first foreign woman to be decorated. She died in 1919. Rachel Williams is Vice-Principal of the school, which has twenty-one students boarding in the hostel, and between three and four hundred day students of all nationalities. The early ideals of the school are being carried on and the opportunity for increasing international understanding is great.

The franc is falling in value—over fourteen to the dollar to-day. There is a feeling that it will follow the mark downwards and that England will not be able to maintain her currency at its present value. Europe is assuredly in ruins.

8th.—This morning Carl Heath, John Fletcher, Bertram Pickard and Henri van Etten, a French Friend, met for a short meeting for worship and to discuss their message to the meetings they are to attend. They asked Alfred Garrett and me to meet with them. A. C. G. has a severe cold so was unable to come. The above mentioned Friends are to meet with various groups who are more or less pacifist in nature and are to present the Quaker view of pacifism as a deep principle of life. The breakdown of the Church when war came, Carl Heath granted, was due not to the lack of a deep faith, but to the lack of a program. The breakdown of the labor movement was due not to the lack of a program, but to the lack of faith. Friends have tried to make a synthesis of faith and program in such a way as to unite a deep spiritual ideal with its application to life. If they do not make the application they stand where the Church stood; if they act without faith they stand where the labor movement stood.

Europe in ruins is the result of the operations of practical peoples. The only way out is experiment with the other method—the method of confidence in men—believing in the fundamental goodness in men's hearts, the method which Friends have tried with all the races of the earth and it has been successful even with savages.

John Fletcher said that the great thing that Friends can do at present is to bring hope to peoples. The peoples of Europe thought that the ending of the war would bring back the old days of comfort and confidence. They can never return in the sense that they existed before the war, but things remain which cannot be shaken and it is to strengthen faith in these that Friends are called.

To be in France is to be dipped into sympathy with a nation which has been ravaged by war and is still ravaged by fear. To speak of disarmament is to receive the reply that you cannot possibly understand. True, we cannot, but we do know that political or racial boundaries are not the unshakable things, but love, joy and peace, and the life which is life indeed.

Sincerely yours,

AGNES L. TIERNEY.

Adventures in South America.

TAKEN FROM THE LETTERS AND NOTEBOOKS OF A TRIP TO COLOMBIA.

Anne Garrett Pennell.

S. S. Huallaga, en route from Panama to Buenaventura on the west coast of Colombia, Fifth Month 4, 1922.

Yo Heave-ho!

We are sailing the Pacific in the wake of Pizarro and the early explorers. It is not so difficult as it might be to realize this fact: for when we stepped aboard the Huallaga at Panama our customary Anglo-Saxon world vanished. To be sure we have a red-cheeked English captain who might have come out of Dickens; but his talk is interlarded with foreign phrases and he has a Peruvian wife and children waiting for him in Callao. The waiters and stewards are Indians from Ecuador and the menus are all in the Spanish language.

Even our companions of the trip from New York to the Isthmus, those of them who are going down the west coast, have dropped the old topics of conversation and have picked up a new lingo, as it were, over night. "There was a high sea running when we disembarked the last time at Mollendo," one man begins a story and another ends a discussion of Chilean hotel accommodations with the remark, "Well, I always take a few bottles of Agua de Jesus with me when I start off into the interior."

Our state-rooms open right onto the upper deck by double doors, and through our window we can look out over the endless expanse of smooth ocean. At an early hour of the morning, orange juice in tall glasses is brought to our rooms and a little later comes a tray with coffee and rolls. "Almuerzo," the first real meal of the day, is served in the dining saloon at 11.00 A. M. There are usually six courses, beginning with "fruta" and ending with "café negro." When we take our seats at table we generally find at each place two oranges prepared in a novel and most attractive way. First a small slice of peel is cut from the top of the fruit and stuck on a fork below the tines, where it serves to prevent the juice from running down onto the hand. Then the fork is plunged into the orange, which is deftly and completely peeled and skinned so as to leave a juicy, golden globe ready to eat. "Luncha," or afternoon tea, is served at 4.00 P. M. and another heavy meal with six or seven courses at 7.00 P. M. For those who desire it there is a light refectory at 9.00 P. M. If this is a sample of South American ways, we shall not starve!

FIFTH MONTH 5, 1922.

F. and I have been out on the bow watching the small water creatures of which the ocean is full. Sea serpents seem to writhe along just under the surface, and queer, bright blue caterpillars appear to crawl from the bottom of the wave to the top. There are jelly-fishes like transparent pears and little brown balls that glitter like copper on the top of the water. F. declares that twice to-day when I wasn't there he has seen a great, green shark with blue fins. Shades of the immortal Coleridge and that "ancient man, the bright-eyed mariner!"

At night the Southern Cross "rides high" in a world of stars far more brilliant and burning than I have ever seen before. We are in the tropics steaming fast toward all sorts of new and strange adventures.

FIFTH MONTH 6, 1922.

This morning when we woke it was pouring rain—a regular tropic downfall, and a sure sign that we were approaching the rainy west coast. Fortunately as we entered Buenaventura Bay it began to clear off. Looking off towards shore we could see low green coasts with palms and mangroves. In the distance, as the mists lifted, we caught glimpses of the western ranges of the Andes towering in purple majesty up into the middle sky.

About nine o'clock the pilot came aboard. He was brought to the ship by a powerful Negro dressed in blue with a wide red sash around his waist. It was a picturesque sight to see him scull away again in the native dugout, standing with one foot on the side of the boat as he drove it along with firm, even strokes of his pointed paddle.

As we were warped slowly in to the new million-dollar concrete pier we had time to look over the town of Buenaventura which certainly was not prepossessing. It consisted of a single street of thatched mud huts and flimsy wooden houses with roofs of corrugated tin. The climate here is so hot and so wet that white people cannot stand it and only the consuls, shipping agents and a few officials come down on business, leaving their families in the up-country.

A crowd of shouting, bare-footed Negroes was waiting on the pier to carry baggage and looked ready to tear the passengers in pieces to get hold of it. It is customary here to make a bargain with one responsible man, called a baggage runner, and then let him hire such additional help as he needs. I shall never forget the half hour or so I spent sitting on one of our trunks in the warehouse while my husband was away arranging for our baggage to be put through customs without examination. At my side a couple of these Negro runners were standing in threatening attitudes each trying to convince the other that the contract for carrying our outfit to the freight station had been made by the foreigners with him and him alone. I could neither understand them nor make them understand me. About me surged a crowd of strangers speaking the same unintelligible Spanish language. Anyone who has traveled in foreign countries knows that sense of being lost—like a lost child or a lost dog—and knows too how quickly one adapts oneself to the new conditions.

PACIFIC R. R., en route from Buenaventura to a Cumbre,
Fifth Month 7, 1922.

At 6.00 A. M. we got ourselves down in the rain and mud to the station of the Ferrocarril del Pacifico. The Baldwin locomotive and cars looked oddly familiar and yet unfamiliar too with their Spanish labels. All was bustle and confusion. We pushed through the crowd into the first-class car and found a seat opposite a young fellow who looked uncommonly capable and intelligent. He made a few sociable remarks to us in English and then turned to continue a conversation in French across the aisle. Of the conductor he made some inquiries in Spanish. His linguistic ability made us curious and in talking with him we discovered that he was a Norwegian and that he was taking two years to see the world as a sort of college course. He had been in England, Germany, France, Italy, the United States and was now entering South America. Everywhere he had succeeded in paying his own way and in learning the language, customs and something of the history of the country.

Perhaps it is not too much to say that the ride from Buenaventura to Cali is one of the finest single day's rides anywhere in the world. It is not only very beautiful but exceedingly varied.

The train first passes inland through rich tropical forest—the wettest rain forest in America, with an annual precipitation of some four hundred inches. Great palms, climbing ferns, bamboos, banana trees and huge vines grew so close to the train that it was hard to see how the engineers laid tracks through this wilderness or would be able without continuous struggle to keep the jungle from reclaiming its own. To northerners the air growth in these forests is a continuously novel and interesting thing. When the train made its first stop the conductor climbed onto the roof of the car and picked a long spray of yellow orchids which he presented with a little bow. Was it not a courteous and friendly way of making the stranger feel at home?

Suddenly the air grew close and cool. We had left the hot coastal country and entered the gorge of the Dagua River. Here the white water comes tumbling down over great boulders, passing between sheer walls of rock several thousand feet in height. The train crawls along a narrow ledge between the steep slopes above and the stream below. It seems as though it could scarcely cling to its narrow foothold, but you quickly forget all that as you look up at the rocks covered clear to the summit with aroids like a great green and white tapestry of calla lilies. Here and there the red and yellow cones of the costus add a touch of color, and here and there over the water and up the hillsides great butterflies of a lustrous Alice blue rise and fall like moving jewels.

Then the train turns southward and within a few miles a wonderful change occurs. Still winding below high hills, you enter an arid valley. Here nothing grows but cacti, prickly pear, yuccas and their kin. The grassy slopes rise brown and bare to the blue sky. Vultures flap slowly overhead. Only the Dagua River adds a suggestion of coolness. On its banks stand small native cattle shaking their curved horns at the retreating cars.

"Dagua" calls the conductor as we pull into the first large town we have seen. It is now about eleven o'clock and everyone is hungry for we have been traveling since six. As soon as the train stops Indians and Negroes swarm up the steps and along the aisles calling "Piña, Piña, dos centavos" and "pan de yuca." We buy a couple of slices of the pineapple and for the first time taste this fruit as it is in the tropics—juicy, sweet and ripe clear through so that there is no hard core at the centre. I would write a poem about that Dagua pineapple if I could write poetry as easily as most educated Colombians can.

From Dagua the railroad winds up into the high Andes. For perhaps half an hour we kept turning and twisting along the ridges where the red cuts of the track above and below us looked as though they had been scratched in the hillside by a giant finger. At first the slopes were covered with tall grass in which the purple baptisia and the clustered heads of the yellow orchid were the only flowers. Then we reached the region of sub-tropical forest and began to breathe the cool air of the mountains. Stupendous views opened out over the ranges which rise here to more than five thousand feet. Little thatched huts, set in their own clearings, were perched on the slopes, putting out so that they seemed about to topple over the edge. Poor folk inhabit them, living on a simple and monotonous fare and in surroundings that most of us would scorn: but what wonderful views of sunrise and sunset they look out upon every day of their lives. It makes one wonder sometimes whether our civilization is not too high a price to pay for the privilege of breathing the close air of cities, suffering in every nerve with the "iron shiver of traffic" and catching now and then by special grace a glimpse of some narrow crack of sky.

As the train approached our destination, the little hill town of La Cumbre, we caught sight of some bits of local color. A troop of mules, each dragging two logs behind him, straggled along the trail in charge of a horseman with brass stirrups and a scarlet saddle blanket. A little further on we passed a colored woman squatting by a stream washing. Her skirts were rolled above her knees, gilt earrings hung from her ears and a large cigar protruded from her mouth. How I should like to have gotten a snap-shot! Laundries in this country are apparently nothing if not picturesque.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING was held Eleventh Month 24th, at West Grove. The three Monthly Meetings were well represented, and though the absence of some on account of illness was much to be regretted, the attendance was good.

The Meeting for Worship was what it claimed to be—a reverent waiting before the Master of the Assembly and one after another was faithful to hand forth a message. There is a wonderful beauty in such a meeting as this proved to be. We hardly realize the value of the spontaneity that marks our plan of meeting and where each is faithful to his call for service the ideal of a Friends' meeting is attained. The two outstanding impressions of this meeting that linger with the writer are the clear exposition made by one of the speakers of the real basis on which must rest the call to service in the Master's cause, and secondly, the unusual fact that of the six acceptable vocal offerings all but one came from the women Friends, neither were they all confined to the gallery.

In the business meeting certain routine matters were considered. The suggestion as to the change of holding two sessions of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders on the Seventh-day preceding the regular Yearly Meeting was adopted, but not without some honest impression of doubt as to the wisdom of the suggestion. Esther Morton Smith and other members of the Visitation Committee were acceptably present. E. M. S. in the second meeting reviewed some of the pressing problems of race relationships and spoke of her interesting visit to a Conference on this subject in North Carolina last summer.

—The Reformer.

RESULTS OF THE ELECTION as given in the earlier statements looked discouraging to the "drys" and satisfying to the "wets." Later, however, as the facts became established, it was found that, viewing the country as a whole, the cause of prohibition has not suffered. Wayne B. Wheeler, counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, gave out the statement that of the ninety-eight Congressmen renominated as "wets," seventy-nine were elected, and of the two hundred and seventy-three "drys" who won their nominations at the primaries, two hundred were successful at the regular election. In other words, eighty and one-half per cent. of the "wets" were successful and eighty-two per cent. of the "drys." As to new members, he asserts that fifty-four are against enforcement and seventy-two are for enforcement, while six are non-committal. In New Jersey and New York the candidates on the "wet" platform were more successful than those on the "dry" platform, but in neither state was any definite legislation at issue, and in the case of New Jersey it is conceded that Governor Edwards won many votes over his opponent because of his promise to support the "soldiers' bonus" if elected. On the other hand, in the great State of Ohio the question of a two and three-quarter per cent. beer amendment to the State Constitution, instead of the half per cent., was a distinct and definite issue, and the "drys" won by 85,000 majority. Likewise in California, with its great vineyards and past reputation favorable to wine, the question of enforcement on the basis of one-half per cent. as provided in the Volstead Act was a clear-cut issue, and there, too, the "drys" outnumbered the "wets." The poll of votes in these two states is exceedingly significant as a rebuke to those who advocate the "wine and beer" policy.

Prohibitionists everywhere should be encouraged by these splendid victories which evidence the falsity of the claim that the popular vote would not support the Volstead Act. The case of Illinois will doubtless be cited by the opposition as evidence to the contrary, but it is not. The placing of the proposition for or against beer and wine on the ballot was declared by able jurists to be unlawful; it could decide nothing; it was merely a "straw vote" at best, and even at that it lost its significance from the fact that the organized "dry" forces declined to play the game, advising friends of prohibition not to vote on the issue.

Harry M. Chalfant, Editor of The American Issue, says: "It is true that the wet Governor Edwards, of New Jersey, defeated Senator Frelinghuysen, a dry, by nearly 100,000 majority for a seat in the United States Senate. But on the other hand the complete reports show that this was the only state in which a wet candidate defeated a dry candidate for the Senate. On the other hand, not less than one-half dozen Senatorial seats formerly held by the wets have been captured by the drys, so that there will be an actual dry gain in the United States Senate of from four to six votes. In Pennsylvania 10 drys were elected, 12 of them being members of the present Congress. The substantial gains made in Illinois and Texas and other Western and Southern States indicate that the dry vote in the new Congress will be fully as large as it is in the present Congress.

"In the State of Pennsylvania the people have elected a Legislature which is dry by a decisive majority in both branches, guaranteeing thereby that Governor-elect Pinchot will be able to carry out his program so far as the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment is concerned. The Eighteenth Amendment is growing in popular favor and opposition to it will steadily diminish."

IS PROHIBITION A MAJORITY LAW?—Its opponents insist that it is not popular and would never have been supported by a majority of the voters. No one can deny that the Eighteenth Amendment was put into the Constitution deliberately and legally. There is, therefore, no more reason for submitting it to a popular vote than the Nineteenth Amendment granting the right to vote to women, or the Fourteenth Amendment, granting to all citizens of the United States equal rights before the law. However, certain facts are interesting, and may be useful at times to stop the mouths of the cavillers:

Nineteen states had adopted prohibition by popular vote. Sixteen states had legislation prohibition before the Eighteenth Amendment was submitted to them for ratification.

So long as any twelve of these thirty-five states shall decline to join in rescinding the Eighteenth Amendment it will remain in the Constitution. Evidently it is "there to stay," and the opposition, and ourselves likewise, had best recognize frankly that the issue is simply defiance of law or enforcement.

PATRONIZING THE BOOTLEGGER is an expression of disloyalty to the United States of America, whether the act be that of some miserable victim of a depraved appetite or of the common "highbrow constitution dodger." It has been said truly that the "society people" constitute a more serious obstacle to the enforcement of prohibition than the old-time "drunks." There are entirely too many people who are unwilling to make any personal sacrifice for the public good in the matter of what they eat and drink. Eighty per cent. of the liquor sold in license days, we are told, was beer. If under some specious plea of expediency or delusion of making it "easier to enforce the law" we encourage the manufacture and sale of light wines and beer, we shall have opened again the flood gates of misery and crime that, despite all statements to the contrary, have been conspicuously closed as compared with the year 1917 and previously.

PROHIBITION HAS ACCOMPLISHED MUCH, says Ross H. Stover, Pastor of the Messiah Lutheran Church, Phila., known as the Friendly Church and distinguished for the large numbers of successful business men who compose the congregation and assemble in remarkable numbers at the mid-week prayer meetings. Dr. Stover made some first-hand investigations recently in "wet" Philadelphia and he confesses that the facts surprised him. Here is part of what he told his people on the evening of Tenth Month 29, 1922:

"Today we are speaking of the great crime wave. I got in touch with the Statistician at our City Hall, and also at the Philadelphia General Hospital. The figures which I received are indeed startling. I thought there were more arrests to-day than there were before Prohibition became a law. I thought there were more deaths from intoxication now than in 1917, for I continue to read of how many are blinded and killed by this 'hooch.' These are the figures from the books at the City Hall. In Philadelphia in 1917 there were 96,041 arrests. In Philadelphia in 1921 there were 83,136 arrests. Doesn't this startle you, to find that there is a decrease of 12,905 arrests? Thirteen and one-half per cent.

"My! to read the newspapers, and to hear the propaganda of the 'Wets,' you would think that there were three times as many arrests in 1921 as there were in 1917, the year before Prohibition became a law. In 1917—43,049 were arrested for being drunk and disorderly. In 1921—27,082 were arrested for being drunk and disorderly. Do you see? There is a decrease of 15,967! Doesn't that show Prohibition has accomplished something? If you question these figures, go to the City Hall and find out for yourselves.

"I received the following figures from the Philadelphia General Hospital: The number of intoxicants treated in 1917 was 3,715. The number of intoxicants treated in 1921 was 830.

A decrease of 2,885. Seventy-seven per cent.
"Now, what do you think of that? I thought some 'wet' fellow said, 'Men are drinking today more than before Prohibition became a law!'"

"I learned at this hospital, also, that in 1917, 85 deaths were caused by intoxication and delirium tremens. In 1921 only 8 deaths were caused by delirium tremens and intoxication. Think of it! A decrease of 77 deaths! Ninety per cent.

"Do not these figures surprise you? Prohibition has accomplished much"

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

TO INTRODUCE "A GENTLEMAN."—Dear Children—I do not know how many of you have ever seen any of the numbers of Our Young Folks, a magazine first published in 1865 and continued for quite a number of years until, I believe, it finally became St. Nicholas, with Mary Mapes Dodge as Editor. In the old Young Folks were stories by J. T. Trowbridge, Isaac I. Hayes, Lucy Larcom, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Lydia Maria Child, and many others of like interest. So I hope that, if you have not seen it, you may yet find a pile of this hitherto unnoticed treasure in somebody's attic.

In the year 1871 a department of this magazine known as "Our Letter Box" offered awards to the six boys and girls best answering the question, "What are the Characteristics of a Gentleman?" I am sending you the first two winning answers, the first written by a girl of fifteen, the second by a boy of sixteen. I wonder how well you agree with what they say?

The letters follow:—

"What are the Characteristics of a Gentleman?"

I.

First among the characteristics of a gentleman, I think integrity should be placed. A true gentleman is not only upright in the sight of the world, honorable in all his dealings with friends, acquaintances, and those with whom he comes in daily contact,—not only is his speech free from those equivocations which many men declare are inseparable from "a business life,"—but even in his secret thought he is without shade of falsehood.

Next, courtesy should come. He is not only courteous to those whose relations to his self-interest demand such treatment; but toward father and mother his behavior is always marked by the deepest respect and affection; he strives to make home the place where he is best known, the place where he is best beloved, remembering the old proverb,—"A gentleman at home is a gentleman everywhere." No one whom he meets is too poor or too humble to be treated courteously; for are not all children of a common Father?

A true gentleman is pure of heart; avoiding not alone "the appearance of evil," but every thought of it. In mind, as in language, he has no taint of that vulgarity which makes the society of many a (so-called) "respectable" young man something to be shunned by any pure-minded girl.

And, more than all, a true gentleman must realize that his life and talents must be devoted to a higher service than his own, or the world's, else they will be "as nothing." He must learn that the paths of literature, of science, of enjoyment, of life itself, if patiently and earnestly followed, but lead at last to the feet of Him who is their Maker and Creator. He must know that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom," and in His service alone there is peace.

II.

He who is kind and obliging to all; who casts a calm, loving eye toward "the little ones;" who is ever ready to confer a favor, with no hope of earthly reward; who visits the real poor and renders them all the assistance within his power, without proclaiming it to the world; who is humble and in no way haughty or revengeful; who looks at the heart beyond elegant apparel; and whose every utterance is truth without a taint of vulgarity, is—I care not what may be his name, whether he be rich or poor, high or low—a true gentleman.

If there is any person toward whom you feel a dislike, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak.—CECIL.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

Now is the time for Friends to keep constantly before themselves and the world their message of good will, that the only justification we can find for our sheltered, peaceful life is by helping the unfortunates and despairing the world over to live and recover. Hate and jealousy are still heard on the lips of those we meet. Never was the need of taking our place in the community and living openly our Quaker ideals so needed.

Secretary Weeks last week in Boston said that the chewing gum bill of the American people would "largely pay for adequate national defenses"—meaning an increased naval budget.

Let us urge everywhere that if we used the chewing gum and candy bills of the U. S. in a national reconstruction program that the increased friendliness and respect of the nations would serve us as a better strength than any increase in naval appropriations.

AMERICAN Education Week is to be celebrated again this year. Twelfth Month 3rd-9th. Dr. Finegan has given his support as well as Com. Tigert and President Dodd. The American Legion is sponsoring the effort and asking civic and patriotic, religious and fraternal organizations to assist. The purpose of the week is "to promote the cause of education; to raise the standard of citizenship; to inspire among all people a desire for better education; to emphasize the need for and the value of education in a representative government; to extend education to all the people, and to show that education is an investment and not an expense."

All these principles have been dear to Friends for years. Our fathers made supreme sacrifices for Quaker education. As Friends' Schools enter this week should they not again call to mind clearly why their schools exist and emphasize our duty in educating the children under our care in those deep underlying peace principles which if adhered to strictly will in the end build up a permanent peace for all nations—beginning, we pray, with our own United States.

DR. HOWLETT, of Atlantic City, pastor of the First Baptist Church, says in behalf of Harry Emerson Fosdick, "The war mongers would like to try him, for he says it is not a question of Christ and war, but of Christ or war. The race-hate traffickers would like to try him, because he preaches that Christ meant what He said when He declared all men were brothers. God's intention is to carry on until His truth, not yours or mine, but His, shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

Those interested in Peace and the Social order cannot help but feel, whether or not they support Dr. Fosdick, in full, that his is a fearless pronouncement in making the issue Christ or War and in preaching that all men are brothers.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE NOTES FROM JAPAN.

By ISAMU KAWAKAMI, General Secretary International Service Bureau.

EXISTING PEACE SOCIETY.

The Japanese peace societies are few and labor under disadvantages compared with the peace societies of America and Europe, wanting to do something but not having the same impulse from outside that other nations have. There are a number of societies—such as the Japan Peace Society, The Women's Peace Society, and the League of Nations Association, the America-Japan Association, and their branches.

These are doing much the same work as similar societies in England and America. The League of Nations Association, however, is broader in its scope. This society has more money than the other peace societies of Japan, and has done much for the propagation of the peace idea through lectures and in other ways.

EDUCATION AND PEACE WORK.

On the twentieth-sixth of last Ninth Month, the International Education Association was formed. Their aim is to bring about world peace through education, especially education in the common schools. They want to promote friendship between all nations. For the accomplishment of this purpose they insist on the necessity of an International Educational Conference. This society has been backed by the Imperial Educational Association, which, while it is a private organization, has a wide influence throughout the country. Through two hundred thousand teachers in the common schools, millions of people will be influenced by the activities of the new society. One of the most important things to be taken up is the re-writing of the text books used in the common schools, especially the history text books. The League of Nations Associations had already done very good work along this line, examining the text books in use and collecting material. The text books in Japan even more than those of European countries are imbued with a spirit of hero-worship which is contrary to the spirit of peace. The case is more hopeful in Japan from one point of view, however, because the educational system is more centralized. There is one set of text books used throughout the country, so that when a change is made, it is more thorough and can be brought about more quickly.

EFFECTS OF THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

Reductions of Army and Navy—The Navy expects to save 250,000,000 yen, and the Army will save 400,000,000 yen in the next ten years. The total naval appropriation in 1921 was over 500,000,000 yen, but the total appropriation for 1923 is expected to be less than 320,000,000 yen. There is a general demand for further reduction. The people wish the army cut to half the present number of divisions, but the authorities wish to keep the army at its present strength, but reconstruct it in a way to save money. The army authorities planned to reduce the army appropriations 400,000,000 yen during the next ten years, which is no small saving in the present financial condition of Japan.

THE CONFERENCE BETWEEN RUSSIA AND JAPAN IN CHANGCHUN has broken up without result. There is a strong desire on the part of the Japanese people for friendship with Russia. Most of the Japanese papers in Tokyo while regretting the failure of the conference, emphasize this point. An example of the feeling of the Japanese people is the movement for Russian relief in this country. The movement is carried on by students, magazines and newspapers, and by the women's organizations.

Senator Pepper and B. Seebom Rowntree on Industrial Unrest.

On the twenty-fifth of Ninth Month the Industrial Relations Committee of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce gave a luncheon at the Bellevue-Stratford, which was attended by nearly a thousand of the leading business and professional men of this city. The meeting was addressed by Senator George Wharton Pepper, who spoke on Industrial Unrest. It is interesting to compare the following extracts from his speech published in the Chamber of Commerce News Bulletin with the conclusions of a practical business man like B. Seebom Rowntree, one of the heads of the great Cocoa Works at York, England.

"I approach my task by noting the familiar distinction particularly important in the case of industrial unrest between prevention and remedy.

"Rest and unrest are states of mind. Industrial unrest is the name that we apply to the condition of the public mind when individual workmen have become restless and discontented because they are unhappy in their job.

"I can think of only three lines of approach to the problem of prevention. One of them concerns the human relationship between employer and employee. One of them concerns the

ARMS SMUGGLED FROM VLADIVOSTOK.

It is reported in various ways that the Czecho-Slovak arms which were entrusted to the Japanese army under the treaty have been lost. Moreover, suspicion rests on the highest Japanese army officers in Manchuria, that they have helped Chang Tsao Lin to get hold of these war supplies. This is followed by a report that our Bureau of Staff Officers will send more officers to Manchuria to help Chang Tsao Lin. If this is true, it is evidently against the principle of the Washington Conference, and will simply break up the new co-operation for the peace of the world. The Washington Conference has established a foreign policy for Japan, especially with regard to China; but this smuggling of arms by Japanese officers to Mukden is evidently in direct contradiction to Japan's new foreign policy of neutrality in regard to China's internal problems. We must wait to see the outcome of this matter, but it is interesting to note that the newspapers of Japan are quite ready to uncover these evils in spite of the effect on the reputation of Japan. The indignation of the people can not be kept down. The feeling seems to be strong that now is the time for the Japanese people to get the better of the militarists. If this is so, perhaps more good than harm will come of the situation in the end, since it may be the birth of a new Japan.

In commenting on our letter to the Christian Churches, the Paris edition of the New York Herald during the summer says:

"They reject war because it violates the fundamental principles of the religion that was taught by Christ as they understand it. But those fundamental principles are largely idealistic, and a very great part of mankind knows absolutely nothing of idealism, and, indeed, little of anything save the unrefined needs or impulses of the crudest human nature. If everywhere to such beings is turned 'the other cheek,' not only individuals, but nations will become martyrs to brute force. The World War more than any other taught this lesson.

"While opposition to the causes of war is most commendable, the non-resistance tenet, carried to its logical sequence, means the non-policing of the world—except by moral force alone. If ever the whole of mankind becomes absolutely honest, well-meaning and peaceful by nature, it will be after many, many years of moral education, such in efficiency as it has not yet known, although the Society of Friends has striven as much as any other religious or social body to make the transformation possible."

business relationship between the parties. The third concerns the condition of the industry in which both are engaged.

"Passing over but not forgetting this matter of human relationship, I touch upon the possible readjustment of business relation.

"We take it as a matter of course that one person or one group of people should be the owners of a business and that another group of people should do for them the work which makes the business pay. Our most familiar phrases indicate this. We say of one man, 'he is in business for himself.' Of another man we say, 'A is working for B.'

"When we describe people as employers and employees we are classifying them with reference to the opposition of their interests. We are emphasizing the fact that the fruits of the employees' work belong to the employer upon the mere payment of a fair wage. Not only the fruitage of the business but the control of it rests with the employer.

"Under such a business relationship the self-restraint of the parties is pretty much the only check on industrial war. Organization on the part of the employees is inevitable and the purpose of organization is to bring the employer to terms.

"I am not here to discuss the feasibility of changing all this. The man may be right who says that the existing condition is inevitable and that a change for the better is a dream. The dream, however, is this: a business relationship in which all who are connected with the business are co-owners. What is an owner? An owner is one whose relation to the object of ownership is such that he has the right to enjoy it and to control it. If the thing owned is a business the right of enjoyment is the right to the profit and the right of control is the right of management. If several people are the common owners of a business each is a part owner; and, as you know, the contracted form of the words 'part owner' is 'partner.'

"The instant that you describe people as partners you are ceasing to classify them according to the opposition of interests and you are thinking of them according to their community of interest. It is at least a pleasant dream to picture an industrial situation in which all those related to the common job share profits and participate in management. Again I remind you that I am not overlooking difficulties. Sharing profits without sharing losses is one of these. The transient nature of employment in many lines is another. The possibility of getting actual results by sharing the responsibilities of management is an important factor. After all is said, however, one inevitable fact stares you in the face: that apart from individual self-control there is only one way to avert industrial warfare between two armed groups and that is to induce disarmament by reducing them all to one group.

"A possible third line of approach to the prevention of industrial unrest is the stabilizing of the particular industry in question. I believe it to be a fact that most labor troubles develop in industries that are themselves on an unsound, economic basis. Even a superficial acquaintance with the bituminous coal business will satisfy a man that under existing conditions it is a hot-bed for serious industrial unrest.

"If neither regard for human relationships nor a readjusted business relationship nor the stabilizing of the particular industry can prevent rupture, then it is for you to consider whether there is any possible way of dealing with the situation except by an appeal to the jury of American public opinion.

"It may well be worth while to provide adequate machinery for making such an appeal. It might be a fine thing in particular industries or in groups of industries to provide for impelling the American public. Standing commissions and boards of professional peace makers will not do. A governmental board which on the one hand lacks power to enforce its decisions and on the other is infected with the taint of professionalism and aloofness from the mass of the people is most likely to prove a failure. On the other hand, a governmental organization which in an emergency functions by calling into existence a jury or commission composed of those whom the public will trust may both enlighten the public as to the merits of the controversy and focus public opinion in such a way that the parties to the dispute cannot withstand it. This or something like it is the suggestion of Secretary Hoover, and no wiser man than he is to-day taking thought for our industrial welfare.

"As I proceed from point to point in this address I am sure that in the minds of many of you there is a feeling of disappointment that I have no formula to propose and no panacea to suggest.

"I ask you to remember, however, that our problem is fundamentally one which concerns the spiritual attitude of one man toward another, and that all the troubles which we are considering presuppose something wrong in that attitude. Under these circumstances there can be no formula and no panacea. If our hearts are not right all we can hope to do is to make the best of a bad situation. If employers and unions not only lack confidence in one another, but if the lack of confidence is deserved, if the obstacles in the way of organizing industry on a partnership basis seems to us insurmountable, and if the stabilizing of industry does not itself minimize the labor problem, then we must inevitably flounder. Let us at least, however, be honest enough to recognize that we are floundering and let us not make frantic appeals to government and force to work the miracles which we do not deserve. Let us put no trust in industrial coercion. Let us make no appeal to the courts beyond the barest limits of protection to life and property, and let us never make an appeal even in these cases, a covert method of imposing upon the courts an impossible jurisdiction over all industrial happiness and welfare. Let us set up sufficient governmental organization to give us official forecasters who will scan the skies and sense the air currents. Let them be empowered to invoke executive action for the impelling of emergency juries. Let these juries find the facts, enlighten the public and recommend the solutions, and let us be honest enough to realize that no power on earth can force the acceptance of these solutions except the concentrated opinion of you and all your fellow-citizens in America."

The following paragraphs are from a small book recently published by B. Seeböhm Rowntree, entitled "Industrial Unrest; A Way Out."

"Let me briefly summarize what I have said. Industry is confronted by a growing spirit of unrest and antagonism between Capital and Labor, which means not only perpetual strikes and lock-outs, but an infinite amount of daily friction and wasted energy. There are, theoretically, three ways in which we may confront the situation. Capital may organize still further, in the hope of becoming so strong as to be able to crush labor. But I think we realize that no solution of the problem is to be found along these lines. Again, a balance of power may be established between federated Capital and federated Labor. But this is no real solution. It is a perilous expedient which, speaking generally, only postpones the conflict between them. The alternative is to discover and remove the legitimate causes of Labor unrest, and I have suggested that there are five claims on the part of the workers which must be satisfied. (1) We must so organize industry that it will become possible to pay all workers of normal ability wages which will at least enable them to live in reasonable comfort. (2) Their working hours must be such as will give them adequate opportunities for recreation and self-expression. (3) Measures must be taken materially to increase their economic security, notably with regard to unemployment. (4) They must have a share in determining the conditions under which they shall work; and finally (5) They must have a direct interest in the prosperity of the industry in which they are engaged.

"I believe that all these conditions can be met without lowering the efficiency of industry, and that if employers will devise means for meeting them in a generous spirit, we shall succeed very largely in replacing the present spirit of antagonism between Capital and Labor by a spirit of harmony and co-operation. It may be urged that the workers are never satisfied, and that we have tried sometimes one and sometimes another of the methods to which I have referred, with unsatisfactory results. But I am convinced that we shall not obtain satisfactory results unless we apply the whole remedy. The present situation calls not only for bold action, but for imagination and sympathetic insight on the part of those who conduct industry. I should like to see the Anglo-Saxon races give a lead to the rest of the world in dealing effectively with the problem of industrial unrest. It is a task for which they are, by tradition and temperament, particularly suited. The moment is opportune, the need for action is urgent, and the initiative must be taken by employers."

ANNA C. EVANS.

The Pittsburgh Quaker Round Table met, on the evening of Eleventh Month 25th, at the home of Henry T. Moore and wife, in Wilkensburg. The special program for the evening was a discussion of conditions in Russia, following an informal address and readings by Demetry I. Vinogradoff. The twenty-five or thirty persons present expressed, by their close attention, and by questions asked, their deep interest in the phases of this serious question brought out by the leader.

FACTS ABOUT FRIENDS' SERVICE IN RUSSIA THIS WINTER. BY WILBUR K. THOMAS, Executive Secretary.

After careful study of the latest information received from the Russian famine field, the American Friends' Service Committee has agreed upon $2,675,000 as the amount of its budget for Russian work during 1922-23. Of this amount, $1,675,000 will be allocated to feeding famine sufferers, and will be in addition to the supplies of food which the Service Committee already has in Russia. The latter are sufficient to feed 75,000 until Fourth Month 1, 1923.

Requirements authorize an increase above this number of 25,000 per month beginning Twelfth Month 1, 1922, and extending until Seventh Month 1, 1923. The total number being fed on Seventh Month 1, will be 250,000. In addition to the feeding of this number in the Friends' area, $75,000 of the appropriation for food will be used to extend relief into adjoining sections which received no help last year.

Medicines and equipment for Children's Homes and hospitals will be sent in to the extent of $500,000, clothing and raw wool and flax for home industries will receive $300,000, while the remaining $200,000 of the budget will be spent upon the agricultural work.

We feel that the budget as thus revised represents our very best judgment of the relief which we ought to provide in our district during the coming year. We, of course, expect to make feeding our first object, and to use funds for reconstruction only after famine relief has been taken care of. It should be realized, however, that our agricultural and other reconstruction work is itself famine relief work in the broadest sense of the term. Until the agriculture of the famine zone is reconstructed, the famine cannot be terminated, and our reconstruction program is just as essential to permanently saving life as is relief feeding.

We have a splendid group of twenty-four workers in Russia and they are well fitted and prepared to handle a very complete work. We have one doctor, four trained nurses, three agricultural directors, and the rest are social workers supervising the distribution of the food. We feel that we are in position to make the very best use of any and all of the funds that may be contributed for this purpose.

All of our reports indicate that the suffering in the famine area is going to be almost as great this year as last. The great shortage of horses and seeds made it impossible for the peasants to plant enough for their needs, and a very severe drought during the summer of 1922 very seriously affected what little grain was planted. Large numbers survived the famine last year by eating their livestock, but this year little stock remains to be eaten. Last year famine sufferers who had clothing or other valuable possessions sold them for food, but this year they will not have that resource either. They will depend more completely than ever upon outside relief for their lives.

The American Friends' Service Committee has endeavored to get as much food as possible into Russia before the winter sets in. We have, therefore, followed the policy of buying to the limit of our funds and forwarding to Russia for use during the winter. As a consequence, we have thousands of tons of food in storage, guaranteeing a minimum program of feeding for over half of the winter. We are depending on securing other funds for work in the late winter and spring.

The food and medicines which we are sending are not only intended to save life, but to make the individual recipients know that there are people in America who care for them and who desire to give them a message of good will in their time of need. We keep absolutely clear of all political questions involved in the changes in Russia, and hold ourselves ready to give relief in the interests of creating a better world in which to live. We want men and women everywhere to feel that they are all children of a common Father, and that we ought not to let differences of opinion lead to serious misunderstandings. We must do all that we can to get the peoples of the world to have confidence in one another.

We believe that every Friend will feel the importance of this work in serving those who are suffering, in stimulating international good will, and in increasing the usefulness of our own Society by the vision and inspiration which the service brings. We hope that every Friend will take his part in carrying the year's program to a successful conclusion.

WHERE THE CLOTHING GOES.

The following paragraphs are taken from a letter from one of the workers of the American Friends' Service Committee in Russia. They indicate how great is the need for clothing, alike for men, women and children, in the famine zone.

"First there are the Children's Homes, where the most pitiful groups of children are to be found, orphans and half-orphans of the terrible famine of last winter. They are in need of everything, and the homes and the Government are scarcely able to provide them with more than the little frame house they live in and the board beds, where they sleep huddled two and three together for warmth.

"We are trying to give the children in these Homes at least some of the warm clothing that they need for the winter, and then to make a general distribution to children living at home, and to their parents, as far as the clothing holds out. For it is not only the children who lack clothing, but the entire population. If it were not that the need is so terribly great, we should feel almost overwhelmed by the hundreds of bales of strong, warm clothing that keep steadily coming in from home.

"As it is, we look at the lists of the thousands of people whom we must feed this winter or let starve, and wonder how the stocks of clothing will ever be enough for them. It goes without saying that a man who has no crops, no horses, no cow, has long ago sold his clothing and his family's food. For on the horse and cow the peasant's life depends, and he will part with anything else first. So do not be surprised to know that whole villages are thrown into a turmoil of excitement when the news goes out that the Quakers have American clothing for them."

ONE RUSSIAN VILLAGE.

As it draws up its pyok (ration) lists for the fall feeding, the American Friends' Mission in Russia is able to investigate the conditions in each family in its district. The products for the first month's feeding will be given out about Eleventh Month 1st, and only those families that are entirely destitute will receive anything. For in view of the large amounts of food that will be needed later on in the winter the Mission is cutting down the first month's feeding list as far as possible, eliminating every family that can exist for one month longer without help.

But even after this scaling down of the numbers to be fed the Mission finds that in Ciphudinova, in Bogdonovskaya Volost (township), it will have to provide a ration for 140 out of the 236 souls, 43 out of 65 families, and by First Month 1st next everyone in that village will be in need. In statistics, this is the record of Ciphudinova:

Population last year, 600 souls; population this year, 236 souls; horses left in whole village, 8, or 1 to every 30 persons; oxen left, none; camels left, none; cows left, 21; harvest for whole village this year, 205 bushels; earned by working in other villages, 30 bushels; need for planting in fall and spring (most of this, 96 bushels of rye, has been sown), 106 bushels. Remaining for food for a year, 75 bushels. Seventy-five bushels of grain for 236 souls for one year!

ARMENIAN HANDKERCHIEFS FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

The American Friends' Service Committee has just received eight dozen handkerchiefs made by Armenian and Syrian refugees under the direction of Emily Oliver at Ras-el-Metr, Syria. The money received from their sale is for the benefit of the Friends' relief work and orphanages at that place. The handkerchiefs are all hand-made, with beautiful lace borders, and will make fine Christmas gifts. They are of two prices: sixty-six and seventy-two cents each, respectively, which prices are considerably below the market value of these handkerchiefs.

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Eleventh Month 25, 1922—104 boxes and packages; 3 anonymous.

Contributions received for week ending Eleventh Month 27, 1922—$10,705.36.

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

CALN QUARTERLY MEETING was held as usual at Coatesville, Pa., on Eleventh Month 17th. A few members of the Visitation Committee were present. The meeting throughout was characterized by a beautiful freedom on the part of many, the messages were brief and pointed and seemed to indicate life and helped to beget the same. A member near the close of the meeting said that years ago he had been in the mental habit of questioning the value of holding Quarterly Meetings, but that feeling had long since given place to the strong conviction that they filled a very important place in the life of the Church.

As at present constituted the Quarterly Meeting initiates little new business, and the routine nature of the items that come before it might easily develop into lifelessness, but where such freedom is felt as was manifested at the meeting now considered, the occasion cannot help but be profitable to all who can share in its exercises.

Caln Quarterly Meeting is the smallest Quarterly Meeting in the series, but during the summer months just passed it has extended some outreaching service in the communities it immediately touches. Appointed meetings for Divine worship have been held on certain First-day afternoons at the old Caln Meeting-house and at Marshallton, and a neighborhood Conference each at Downingtown and Christiana.

The thought on the part of a Friend that Meetings for Divine Worship, held after the manner of Friends, might be held at Uwchlan and at Nantmeal during the summer, was not realized. These are neighborhoods in which Caln Quarterly Meeting in years past had subordinate meetings reporting to it.

D. H. F.

The following may seem a trifle belated, but The Friend (London) reporting it has been but lately received.

T. Edmund Harvey, in returning his Minute to the London Meeting for Sufferings granted him last Eighth Month in connection with his visit to the Friends' General Conference (Hicksite), held at Richmond prior to the Five Years' Meeting, said seven Hicksite Yearly Meetings were represented at the Conference and several fraternal delegates to the Five Years' Meeting were also present, as well as several "Orthodox" Friends. The session at which they delivered their message of unity was a very remarkable experience and there was a beautiful spirit of fellowship. The General Conference is not an executive body; it is contemplating a uniform discipline; it is engaging in foreign mission service and a desire to co-operate with other bodies of Friends was manifested. After being at the Conference T. E. Harvey attended the Five Years' Meeting, some impressions of which he reported. The outstanding feature was the wonderful session at which unity was attained. Another important feature was the prominent place occupied by the Friends' colleges in the life of the Society. After the Five Years' Meeting he attended the closing session of Ohio (Conservative) Yearly Meeting, where also he received a most cordial welcome.

YOKES.

Not long ago, in a quiet little meeting, the mind of one of the worshippers was led to consider what is really signified by that expression, so familiar to us all, "the yoke of Christ." Why does it somehow have an irksome sound to us, when it was obviously the Master's intention that it should connote something quite the reverse? Remember the one occasion on record when He made use of it (Matt. xi: 29-30), just after giving that wonderful invitation to all that "labor and are heavy laden." Certainly it cannot have been His thought to add to the burden of those who were already loaded down and wearied with what they had to carry, or He never would have added, "And ye shall find rest unto your souls."

Yet the irksomeness is there. We think somehow of a yoke, even His yoke, as something additional to be borne, something heavy to carry, something that will weigh us down and humiliate us. Perhaps there is still lurking in the back of our minds some dim vision of the old Roman practise in dealing with prisoners of war, sending their captives under the yoke as a mark of their humiliation and entire submission, subjugating them literally as well as metaphorically. That this idea in connection with the word yoke is no new one is readily seen when we examine other Scripture references to it, for from Isaac's prophesy to Esau (Genesis xxvii: 40) that he shall one day break his brother's yoke from off his neck, to Paul's impassioned speech before the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, where (Acts xv: 10) he asks, "Why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?", we find numerous allusions to it as a symbol of abject servitude.

So widespread is this thought in connection with the yoke that the "Century Dictionary," among its seven definitions of the word, includes the following: "An emblem, token or mark of servitude, slavery, and sometimes of suffering generally." But certainly the editors are quite in error in citing as an instance of this the very passage in Matthew above referred to: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

The Cross may be held out to the valiant of heart as the terrible, glorious symbol of an all-enduring loyalty, but surely when Jesus was considering especially those who are wearied and disheartened, he would not hold out to them an emblem of slavery and suffering, while promising them rest and a lighter burden. No, there is another side to the symbol.

Tracing the words back in the history of the language we find an unmistakable relationship between the noun yoke and the verb to join. A "yoke of oxen" means, of course, a pair. Will not this give us a glimmer of the idea in Jesus' figure? When we take His yoke upon us, we are joined with Him. We are no longer alone. We are become "true yoke-fellows" with Him, and He with us. Pulling our load with Him at our side, we may indeed know what it is to learn of Him, as He entreats us to do.

Then, what are yokes really for? To add to the load of the patient burden-bearers? Certainly not. An ox-yoke may be a heavy affair, but its sole purpose and usefulness is to make the load an easier one to pull. An old-fashioned dairyman's yoke made possible the carrying of heavy pails of milk that would otherwise have been a wearisome burden, indeed. We have all of us our loads to pull, our burdens to bear. Sometimes nobody knows but ourselves how hard to pull these loads become, or how weary and heavy-laden we feel. Then is when we can learn to know the help that comes from the yoke of Christ. How much easier it is to pull when we have taken His yoke upon us and learned of Him. How different everything is when He is pulling with us at our side. How easy is His yoke, as He promised us it would be, and how light His burden, when we think of what we were staggering under alone! We really come to know what He meant when He said, "And ye shall find rest unto your souls."

Shall we not then rid our minds of this idea of the irksomeness of Christ's yoke, this dread to take it upon ourselves for fear it will burden us still more, and humiliate us too much? If there is anything humbling about it, He is there with us, joined with us, sharing in our lowliness of heart, and, we are told, "despising the shame."

Shall we do less? Can we not somehow sweep together enough faith, summon sufficient courage, to take Him at His own word? He does not promise to rid us of our load, nor even to make it really any lighter than it is. He does promise to make it easier to pull, and to help us to overcome and conquer all that needs overcoming and conquering. Let us, as we used to hear it so yearningly entreated from our galleries, "join in with His offers of redeeming love," i. e., be yoked with Him, feeling anything but shame for that which is the power of God to the saving of men's souls. Then we shall come into our heritage, here in this exceedingly present life, as children of God: for if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and yoked heirs with Christ.

In the Near East.

RAS-EL-METN, Syria,
Tenth Month 31, 1922.

DEAR FRIENDS EVERYWHERE:—

We sent off a cablegram yesterday as follows: "Horrors and massacres at Smyrna, as told by eye-witnesses, are appalling. First steamer, refugees, arrived Beyrout destitute. Large contributions urgently needed if we are to do some part in relieving distress. Oliver and Evans." I hope this cable will have reached your side, as I was able to send it from another country. I must here explain that we are under a very strict censorship, and most items of news in regard to relief work, and especially in regard to Armenians, are suppressed by the censor. I do not know why. In consequence many of my letters have not reached their destination. Will those Friends who have not received answers to their letters please accept this explanation. The censor will not see this letter for it will go through a channel which he cannot intercept, but if it should ever meet his eye in print, let me assure him that his mind can be perfectly easy, I never write anything about military or political subjects.

The horrors of the massacres at Smyrna were even worse than the reports; I have no words to depict them. We have our information from eye-witnesses, but it is too shocking to go into details. The misery resulting to those still alive is indescribable. This is the fruit of war, of divided counsels, and rivalry among the Allied Powers. Hundreds of thousands of women and children and old men are fleeing in all directions, while the young and able-bodied men are taken into the interior, for what?

The first steamer load of 1500 refugees has arrived in Beyrout. They are being disinfected at the Quarantine station and then will be let loose to go where they will. Again, as last year after the flight of refugees from Cilicia, all the caves by the seashore, all spaces under bridges will be occupied by masses of hungry, cold, ragged, homeless individuals. Already there are thousands of Armenians in Beyrout, many, many of them wandering about the streets looking for work, and a crust of bread. Can Heaven look down to-day on a sadder sight than the rich fertile lands of Anadolia ruined and devastated, its soil drenched with the blood of its sons, its villages (once full of happy homes, and the children in the streets playing with marbles) now burnt and blackened ruins, and flocks of vultures still hovering over the unburied bones of those who were only so recently living their lives, dreaming their dreams, and looking into the future with hope and faith? What awful tornado has swept over this beautiful Anadolia? Has hell burst through its boundaries and carried desolation and doom with it everywhere? Have all the traditional devils gathered for a united attack, and to gloat over the agonies of dying and suffering multitudes? My very brain is staggered, and reels in front of the facts which I know. The floods of human hate and vindictiveness would seem to have reached a height beyond which they could not rise.

The Greeks in their mad rush from Smyrna, northeast to Eskischehr, their objective being Angora, which they were unable to reach, left destruction and ruin in their trail, the Moslem villages being the sufferers. It is futile to hide or deny this. It is a fact. The rising tide of Turkish nationalism, and Mohammedan fanaticism all over the Mohammedan world, made the Turks of Anadolia a new power, and with the force of a cyclone they rushed west and drove the Greek armies into the sea. Then the Moslem wrongs were avenged to an extent that will stagger humanity when it is fully known. But on whom were they avenged? Not on the Greek army which got mostly away in their fleet. Vengeance fell on the non-combatant population. Between the upper and lower millstones the poor inhabitants of Smyrna and the villages in the interior, have been crushed, and seen hell in all its awful realities, and suffered agonies worse than death.

Over against this flood of destruction and fury, wrong and suffering, what can we do? What is left to us to do? In the first place still to hold on to our faith that God reigns. To some even that is no longer possible. Everything has been swept overboard in the storm. And second, in spite of all, to believe that love, and only love can heal the world's wrongs. Love is the only answer to the wrath of man. Practical love, sympathy and service are all we can contribute. These will do much to soothe and heal. For many there will be no more sunshine in their lives. Here we are ready to do everything we can to help in measures of relief, and I appeal to all to do what they can to help us to meet one of the greatest emergencies that has yet come to the Near East.

Since the above was written Herbert G. Wood, of Woodbrooke, England, has arrived here, and is sleeping under our roof to-night. He and Dr. Rendel Harris have just arrived from Constantinople and Smyrna. Herbert G. Wood has confirmed all the information we already had, only some things are even worse than we had heard.

The Armenians we brought up here at the beginning of the year have all got settled in the villages around and are in one way and another eking out a living. We propose to repeat the experiment if funds are forthcoming. We could probably find houses for two or three hundred families in the villages around here. It will be something to have people under a roof before the winter storms begin.

Our Syrian orphans are all flourishing, with a few exceptions, who are having attacks of malaria, and these are practically cured.

We count on the love and unity of our friends with us in the work here, and to the many in different parts of the country, and the cities, whose friendship we treasure, we send our love and cordial greetings.

Sincerely thy friend,

DANIEL OLIVER.

P. S.—A message of love to thee. Thou wilt see that we are again confronted with one of those sudden and unexpected earthquakes, and God only knows what is still to come. Our trust is in Him and with Him as our Guide we can face the future with confidence—although our brains seemed paralyzed in front of such untold sufferings and death. Smyrna had to be burnt, because the murdered bodies were in such heaps in the streets that they could not be removed and the only way was to set fire to the city to burn it and the bodies. The details are absolutely horrible.

THE call to service has been sounded loudly during recent years, but something deeper is needed. Our service must be rooted in God, it must flow out from us naturally as a consequence of our fellowship with Him.—G. L.

Adventures in South America.

TAKEN FROM THE LETTERS AND NOTEBOOKS OF A TRIP TO COLOMBIA.

Anne Garrett Pennell.

LA CUMBRE.

Fifth Month 16, 1922.

La Cumbre is very close to the summit of the western range of the Colombian Andes. It is a comparatively new settlement where the wealthy people from the valley below come up to spend the summer. There is an American hospital here, the only hospital for perhaps several hundred miles in any direction and the only American one so far as I know in the whole country. We are staying at the hospital by courtesy of the resident surgeon, Dr. Galloway, who takes F. out on horseback rides after rare orchids and helps us in a thousand ways to get into the routine of Colombian life.

Yesterday a great triumph was achieved. One of the things that has been bothering us so far has been the proper care of specimens in this wet season. When we were planning the trip some botanists advised us to depend entirely on coal oil for drying plants and to take a very small number of blotters. Coal oil here costs a dollar a gallon and is very awkward to carry in any quantity on mule back. Result, a compromise, many driers for use in sunshine and an emergency kerosene stove for use in such weather as the present. So far we have been tying the freshly collected plants in bundles with blotters between each two specimens. This plan works well when there is sun enough to dry the wet blotters and when there are not too many plants on hand at any one time. Day before yesterday the plants got ahead of us and we decided to try the emergency heater. It smoked abominably and flamed up so as to threaten a conflagration. Dr. Smith's brother lent his aid but to no use. Then the Irishman, Dr. Galloway, solved the problem. We bought a brazier in the market for forty cents and ten cents worth of charcoal to use as fuel. The brazier gives out double the heat of the other stove. The fuel costs next to nothing and can be gotten anywhere even in the lonely mountains where we expect to camp. We are certainly delighted.

Our quarters with their plants in all stages of preparation are of continuous interest to the people here—both patients and staff. Upstairs in our bed-rooms there are about two thousand plants now in press besides the bundles of dry specimens. Bundles are under beds, behind doors, in front of windows, everywhere. One of our trunks is used as a sorting table. Every day it is necessary to go over all the plants, changing wet driers for dry ones in the bundles that are not yet ready for the fire, removing the dry specimens from the bundles that have come off the heat and replacing them with semi-dry ones.

Downstairs under the house we have our heaters. Two of our trunks on end form the supports. Across these are laid two bamboo poles and on the poles we lay the bundles of plants in such a way that the heat can pass up along the furrows of the corrugated boards which separate the individual specimens. Each bundle is covered with a cloth skirt which hangs down to the ground and conserves the heat. We have to watch the fire carefully so as not to have a conflagration for the whole performance is exposed to the winds of heaven. Fortunately there is not very much breeze here.

FIFTH MONTH 19, 1922.

Shall I tell you, I wonder, about the new member of the family—a little bunch of khaki fur, a small pink nose, two inquiring brown eyes, two hands and two feet (usually cold) with five clinging digits each. He is a cusumbe or perro de montana (dog of the mountain), a tiny sort of monkey and as big as a baby kitten. He eats bananas, sleeps all day and is naturally awake all night, but will sleep then too if his basket is covered. At present he lives down cellar and I visit him hourly to see that he hasn't been strangled in his cord. The leather bracelet of my wrist watch proved to be a perfect fit and cusumbe wears a new collar while I have attached my watch to my wrist by a ribbon.

Day before yesterday we made an expedition to the summit of the range on foot. Early in the morning we set out. F. and his assistant each had their plant presses and the latter a camera. I carried a pair of heavy climbing irons in case we should see some rare orchids beyond reach from the ground. Each of us wore a belt to which various articles were attached. In all we had a collecting trowel, a machete or long native knife, a pair of field glasses, luncheon and a cyanide bottle for preserving rare insects.

The trail wound along the low grassy ridges passing several little adobe huts, each with its chickens, flower pots and troops of bare-footed children. It is unusual in this country for even the wealthy families to have less than eight children and often there are twelve or fourteen. The first man we met, who was leading a carga mule loaded with wood, stopped, and, with the courtesy of the Colombian native, told us that the trail further on was "feo, no camino real"—literally "foul, no royal road." So indeed it proved before the day was done.

As the way grew steeper we came to freshly cleared land where the prostrate trees still had living orchids growing all along their trunks. Most abundant was a little yellow beauty with splotches of brown on it growing in long, graceful sprays. We could have filled Pennock's window several times over with the exquisite display; but a few specimens were all the botanists needed so we trudged on.

A little further on we entered the unbroken forest. Here the trail had washed down into the typical humps and hollows of the rainy season in this country. As the animals usually follow exactly in the path of their predecessors, the caminos in wet weather somewhat resemble the ties of an unfinished railroad track. For a person who steps carefully there is little difficulty in keeping to the ridges, but an unlucky slip will land one in a deep puddle, whence one emerges mud to the knees. It was hard work climbing on such a trail and the quick fatigue of high altitudes began to trouble us a little; but we pushed on. Suddenly we came out on a great view and here we sat down to eat lunch.

As it were through a little hole in the dense sub-tropical forest we looked out over a wide sunny valley and away to the central range of the Andes towering into the sky some eighty miles away. In the foreground were the foothills of the range on which we stood, treeless, ribbed, showing here and there patches of bright red soil. Beyond, in the full sun, lay the broad stretch of El Valle, The Valley, as it is affectionately called. With its alternating woodland and pasture and the winding silver ribbon of the Cauca River, it looked like some scene in tidy little England and not at all as if it belonged to the Spanish tropics. Shutting it in, rose in the purple distance the abrupt wall of the Central Andes, its summits wreathed in cloud with here and there a lofty peak showing a dark point against the blue sky.

FIFTH MONTH 23, 1922.

Cusumbe has been stolen and we are desolated. This morning when we went to visit him his box was uncovered and everything was gone. Repeated inquiries have brought no information. It seems that he was a rare creature and was evidently much admired by the peons.

My last memory is of his cuddling up on my shoulder where he most liked to be—two infant sneezes by my ear, a narrow pink tongue stretched out in a prodigious yawn, cold feet on my neck, a few sniffs at my back hair, then sleep. How I miss him!

THE CONFERENCE AT MEDIA.

Friends of Concord Quarterly Meeting organized an interesting Conference, on Eleventh Month 25th, at the meeting-house in Media, to which were invited also the members of Caln and Western Quarters. Frances Tatum Rhoads presided at the five o'clock session, which dealt with the problem of the religious education and training of our children. In her introductory remarks she emphasized the fact that if we can but have proper home-training, we need not fear for the future of our young people. We must be willing to trust our children and to be such parents as our children can trust in their turn, all of us trusting the while in our Heavenly Father's love and care.

Rebecca Nicholson Taylor spoke from what she called the "grandparents' generation." These must not dictate, argue or lay down laws dogmatically. Above all they must not lose faith in the younger generation, but rather feel that it is their own place to show forth the "fruits of the spirit:" love, joy, peace and all the rest. Then turning to the tasks of the younger parents she pointed out that the religious teaching of little children is comparatively easy, but that those of college age present a different problem to be solved. Their whole teaching at this point is to experiment, to try everything, to prove everything. A "guarded education" is no longer possible, the world howls at our doors and comes in through the windows; it will not be kept out. To-day's generation is efficient, well-educated, but they need a spiritual awakening. The spiritual man must rule over the intellectual man as well as over the brutish man. The younger generation seek what they call "reality." They must realize that "Reality is the perception of the fullness of Him that filleth all in all."

The meeting then divided itself into three groups, to discuss certain phases of the general question. Mary Bucknell Elkinson led one section on the topic of Religious Training in the Home. Walter W. Haviland's group considered Opportunities of our Bible Classes and Day Schools, while a third, under Richard C. Brown, talked over ways of keeping young people at college in touch with their home meetings. One of the points brought out forcibly in the first of these group discussions was the need, in all our striving, for "the securing of independent goodness" in our children's lives.

After a picnic supper in the basement of the meeting-house, the whole gathering re-assembled for a consideration of the subject of "The Ministry." George L. Jones presided. He felt that Friends had made three contributions to the progress of religious thought in the world; first, a belief in the brotherhood of man and the priceless value of every human soul, resulting in efforts for the uplift of humanity; second, a belief in the immediate communication of God's will to man; and third, the conviction that worship is communion with God, not an easy means of being spiritually entertained. Friends' meetings for worship are the most "expensive" kind there are—it costs more. Are we willing, he asked, to pay the price in our daily lives which this kind of meeting demands for the communion of man with God and for his speaking through His prophetic messengers? Then he put another question: Is there vocal service which is acceptable to God yet which is not just what we would ordinarily term "the ministry?" He felt that many people might feel an occasional call to take part in meetings, without any consciousness at all of anything like a definite "call to the ministry."

Rayner W. Kelsey bade us face frankly the fact that even our large meetings to-day are not, as we would fondly delude ourselves, "concentrations," but only "survivals." He quoted Samuel Bownas and other eighteenth century Friends who left on record that there were meetings in those days with an attendance of fifteen hundred members. He showed that there is a need for the developing of young ministers. This is helped along very largely in the West by the active Christian Endeavor societies, which meet on First-day evenings. He spoke too of the need for winning non-Christian people to Christ, and as illustrations of the value of quiet personal work, he showed the effect of such talks on two Haverford students, one an agnostic, the other a professed atheist. The first of these is now a member of the Society of Friends, and the second is desirous of joining with us. The Church is needed to-day as much as it ever was to spread the glad tidings of salvation, not from the consequences of sin only, but from sin itself. The common people will still hear such a preacher gladly, and he will have souls for his hire.

Robert H. Maris stated that in a Friends' meeting there are no limits set to the number of instruments God may choose to speak for Him. He asked whether there really is a fundamental difference between what we call the "prophetic" and the "teaching" ministry. Christ was pre-eminently a teacher, and His ministry was of the "teaching" type. For right worship the members of a meeting must know one another better, fear one another less, understand one another more perfectly. We must not be too easily shocked or offended by what we hear offered in a meeting.

Following these addresses, the meeting was thrown open to a discussion of these and kindred topics. It would be stretching this report to too great length to attempt to include all the points made by the many interested persons taking part. A few nuggets must suffice. "The ministry of prayer (silent and vocal) is what makes a meeting. We cannot have a good meeting without it." "There should be that flowing 'from vessel to vessel' in a rightly held meeting which would enable those who minister to speak to the 'states' of individuals in need." "John William Graham said in a lecture at Swarthmore that he used often to go to meeting with a 'very good sermon in his head' but once he arrived there, he felt no call or warrant to deliver it." "Do not compromise—be a Christian in everything." "Recorded ministers are leaned on too much." "Meetings are only a means to an end; the end is that those should gain in power from the meetings they attend."

MESSAGES FROM JAPAN.

HOUSE-HUNTING IN SHIMOTSUMA.

It's a long hundred miles from Karuizawa to Shimotsuma—third class! We left Karuizawa station at 8.14 and got down through the twenty-six tunnels over 3,000 feet to Takasaki by 10.20. The Oyama train was waiting for us. A three-hour ride and we changed again, and at Shimodate we changed once more, if it can be called "change cars" when we met the Shimotsuma train pulling out of Shimodate as we pulled in. The three-hour wait was not tedious, however, as Ouchi San (the Christian worker) met us at the train, and we went with him to his home and renewed the family friendship. His wife served tea at once and green persimmons, assuring us they were good. They may have been. I still don't know.

At 4.45 we boarded the little independent line train—half freight—to Shimotsuma, our new home, arriving at 5.30. Various ones of our Mito friends had written their friends and relatives of our coming and all have been house-hunting all summer! But it is almost an impossible situation in a small town where everybody owns his own house and there are few transients excepting the school teachers, and they hand on their houses to their successors! But we had word they had a house—quite impossible, they said, but the only thing—so we went. Had I not a trained vision, I would have said impossible, too. Very old and rotten; very dirty and neglected; no bath-room and no kitchen, right on the street; and worst of all only two rooms! It had been a store until twenty years ago, and for the last twenty years high school boys have slept in it and studied.

I'd like to go into the details of making the arrangements and seeing the house, etc. Interesting enough! We went back and forth from the home of the lady who sent us the letter first, and finally, yes, we rented it for a year! And now listen! I wonder if it ever happened before.

The man expected 8 yen ($4.00) a month for it, as it was a store, and we agreed. But to-day we went to the Boys' High School, and in the President's office they had a sodan—a consultation. (The President's wife had been in school with Hirakawa San's wife, and had come to our home to a cooking class; and Kawasaki San, the classics teacher, had been in one of Gurney's Bible classes when he was in the Normal School in Mito twenty years ago.) They decided at the sodan that 8 yen was too much; they consulted, and the rent is reduced to 7 yen a month!

We are looking ahead. We must have a temporary home. This is a grand location for work, and later on Gurney's secretary and family must have a place to live in, and when we can get another place this will be for them and the work. It has a thatched roof.

P. S. When we got back to Karuizawa, we found a letter from the Principal of the schools in a neighboring town, another of Gurney's Bible class boys of years ago, a fine Christian man, and he says, "I have a friend in Mito and he has a relation in Shimotsuma, and I have asked him to get you a house."

P. S. 2. A letter to-day says the rent is reduced to 6 yen a month!

A MEMORABLE EVENING.

Gurney and I sat in the little station of Shimotsuma, our new home, waiting for the 7.20 train for Shimodate, where we expected to attend the regular evening prayer meeting and spend the night. We were thinking of the wee little thatched house that is to be our new home. We sat quiet for a bit, knowing each other's thoughts. It was dark and still rainy, and perhaps our thoughts were dark, too. But at last Gurney said, "Christ was born in a manger," and then the light shone through.

We ate our left-over lunch in the train and when we got to the meeting we found it to be a "Kangei kwai" (welcome meeting) for us.

Ouchi San read Proverbs xxv: 25: "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country." They sang hymns of joy and had a time of thanksgiving, and Ouchi San spoke from the text a little. Then Ouchi San began the story of Jacob and his sons, telling it very well and in considerable detail. I began to wonder just the connection in this particular meeting, when he began to draw his lesson. "There has been a spiritual famine in Shimodate for two years now, and as dear old Jacob was waiting and stretching his neck for the return of Benjamin who would lead them all to the land of plenty, so we have in Shimodate been stretching our necks for the return of the Binfords to lead us to the land of spiritual plenty." It was so earnest and sincere. We had tea and rice and bean cakes together and we chatted together until ten o'clock, mostly about Friends' interests in America.

The night was badly spent on the pallet on the floor under a green mosquito net, but it was not too long, as we took the 6.30 train again for Shimotsuma to get some necessary repairs started on our new residence in "West Avenue" (Nishi Machi). We got back to Ouchi San's house in Shimodate at 1 P. M., and had to rush, although they had killed the fatted chicken for the returned Benjamin! Ouchi San, Gurney and I sat on the floor around the little two-foot square table, and fished the long noodles out of the bowl and sucked down the chicken broth, and ate egg plant salt pickles. We thanked God that we had once more tasted the love of our friends, and as we tasted their kindness in the meal we asked God to let us taste from the spiritual table prepared for us.

MITO, Siba, Tokyo,
Tenth Month 6, 1922.

DEAR FRIEND:—

I am sending thee under separate cover some pictures of our summer camp held at Akagi Mountain last summer. I can truthfully say it was one of the best ten days I have ever experienced, both for the earnest seeking of God which was manifested by all of the boys who came, and for the deep spirit of unity at which we arrived at the close of our meetings. We came to the conference with no pre-arranged program, but only the desire to find God in the very depths of our being, and having found Him to follow His guidance no matter where it would lead us.

We held a meeting for worship after the manner of Friends once a day, but not at a pre-arranged hour. It might be just following a meal, it might be in the morning, afternoon or evening. It might be in the tent, out under the trees near the camp, or after some hot climbing expedition in the mountains. But in each case we found a unity of desire to know God and to follow Him. Every member of the camp took part in these meetings at some time during the stay together, and in the end we together consecrated our lives to the Friends' ideal of living God in the societies in which we are placed.

Since returning to Tokyo, this group has continued to meet once a month for an outdoor picnic, or other social time which we follow by a meeting for worship. I think it will develop into a strong force to aid and develop the Friends' Meeting here at Hijirizaka.

Thanking thee for thy prayers and support in our work, I am,
Thy friend,

THOMAS E. JONES.

Wilfred Monod.

The chauffeur seemed to have lost his way. It was some satisfaction to strangers like ourselves to see a native whose business was to find streets thus bewildered. We were in one of the oldest parts of Paris, on the slope of the hill associated with the early patron saint of the city, St. Genevieve, whose tomb is still shown in the beautiful old church of St. Etienne du Mont nearby. Just across the river towers Notre Dame, and behind it the tall, plain church of St. Gervais, where the great long-range German shell fell on "Good Friday," 1918, and killed over eighty people at one shot. But all around us was the net-work of deep, dark, winding streets almost as narrow as alleys, but with ancient looking houses six and seven stories high, casting a gloom about us. Ah! now he has found the street, "Rue du Cardinal;" and in a moment we draw up beside a mouldy little court-yard; on one side up some steps is a polished brass plate, contrasting with the dank decay around, bearing the name "Wilfred Monod." So this is the home of perhaps the leading Protestant of France, as we should say, almost in the slums, though he is pastor of the large and handsome old church, the "Oratoire du Louvre," facing the palace of the Louvre, and close to the Palais Royal. The maid shows us into a dim waiting-room, where at a long table several people are waiting for interviews with the celebrated pastor. We recall that he is the son of an equally or even more famous preacher of Paris, Theodore Monod, and grandson of another leading Protestant, Jean Monod, once of Geneva—a wonderful family, who thus for three generations have stood for a more enlightened and devout religion in this Catholic and skeptical country. Wilfred Monod is also one of the leading pacifists of France; he has recently been quoted in English periodicals as saying that the trouble with Protestants as regards Peace is that "they have not added a Programme to their creeds,"—in other words, have not applied their Christianity to the case in hand, or showed their faith by their works.

After perhaps three-quarters of an hour of waiting we were ushered into the dark little study of this interesting man. He greets us pleasantly,—a small thin figure, about fifty, in black frock coat and white tie. Our companion, John P. Fletcher, just from Berlin, at once takes up the conversation in English, bringing a pacifist's greeting from the hostile country, and while he gives statistics to show conditions there, we have leisure to consider the man before us. Is this one of the saints of our day? His pinched and sallow face, thin shoulders, and long slim hands so apt to be raised as in benediction, suggest suffering and overwork. We have seen the statues of emaciated saints of medieval times; here seems to be one of the godly succession in the dress of our own day. We mentally contrast him with some of the prosperous pacifists we visited in their fashionable apartments in grander sections of Paris. Is this Protestant leader subject to persecution? He is telling of a visit he recently had in this very room from one of the leading pacifists of Germany, who came to see him in order to weave the bonds of brotherhood in suffering a little closer. "He looked very anxious," Monod said, "he knows that he is condemned to death." We learned later that he was on the black-list of the monarchists, elected for assassination, like Erzberger and Rathenau; we wondered if Monod also might be in danger here in France. "But he is anxious," he continued, "not only for himself, but for his country." He told me we must not expect too much of Germany in the way of pacifism; there might be a sad disappointment breaking out in Prussia some day." That is what all France fears, though all France desires peace.

As I looked at Monod his face seemed to me familiar and I thought I knew when I had seen him before. "Were you in America at one of D. L. Moody's conferences some twenty-five years ago?" I interposed in a pause of conversation. "Yes," he exclaimed, his thin hand rising as his feelings rose, "only it was thirty-two years ago, in the 90's. That was a wonderful summer conference." "I think I had the pleasure of meeting you then. We took a walk in the country, and I talked French, almost the only time," I continued. "It might be; it might be; I was there," he replied. "You must be nearly of the same age," suggested one of my companions. "I was born in 1867," he said. "So was I," I promptly rejoined. "We are of the same age, and met as young men." "How I enjoyed the missionary meetings at—what did you call it?" "At Round Top, the hill," I suggested. "That's it!" he exclaimed, "the beautiful sunset all around us, the fire-flies in the evening air, and then the speaker raising his face to the sky, and praying to the Father in Heaven," and again Wilfred Monod raised his thin hands with that gesture as of benediction, and a face lit up with pleasure at the recollection. But the sad, almost hard, look returned. It seemed as though he wished he could go to America again, and there find safety and rest, but he must stand at his post here. And so our interview drew to a close. He led us out to the stairs, and pressed our hands, evidently glad for such a visit. And we departed, with prayer in our hearts for such a brave and faithful servant of God.

A. C. GARRETT.

PARIS, Eleventh Month 12, 1922.

A PARABLE.—I went with my little girl to visit the Statue of Liberty on Bedloe's Island not long since. All of the island which the goddess was not using was occupied by military barracks. Signs reading "Private" met one at every turn.

Then we climbed the three hundred and twenty-nine steps until we could look out of the little windows that compose her crown. Below us we could see the batteries of lights which throw a flood of illumination upon the figure of the goddess at night; but we could not go up in the arm which raises the torch to enlighten the world. We were told that it had become weakened and was unsafe.—X.

NORTH CAROLINA YEARLY MEETING.

The Yearly Meeting held recently at Cedar Grove, near Woodland, N. C., and the Friends we met there, will long be remembered by those of us who had the privilege of attending that Yearly Meeting for the first time. The warm welcome which we received and the delightful hospitality with which we were entertained were grateful but humbling.

The attendance was said to be about as large as usual, but there were fewer visitors. Seven from Ohio Yearly Meeting, five from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and Wilbur K. Thomas (for three days) were the visiting Friends from a distance. Some members from the "larger body" in North Carolina attended most, if not all, of the sessions.

Wilbur K. Thomas spoke at an evening meeting on the work of the American Friends' Service Committee, especially in Russia. His appeal touched the hearts of his hearers and will doubtless bring a response in increased contributions to the fund for feeding the starving.

The reading of the Epistles from the seven meetings with which they correspond and the replies to them formed a large and interesting part of the business of the meeting. This exchange of messages of loving interest in each other's best welfare is no doubt helpful in uniting the members of the group of small Yearly Meetings, who have much in common. The danger of the custom becoming too formal is, however, realized by many of the concerned Friends whom we met.

The Epistle from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was read, also one from Germany, and a letter of loving counsel from a beloved, aged minister who was unable to be present.

A minute embodying the exercises of Women's Meeting, during the several sittings, was prepared for absent members. When it was read, and at other times, a solemnizing covering was over the meeting, drawing us near to our Heavenly Father and to each other. We could truly say "It is good for us to be here."

Since returning to our home and to our own meeting and duties a feeling of thankfulness remains for having had the pleasure of mingling in precious fellowship with Friends of North Carolina.

PEACE NOTES.

(Prepared by the Yearly Meeting Peace Committee.)

The Annual Meeting of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches, recently held at the City Club, was a memorable day to those to whom the cause of peace is dear. Fred B. Smith, Chairman of the Commission on Local Federations of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, gave a heart-gripping appeal to the Christian Church to preserve the peace of the world.

About 200 leaders in Philadelphia churches were present and greeted his address with enthusiasm. He spoke of the great World Alliance of Churches following the war, for which Lord Robert Cecil and Sir Willoughby Dickinson were largely responsible. Twenty-one nations belong, including some Catholic congregations. Having just returned from a tour of 19 countries, he said that while there was an overwhelming passionate cry for peace among the masses, the leaders in seventeen of these countries feel another conflict inevitable and are thinking and talking of war preparation. The Dardanelles and Constantinople are acute danger spots, as well as the Rhineland. If great Britain should lift her restraining hand, war would break out at once in these places.

The only agency that can prevent future wars, he said, is the Christian Church. America must take her place as a leader. Japan, China and India are ready to meet us half way. The world has many pacifist groups, including women's organizations and labor unions, all working hard against war.

Ours is the choice of the future—war or peace. We must get fully into some union of the rest of the world working toward peace—a world court—a new association of the nations. But in entering it we must stress our economic responsibility and accept our share of sacrifices. Politicians and the newspapers have been unsuccessful, but the Christian Church if she can only get under the weight of it can make peace permanent.

There is sentiment enough in the world, if properly organized, that can preserve us in the future. If the church fails, as it did from 1914-18, where shall we turn?

To us "there remains in this hour the solemn duty to make a protest against war, so strong, so intelligent, so profound that if war occurs none will be compelled to say 'We failed to do our duty in trying to teach humanity a better method of living.'"

AN INTERNATIONAL PEACE DAY.

Twenty-six nations, according to an announcement by the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, will join in observing the 17th of Twelfth Month as "World Peace Sunday." The movement was inaugurated at the meeting of the International Committee of the World Alliance, held last summer in Copenhagen. In America the Federal Council of Churches is co-operating with the American Branch of the World Alliance. The appeal to the churches of Europe to take part in this observance is being sent out from London, signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

SENATOR BORAH says of Clemenceau's visit: "To me, the most discouraging feature of the able visitor's speech is the fact that here is one of the great and dominant figures of the world coming to us to visit us four years after the signing of the armistice. He carries no message, when we analyze his speech, except that of punishment, of vengeance, of anticipated war. There is not a note of harmony toward the other powers of Europe, not a suggestion of constructive policy, not a single ray of promise so far as actual peace and the prosperity of the world is concerned.

"I utterly disbelieve in his whole theory. I unhesitatingly reject the proposition that there is no means in this world by which to govern men except that of force. If the great powers of Europe will write a treaty under which Europe can live; if they will do justice to the subject peoples of Europe; if they will abandon the principle of imperialism; if they will announce, instead of a policy of force, one of justice toward other peoples; if they will adopt the policy that looks to peace and not to war, which looks to reconstruction and not destruction, which looks to upbuilding and not dismemberment, and bring their program to the American people, they will find a sympathetic accord here as they will not find anywhere else in the world."

Report from the Smaller Schools.

Extracts from a report presented to the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education, in Eleventh Month, 1922.

A few items in the statistical report are of significance. Our eight schools number 388 children, an appreciable increase over last year's enrollment. A steady upward tendency in teachers' salaries and in tuition rates may be noticed. Fallsington has the largest percentage of Friends of all the schools, and Media has over 50 per cent. of Friends, while Haddonfield and Lansdowne minister to a wide circle outside the meeting. Lansdowne has the largest equipment of teachers of all the schools, with five teachers and an assistant for the six grades. Four of our schools have kindergartens, Atlantic City and Frankford working kindergarten and first grade together, while Haddonfield and Media keep their kindergartens separate from the grades. Atlantic City, with its eight grades, runs the sixth, seventh, and eighth on departmental lines, dividing the work among three teachers, while Haddonfield with the same number of grades has almost no departmental work. Our irregular grouping of children depends upon the teaching force, the size of classes, the number and size of class-rooms, etc.

Our teachers number thirty, including the Director of Art, who goes each week to the nearby schools and once in three weeks to more distant points. Very earnest effort is being put forth by all these teachers, who spend much time, energy and thought on their day's program and their plans for the year. A fine spirit prevails among our school children who are a splendid lot, eager and alert for the most part. In all our schools, teachers and children work together as one happy family. As in the home, the more that co-operation and unity are manifest, the more does real service and power come.

In my last report, I spoke of several things that we hope to accomplish in some measure this year, not new things but old things revived. Among these is a more intelligent attention to the subject of health. Early in the year, at our first teachers' meeting, each school was given an outline of such work in this direction as we might reasonably hope to accomplish. Such a plan, only suggestive, grows under the hands of a live teacher. Our first goal has been medical examination for every school; it has taken much time to work this out in the various communities. Wherever it is seen feasible, we have urged the local committee to take hold of the work and be responsible for it. Haddonfield, Lansdowne, Fallsington, London Grove, and Downingtown have completed these examinations. The work has been done by competent local doctors who have generously given up their time and in some schools have done the work gratuitously. I hope by another month the whole field will be covered. In each school the doctor leaves with the principal a careful record of his findings. Where any defect is noted, the home is communicated with. Height and weight charts are in every school and many children keep individual health charts with daily records of habits of sleep, brushing teeth, bathing, exercise, eating, etc. These records pass from teacher to parent, for in this work of health, the very closest co-operation of the home is needed. The Interstate Dairy Council has put its educational material and its corps of instructors at our command and this is very helpful in our plans for better physical standards for our children. And best of all, the children themselves are making real attempts to do those things that make for vigorous and abundant life. This program of health not only easily connects up with their reading, for a favorite book in several schools is the "Most Wonderful House in the World," with their art work in the making of attractive posters of fruit and other proper foods, with their civic work and their language, but with the good housekeeping of the school itself.

The lunch problem also has a vital connection with this health work. In Haddonfield and Lansdowne we could hardly ask for a better arrangement where a trained dietician daily prepares a wholesome satisfying meal, with two or three hot dishes from which a choice may be made, at moderate cost. Media employs a person from outside to come in and serve the luncheon to her large family.

In these larger schools the basement is the lunch room and the children have a large share in making it attractive; they make the doilies for the tables, the bright picture posters for the walls, they serve and clear away the luncheon and delightfully entertain a chance visitor with songs and games and most courteous attention. Atlantic City and Downingtown have no luncheon served, except the mid-forenoon lunch of milk for the younger children, as the children all go home at noontime. London Grove, Fallsington and Frankford all try to serve one hot dish; their arrangement for this is rather inconvenient but the teachers are making the best of the situation. In these communities an opportunity awaits interested parents near enough to the school to come in and assist with a hot luncheon. The Parent-Teacher Association of one of the finest private schools in New York City daily has a staff of mothers in the lunch room whose business it is to serve the mid-day meal to the children; in truth, in all of this work which is making for the physical welfare of our boys and girls and is so far reaching in its scope, the parents may take an active part.

Our playgrounds we may well take satisfaction in for their spaciousness and fine situation and beautiful trees, but in most cases we want more adequate equipment, such as swings and seesaws and giant strides, volley balls, and soccer and basket ball. All these things are important to the proper development of our boys and girls not only on the physical, but on the mental and moral side. We do not want to make loafers or loiterers on our playground, or listless children or quarrelsome children; we want to make right-minded citizens; we want to encourage all to play and play fair, and play hard. We rejoice when we find the playground carefully supervised. Atlantic City and Haddonfield have good physical instructors on their staff of teachers and much care is given to the playground. Media, too, is very alert to seize the playground as an opportunity to teach some of the finest lessons that our schools can give.

Closely following the physical work and intimately connected with it is the work in mental measurements. You will remember that three years ago for the first time we made a beginning in this; early this year an attempt was made again to get the work started, and it is a great satisfaction to be able to report that we have for this year secured the services of Margaret Rhoads Ladd of Bryn Mawr, who will go to each school and give such mental and achievement tests as are needed.

A third interest which compels our attention in these schools is in connection with the spiritual life of our children, that they should understand something of the meaning of worship, and that they should early be impressed with the relation between worship and service. This subject was brought before our teachers early in the year when an outline of possible plans was given with special reference to Bible study. This work has been taken hold of by the teachers with earnestness. The Abingdon Press series of books, which has the endorsement of some excellent Bible teachers, has been sent to each school. The Extension Committee of our Yearly Meeting has asked if there would be any opportunity for them to help in our schools. We hope that they will send to our mid-week meetings, as way may open, those who may have messages for our children adapted to their needs and understanding. Two of our schools, Frankford and Atlantic City, have no mid-week meetings, but at Atlantic City the children all assemble on Fourth-day mornings, for a very brief period of worship.

Various holidays and festal days have been observed this autumn in some or all of our schools with appropriate exercises, usually in the hands of the children, with a teacher as adviser. Sales already have begun in the schools to raise money to buy needed supplies, and meetings of parents and teachers have been held, with the children as the centre of interest. At Haddonfield the Parent-Teacher Association of the school began its work early in the year; among other things they are raising a fund of $160 to buy reference books for the school. Lansdowne, too, has just started a Parent-Teacher Association with fine spirit and interest. The opportunities for organized parents to work in our schools are as limitless as the needs of our children.

Our first teachers' meeting this year was splendidly attended, and a fine spirit of helpfulness was shown as we listened to reports from various teachers who had something to pass on from their summer's experience, or talked together of plans for the year. Our meeting in the Eleventh Month had a program, in addition to our conference, a talk on teaching little children to read by one of our own teachers. Since this was book week, we had an exhibit of books for children's reading kindly loaned to us by Friends' Select School, with a most stimulating talk on reading by Mary B. Jones. Ruth S. Goodwin addressed us on the subject, "What are the essentials in teaching history?" stressing ideals in a strong and very helpful way. The thoughts brought to us by these able teachers already are taking root in our schools.

Anne Walton Pennell is generously giving her time to our schools in recounting her recent experiences in South America. The Social Order committee has recently sent us a beautiful Thanksgiving story, written by Anna Cope Evans, which is being used in the schools at this season. We are thankful for all the help and inspiration that comes to us from our friends.

THE STORY OF THE GOLDEN-CROWNED KINGLETS.

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

[On page 235 of the current volume of THE FRIEND reference is made to a most remarkable incident that occurred on the steamship Resolute when two days out on a recent voyage east across the Atlantic. Juncos, a hermit turtel, a white-throated and a field sparrow, a stormy petrel, a phalarope and other birds, including a score and more and among them the golden-crowned kinglets, made up this remarkable collection. The Philadelphia Public Ledger, attracted by this interesting narration, copied it from THE FRIEND; we would encourage those of our readers who missed seeing THE FRIEND for Eleventh Month 16th to look it up.—Eds.]

Far up in the forests of the north there was reared this past summer a family of little Golden-crowned Kinglets. Their home was probably on the branch of a spruce or balsam tree in the warm summer sunshine and sweet odors of the northern woods. There were the tiny father and mother, and five still more tiny children—for next to the humming-bird, these are about the smallest of all our birds.

Let us picture to ourselves some of their experiences. The young ones sat in a row on the branch, and with a great deal of fluttering and squeaking took the small worms and flies their parents brought them. By the end of Ninth Month they could fly all about, and even chased mosquitoes ten feet above the top of the highest pointed fir. Finally, the time came when they must fly south, to seek the warm woods of the Carolinas, or the moss-barked oaks and palmettoes of Florida for the winter. The children did not want to go at all; they were afraid of the awful journey and of the huge sky; they wanted to stay in their cosy fir-tree. But it was growing colder every day, and the father said they would all freeze if they did not go. So one evening toward sunset the father and mother said, "Now we are going, and you must follow," and away they went! With many whimperings the poor little ones flew and flew after them, till before long the parents slackened their pace, and now they were all together, a tiny flock high above the earth. To their surprise their father led them still higher and higher (for small birds migrate at great heights), and as night fell, the dim earth with its leagues of forest, its lakes and rivers and mountain ridges, lay faint and far below—a terrible distance beneath their line of flight, and the great bright stars gleamed out as it seemed close above them. And now the children began to think how wonderful it all was, and to look forward eagerly for the adventures of the great journey. All through the long hours of that night they flew and flew and flew, quite exhilarated at first, but getting more and more tired as time passed, till with the grey of dawn the father began to dip downward in his flight, and soon they were all circling down and down and down and down, with faint happy chirpings from the children because it was easier now, and soon they were reaching the tree-tops, and a few moments later had all alighted, panting and drooping, and oh! so tired, but happy that they were all seven of them safe together. After an hour or two of rest and sleep, they began chasing gnats and mosquitoes for breakfast; then dropped off to sleep again; and so all through the day they napped and fed in the warm sun-shine till they were nicely rested.

Toward evening the children began to feel rather sad and anxious again; they were homesick for their cosy fir-tree as it grew dark, and another night of hard flying seemed quite dreadful. There was no help for it, however—and suddenly, almost before they knew it, father and mother were off, and they had to hurry to catch up! This time father led them higher than ever; oh! how hard it was, climbing and climbing up and up. Besides it was not so pleasant as the night before; as they rose hundreds of feet above the tree-tops they could hear a roaring and rushing sound beneath them all over the forest, and they felt themselves being carried swiftly along upon the wind. There were no bright stars now, and before long they had come up into the mist of low-driving clouds. They could not see the earth at all, or tell just where they were; but still they flew quite happily along; they believed their father knew the general direction, and it would be all right. Whirr! whirr! whirr! went all their little wings in turn hour after hour, while the wind swept by—the same way they were going. The children became quite content, and thought how nice it was of the wind to help them along. But very different were the thoughts of the father; he was very anxious; but he said nothing. And so another long night passed by as before.

THANKS TO THE QUAKERS FROM A RUSSIAN VILLAGE.

Many of the villages in the Russian famine zone, which have been helped by the relief mission of the American Friends' Service Committee, have written letters to the Quakers expressing their thanks for the help received. The following paragraphs are taken from such a letter. They illustrate not only how tragic the need is, but also that the Russian peasants appreciate something of the spirit in which the help is given.

After describing the terrible conditions experienced during the famine, the letter continues:

"In the unbearable agony resulting from the fear of immediate death they sought further means of escape from their terrible plight and found none. At last having lost all their strength in their search for an escape, and having given up all hope of help from any source they settled back each to await his death. Everything was at a standstill, frozen, quiet as the grave; a deadly silence surrounded all, broken only by the sighs of the dying.

"Then occurred that of which all had ceased to think—a miracle. Help came. Either the ceaseless currents of the air or the stormy waves of the sea had carried to the shores of America the sighs of the perishing. The Humble Saviour died, but His teaching, 'Love thy neighbor' still lives; with its creative warmth burning in your noble and responsive hearts it brought life to millions of the starving. You, hearing in your hearts the words of the Great Teacher and with sincere Christian endeavor, fearing not the tempestuous tides of the Atlantic, hastened to help your doomed brethren in Russia.

"Your great Christian effort, may be compared to the deeds of the noble saints who carried manna to the Children of Israel in the desert. You rescued from death us and our children, those innocent flowers of humanity. Again their young voices rang out, raising to the Eternal their prayers, prayers for you, our good Quaker brothers.

"You saved our lives. No human tongue can express the gratitude that we feel toward you. Each of us personally sends to you great Russian thanks.

"The Lord will reward you!"

THREE WOMEN FROM NADIRINKA.

It was a "big holiday" morning and the steeple bells were clanging monotonously over Russia. Children were ringing them as though they enjoyed the sport. The brightest clothes were on the street, a great many people were laughing and walking and paying visits and drinking a strong beer made from new rye.

To our door came three women . . . . The first was thinly clad, sick in the chest, horseless, husbandless, altogether miserably. No bread in her cupboard, indeed no cupboard or cover of any kind since she sold her house in Nadirjinka to keep herself, her old mother and her child alive. She has an armful of baby clothes under her thin coat. She wants to sell them; they are her last possessions. They were worn by three children who died of hunger last winter . . . . She drank our tea and ate our bread and went away. She was swollen and weary and had no place to lay her head. She was twenty-five but you would have taken her for fifty.

Before she had gone came another woman, slightly better dressed but with a distant look in her eye, as though she had been terribly hurt and driven close to the edge of her sanity. But she could tell a simple and connected story of a trip to Tashkent to get food for her family, of a husband and four children who died while she was away, of her empty house and not a pound of bread, of the loss of all her stock, of the last clothes sold for food. And there were no relatives in the village to help her and her friends had so little themselves. She, too, knew not where she was going or how she would live. She wanted nothing but the consideration of the Mission in making up its ration list for workers. She, too, drank our tea, ate our rye bread and went away.

Then came a third, weeping before she reached us, and eager to tell her story, more vocal than the other two. The same general sort of a story. No stock, hence no harvest, therefore no bread. Two children survived, husband died of the hunger. She knew both the other women by name and knew they were worse off than herself, but she too must have something to feed herself or she would soon die. She can do any kind of work—sew, knit, mend, weave, spin. She drinks three cups, eats enough bread to keep her alive till the next meal, whenever that may be, and goes away.

Three women came to the door of the Quaker outpost house because they were hungry, because it was a "big holiday," a Christian holiday and they have heard that the Quakers are a sort of religious people who do good work for those who are hungry and naked and downcast . . . . Three women would not be alive on Christmas, 1922, if the Quaker Mission were not on the hunger front in Buzuluk County, Russia.

EUROPEAN RELIEF AS A SAFEGUARD TO AMERICAN HEALTH.

Dr. Royal S. Copeland, Commissioner of Health of the City of New York, visited Europe last summer on a "health scouting trip." His observations are published in a recent issue of the "Weekly Bulletin of the Department of Health, City of New York." Through his professional eyes Commissioner Copeland sees the present need and suffering in Europe from a new angle—that of its relation to the health of the United States. Commissioner Copeland first visited Austria. He writes of that country:

"The whole population has been so long deprived of food essentials that its powers of resistance are a fraction of that which they should be. All Austria, already suffering dreadfully from disease, is ripe for a great epidemic. Austria is no longer a military threat against her neighbors, but she is a sanitary threat against the world."

Commissioner Copeland then visited Poland and inspected the devastated territory, and the points of admission through which the Polish refugees from Russia are returning to their native country. He says:

"Poland especially enchain my interest, for it too easily may become the source of the world's greatest sanitary catastrophe. Hundreds, even thousands, of sufferers from typhus, cholera, relapsing fever are passed through them (the unequipped admission points) and permitted to mingle freely with the people in the interior of Poland.

"Without the slightest hesitation, I predict that these diseases will sweep through Poland, Germany, Belgium, Holland and France into England. I predict that from every port in the great area whence sail ships, infection will be shipped to the United States unless without delay we take the lead in providing proper measures of precaution there in Poland."

In closing his report, Commissioner Copeland asks what sources of relief from this situation can be found. He says that there is little hope of relief from European governments at present or from the government of the United States.

"Therefore," he concludes, "the only hope that I can see is that private funds may be contributed. I can think of nothing more inspiring than giving now, directly for the protection of suffering Poland (and Austria), indirectly for the protection of our own nation, states, cities, homes, wives and children."

FRIENDLY NEWS NOTES.

BURLINGTON AND BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING.—Upwards of one hundred persons attended Burlington and Bucks Quarterly Meeting, held at Burlington, N. J., Eleventh Month 28th.

After a period of reverential silence prayer was offered, asking that we might know Truth.

There was a good degree of harmony in expressions of the eight Friends who spoke in the first session. The subject of Faith was treated to edification.

In the business meeting, the subjects of Race Relations and our duties in respect to Social Conditions in Community were interestingly treated by Esther Morton Smith and Anna Cope Evans.

Routine matters were cared for in a dignified manner; among other items of business, Rancocas Meeting was authorized to hold but two Preparative Meetings a year.

A number of members of the Yearly Meeting's Visitation Committee were present, some of whom were heard in the ministry. The meeting was a helpful occasion.

WE are glad to announce that, after tedious delays, Macmillans have published Amelia M. Gummere's new book, "John Woolman's Journal," and it is on sale at the Arch Street Book Store. The book contains about 660 pages, and is well illustrated.

It will be remembered that an excellent review of this outstanding Quaker book, by R. W. Kelsey, appeared in this journal a few weeks ago.

"CHRISTIAN LIFE, FAITH AND THOUGHT," that remarkable little book published by London Yearly Meeting last spring, is already in its second edition. American Friends promptly recognized the value of the book, so much so, that our Book Store made its seventh order for 200 copies; an eighth order sent a short time ago was for one thousand copies.

The London Friends' Council for International Service at a session last month as reported in The Friend (London) gave a cordial welcome to Agnes Tierney and Alfred, Eleanor and Philip Garrett, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who are visiting the Continent with a view to reporting on the best ways in which American Friends can co-operate in the permanent work of Friends in Europe. American Friends in different centres have heartily co-operated with the Council's workers where way opened, but the American Friends' Service Committee has, until recently, felt some hesitation in giving whole-hearted support to this service, as it was primarily concerned to carry on relief. Agnes Tierney spoke of the keen interest with which American Friends have been following the work of the Council on the Continent, and particularly the developments in Germany, where so many of their workers were engaged in the child feeding. Now that the American Friends' Service Committee has appointed a Message Committee under the chairmanship of Alfred Scattergood, who was in charge of the child-feeding scheme in Germany, it is the earnest desire of American Friends to further the work in every way that seems best. Alfred Garrett confirmed what was said by Agnes Tierney, and added that his was also a deep religious concern, and he was particularly interested in the various groups of people in Germany and elsewhere who are drawn to Friends. The cause of unity was one of his passions, and he longed that English and American Friends might labor together in this great work.

At the recent London Meeting for Sufferings, A. Neave Brayshaw presented Minutes from his home Meeting and Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting, liberating him for "religious service amongst Friends in and near Philadelphia and isolated groups in other districts." He said that, ever since his visit to America with J. Wilhelm Rowntree nearly twenty-four years ago, he had kept in touch with Friends there and informed of what was going on and had felt a desire to pay a second visit. He felt drawn to go before the war, but the way had not opened. Now he feels the call again, especially after hearing the accounts given by E. Maria Bishop and William Littleboy of their visits. He believed his service would be amongst Friends of a conservative type of mind, not specially amongst younger Friends, but all sorts. He hoped to visit the schools and colleges and generally to help Friends to understand and to gain from them an understanding of the place of Friends in the world. If the Meeting united in his concern he proposed to start the first week in the new year and hoped to be back in time for Yearly Meeting.

A VOTE was recently taken on the wet and dry question among the inmates of the prisons in the United States. More than 133,000 voted dry and only 900 voted wet, which shows some one says that even the lawbreaker is capable of right thinking and dreads the results of drink.

To make children familiar with the basis of all real and incontestable prosperity, the city of Wichita, Kansas, is establishing, in its environs, a 30-acre farm, on which High School pupils will be instructed in agriculture.

How many know that "Black Beauty" was written by a Quaker lady, Anna Sewell (1820-1877)? The book was published in our Centennial year and to date has reached a circulation of 3,000,000 copies in America alone. It is the most successful animal story ever written.

MARRIED.—Eleventh Month 18, 1922, at Cropwell Meeting House, N. J., JOSHUA R. EVENS and REBECCA EVANS, both of Marlton, N. J.

OUR GIFT.

At this time of the year the thoughts of every one are turned to giving. The wealthy give of their abundance, and the poor of their meagre stores, but the spirit of let-me-give-something reigns supreme. As is true of everything human, there are flaws in the working of even this spirit, for some of the giving is more a matter of the gratification of pride than the sincerity of love, and as might be expected, commercialism has long since stepped in to foster this wholly undesirable spirit. But where has commercialism not penetrated? Even the Gospel has been commercialized.

It is more than nineteen hundred years since God sent that first great, personal Gift, His Son. Because of His infinite love He gave of Himself, and by that gift He shared Himself with all men. Lest anyone forget that memorable day, or allow its significance to be dulled by time, custom has claimed its celebration and has gathered to itself from all countries, all the traditions that could possibly serve to keep alive, in every heart, all over the world, the spirit of giving. Though the outcome may appear on the surface rather boisterous and even superficial, at times, it is really, after all, an outlet for the expression of the joy of loving—of giving and sharing, and of being loved—of receiving. The little child learns the latter joy first, and then is guided into the former. And is this not typical of our spiritual life? For we, as children of our Heavenly Father, know first the joys of receiving His Gift, and that very Gift teaches us to love and to give of ourselves to those we love and to those who need us.

But what shall be our gift to God, our greatest Friend? Our gift to Him shall be a willingness to listen to His instructions, and obey them, and to love our neighbors as ourselves. In other words, our real gift, every year and throughout every year, shall be service, faithful service, acceptable to God. And although we join in the annual and outward commemoration of our Saviour's birth, yet every time we give ourselves to God's call, we live in the spirit of His Great Gift.—Let us give.

CHRISTMAS DAY AT ELLIS ISLAND.

Christmas! With the officials at the United States Immigration Station in New York, this day is bound to be one of more or less the same round of routine duties. But there are employees of twenty religious and social organizations of as many different creeds and platforms, all united and working together toward the one purpose of making "Merry Christmas" and "Joyous New Year," too, a real fact for the hundreds of incoming immigrants. For this is the season when, all over the country, churches, First-day schools and other organizations, public and private, are tacking the last piece of wood onto the barrel or box which is to represent them at Ellis Island on Christmas Day. Nor are these the only things which the expressman delivers. Now and then will come a little package, addressed in an uncertain childish scrawl, which may contain a cherished toy, or a pack of picture post cards, carefully pasted back to back so that there will be a picture on each side.

It makes very little difference on Christmas day whether Pedro or Adele or Guissepe have been detained in the "deferred and excluded" room as likely to become public charges in the United States, or whether they are waiting in the "T. D.," or room for the temporarily detained—hoping to be admitted the next day. The workers will see that they, as well as their children, receive as much real Christmas cheer as possible. There will be some families, which, on account of one or two members born outside the homeland and thus perhaps "over the quota," are facing separation. Within the next few days some of these people are looking forward to their long-awaited entrance into the United States, while others are facing the dismal prospect of deportation, when almost at their journey's end. But Christmas Day will be observed by all, each in his own fashion. Long days of confinement will be forgotten in the enjoyment of the food, clothing and toys sent by unknown hands anywhere from Seattle to Jacksonville. There will be plenty of work for those who open the packages, the boxes, and the barrels. Will they open yours?

It is very true that there are many fretful and much troubled people whose burden would be immediately lightened if they would take an additional load by sharing the burdens of others.—J. H. JOWETT.

THE WESTTOWN PRINCIPAL.

The search for a new Principal for Westtown offers an interesting commentary on the ambitions of Young Friends during the past twenty years, for it was in that period that the coming candidate was probably making a choice of his life work. Each year as a class graduated from the School boys went into college, into business, onto the farm. From college they went into business of various kinds. A pitiful minority elected the pursuit of art, literature or teaching. The bald fact faces us now; we have no young man in the teaching profession, ready and conspicuously appropriate for the position of Principal of our Yearly Meeting Boarding School.

It is not that there are no young men—there are fine, energetic, consecrated men who have done splendid things abroad, but they are essentially business men. We try to adapt ourselves to this condition by saying that Westtown needs a business man rather than a pedagogue at its head, that assistants can attend to the teaching.

The truth is we need neither a business man nor a teacher, but an executive. By executive we mean one who is more interested in the management of people than in the accumulation of wealth. A man who can manage men and women will draw around him a corps of teachers who can develop Westtown up to our best ideal for a Quaker school. He will create in the boys and girls a loyalty to the best traditions of the School. He will make the religious atmosphere pure and sincere. He can do this only by a deep sympathetic understanding of the personality of his pupils and his co-workers.

But where is the man? It has been apparent to us all in the past few months that he is not at our fingers' ends. And I think the reason is that during the past twenty or twenty-five years we have not considered school work seriously enough in thinking about what our work will be after college. Now is the time to begin training men for future vacancies so that we will not find ourselves twenty years from now floundering as we are this fall.

"FIRE AND CLAY."

In these days of change and reconstruction one feels very much like Alice, who after climbing through the Looking Glass, found herself continually going backward when she wished to go forward, and with her objective in plain view all the while, nevertheless, quite unable to break away from her starting-point. Racial conditions, politics, education and religion have all felt the need of a change—a new impetus toward an old goal, and of these perhaps the last has profited the least by the signs along life's road. Social workers are emphasizing the need of a more solid basis for working conditions, with employers and employed equally represented; politicians are beginning to realize (although still too dimly) that the mass of people expect to be represented by candidates who vote as they wish them to, and not by those who follow in the lead of a ring-boss. Educators have taken steps to develop throughout the public schools an educational system that will give boys and girls a well-balanced and sane start in life, morally, physically and mentally.

But what are the churches doing?

What are Friends doing to face these changing conditions, to climb to the top of the hill that lies before them?

Many times I have wondered in hearing of the slight increase in membership from one year to another, what it is that keeps our meetings from growing by tens rather than by ones. Could it be that our rather stringent lines of membership may have something to do with it? Although a birth-right member myself, and one brought up to feel that those not so born were decidedly outside the pale, I am yet inclined to believe that such ties can be not only cramping but really destructive of that quality which we prize most highly—religious freedom.

I was told once by someone who had looked into the matter, that a large percentage of those who left the Society of Friends affiliated themselves with the Catholics and vice versa, and my friend's reason (astounding to me) was, that though apparently as far apart as the poles, the two sects were much alike in their severe adherence to formalism. And after all what is birthright membership but a stricture on what should be open to all, bond or free?

Membership by conviction is a step in the right direction, for this at least entails thought and searching of soul,—but why not do away with any binding idea of membership, and let the Society of Friends as a title cover anyone that cares to worship with us, as we now worship. After all, what difference does it make to what group of serious-minded people we give our allegiance, when all are aiming toward the same point, and hold dear the same fundamental truths?

For what do creeds, laws or memberships count, if we can truly say:—

"If there be good in that I wrought,
Thy hand compell'd it, Master, Thine;
Where I have fail'd to meet Thy thought
I know, through Thee; the blame is mine.

"The depth and dream of my desire,
The bitter paths wherein I stray,
Thou knowest who hast made the Fire,
Thou knowest who hast made the Clay.

"Take not that vision from my ken;
O, whatso'er may spoil or speed,
Help me to need no aid from men,
That I may help such men as need!"

KATHARINE W. ELKINTON.

QUAKER IDEALS.

The Quaker conception of the home, the Quaker ideals in industry and Quaker aims in international politics were the three themes of the three speakers at a meeting held in the Broad Street Theatre, First-day afternoon, the 12th.

Dr. Henry T. Gillett, a practicing physician in Oxford, England, deplored the present social tendencies that disrupt the family unit. He was frank and direct in names, blaming prostitution, venereal disease and divorce for the havoc. On the other hand, the great constructive forces of religious conception of marriages, belief that men are temples of God, the attitude of genuine equality between men and women, these things would save civilization. To illustrate Friends' practices he recited the Quaker marriage ceremony; real wedlock depends upon a deep love and the discipline of self-forgetful devotion. Four definite social cures were suggested: (1) To teach sex hygiene to children; (2) To give religious training at home and at school—a great lack to-day; (3) To cultivate the ideal of selflessness; (4) and to abolish the extremes between wealth and poverty.

J. Rowntree Gillett, as a member of the British Labor Party, was well posted on Quaker ideals as they should apply to industry to-day. He compared the civilization of Western Europe with the life under the Cæsars, pointing out this close analogy that then men had lost faith in slavery as a social system, now men have lost faith in industrial capitalism. The heart has gone out of business. Hence it is only a question of time before the final crash. To comfort the alarmist, J. Rowntree Gillett insisted that such systems go on for long periods of time producing material things. But for permanence they must of necessity represent a spiritual purpose. In business the stress must be wrenched from gain and profits and fastened on service. A few instances where this shift is going on were cited. Philadelphia Friends will remember Seebohm Rowntree, who is striving to inject Quaker ideals into the chocolate industry. One will also recognize in the group thought of class betterment, reflected by some trade unions, an improvement over a mid-Victorian individualistic Christianity.

The State can do much to better malconditions by maintaining a sense of service to the community and restraining clever people from taking undue advantage of their fellows. But the State cannot do all. Society must introduce three definite correctives, a basic living wage, the value of human life compared with the cost of machinery, greater security for the worker, especially for the unemployed, if our world is to be a genuine democracy.

Dr. Jesse Holmes, as the third speaker, outlined the international relationships for which Friends strive. The full strain effort should be for creative life. This view is incompatible with notions of petty nationalism, squaring only with the broader vision of a real fraternity of mankind. Such internationalism must, however, be grounded upon the individual "imperative" within everyone, reflections of the supreme "imperative"—Jesus of Nazareth.

Dr. Holmes was quite unsparring in his criticism of present-day governmental tendencies in our own and other democracies. His particular plea was for intelligence and character on the part of officials supported by the intelligence and character of an able constituency. A rather large order for politics.

The Discipline was referred to as an excellent guide to nations, cautioning them "not to engage in business beyond their capacity to manage." Good advice not only to Quakers in Philadelphia, but also to Christians and Turks in the Near East. Again the speaker came back to the individual, urging all to appreciate that in addition to making a living, one must strive to make a Christian nation. H. W. E.

Adventures in South America.

TAKEN FROM THE LETTERS AND NOTEBOOKS OF A TRIP TO COLOMBIA.

Anne Walton Pennell.

ON THE TRAIL FROM CALI TO POPAYAN,
Sixth Month 3, 1922.

Yesterday we left the commercial city of Cali for Popayan, that ancient and romantic city of the South. Our mules had been sent on ahead in charge of our man and we took the railroad as far as it goes to the south, expecting to meet Luis at the little station of Aganche. He had not yet arrived when we descended from the train, but not long afterward our watchful eyes descried a string of seven mules, followed by the slender figure of a man, coming down the long hill above the station. It proved, as we hoped, to be Luis, and after eating lunch at the little inn, we buckled on our spurs for the long ride which ought to land us in Popayan by to-morrow at the latest.

F's mule is of medium size, dark brown in color with the most intelligent big brown eyes like a nice dog's. When we were making the purchase of animals he was the one I wanted. I liked the look of intelligence and humor in his eyes and somehow he seemed about my own size. I felt as though, if I should fall, there wouldn't be such a great distance to the ground. To my amazement all the muleteers insisted on a big, light brown beast to which I did not feel the slightest attraction. "Esta para la senora" (this one for the lady), they all said and, when I asked why, they answered, "Esta mas mansa, mas segura y mas fuerte" (this one more gentle, more sure-footed and more strong). After a little experience on the trail I see that they were right. My mule will patiently let me disentangle my foot from the high stirrup without stirring, when one step on his part would throw me over. He certainly has more trail sense than the others, and, if left to himself, will pick by a sort of instinct, the best of a bad road. F's mule on the contrary nearly always picks the worst trail and has to be pulled down bodily from slippery ridges where he might give his rider a nasty jolt if not a bad fall. Moreover he kicks on occasion. To-day F. got off to get some plants and his muleship decided that freedom was pleasant, so when F. approached to mount, he made a half circle with his left heel. Fortunately all he got for his pains was a crack from the botanical press which accidentally protected F. completely.

POPAYAN,
Sixth Month 8, 1922.

What a rare and pleasant thing it is to find a real place more wonderful than one's romantic dreams! I had set my heart on Popayan as the one part of this trip to enjoy the most. It was founded in 1536 by Belalcazar, one of Pizarro's comrades, who came north from Ecuador in search of El Dorado. Most of its settlers were Spanish emigrants of rank, whose descendants have made the city famous in Colombian history. Many of the presidents of Colombia and some of the most famous ones have been natives of Popayan. The city has sent to Bogota archbishops, legislators, historians, poets, scholars. The University of the Cauca, which claims to be the oldest in all South America, has given to the place an atmosphere of culture and learning. All this I had read in the books of travelers who had gone this way before us, and the accounts had set my imagination afire. I wanted to see this city that was so old and so isolated. Surely here would be preserved something, although in alien dress, of the life of our own ancestors before the days of railroads and autos and electric lights and subways. It would be like stepping back suddenly several hundred years. And the point on which I laid the most stress was that in all its history there had never been a wheeled vehicle in Popayan except a certain gilded coach belonging to a famous poet, in which I secretly hankered after a ride like Cinderella. Well, my dreams came true, all but the coach and, as the story of my discomfort if it can be called such, is rather amusing I'll tell you about it. My husband thinks it is somehow an excellent joke, but then husbands have such a queer sense of humor.

We had been riding since eight o'clock in the morning when about four o'clock in the afternoon it began to rain. We stopped at a little Indian posada, or native inn, to adjust our ponchos (ruanas, they call them here), and then rode on in the hope of reaching the city before dark, this being the third day on the trail from the end of the railroad at Aganche. Suddenly we found ourselves at the top of a steep hill. On the right side of the road was mud. On the left side were cobblestones. First we tried our mules on the cobbles, riding in zigzags to make the descent seem less steep. When even my mansa and segura animal slipped first with his forefeet and then with his hind feet and seemed about to pitch on his nose I tried the mud only to return in haste to the cobbles, for the mud was hopeless.

At last we all arrived at the foot of the hill. My husband, who was in the lead, pulled up and waited for me, and, as my mule came abreast of him, I saw—like a trick of the imagination—a shiny black automobile waiting at the little inn by the Cauca River. It seems that the governor had been officially notified of our coming and had brought the auto to meet us. F. says that I climbed right into the machine and that, judging from my smiles and the way I settled back against the cushions, there wasn't much doubt of my appreciation of the comforts of civilization. As far as the citizens of Popayan were concerned we found that modern comforts came at a high price. The eight or ten automobiles which the city now boasts were brought there in pieces on the backs of mules and were put together afterwards. Motoring, as you may imagine, is an expensive luxury and owning a private car is practically unheard of.

The governor established us in a comfortable suite of rooms in the ancient convent of El Carmen which we have entirely to ourselves. Our meals are served in the refectory with ceremony and usually consist of eight or ten courses. First comes papaya, a tropic fruit of the melon variety, or, as a special delicacy, the sweet cheremoya. Then follows a thin soup with rice in it, usually eaten with alligator pear. For the third course we may have calves' brains served on a shell or a slice of cold ham laid on lettuce leaves and covered with jelly. After that we probably have a meat course. Then we may have plain rice or rice and potato croquettes. Often the fifth course will consist of hard boiled eggs with cold cream sauce poured over them, or perhaps an omelet. The sixth course may be platano cake or fried bananas or pastry shells with olives and cheese. Custard follows, flavored with lemon or some strange tropic fruit extract. After a preserve so syrupy as to be almost candy we have coffee or chocolate and cheese. Twice a day we are fed thus heavily and for breakfast we have fruit, rolls, coffee with milk, and baked eggs. I understand now why the Mayo brothers are said to have made a special trip to South America to find out why they had so many cases of digestive troubles from these southern countries.

Our convent is a "casa alta" or "tall house," a building of two stories. The walls are whitewashed and the woodwork is painted a crushed strawberry color. All the houses down here have the doors and windows painted in pastel shades, soft blues, greens and pinks. The streets are a succession of white houses all built on the same architectural plan, some of them one-story high and others two stories like ours.

There is a certain restful monotony about the exteriors; but as you walk along the sidewalks nearly every portion or inner door is open and you catch glimpses of patios or open courts within. Every one is different. Sometimes it is a gorgeous macaw—scarlet, blue, green and yellow—that catches the eye as he swings on his perch. Sometimes a group of laughing children are playing in the arched corridors, and sometimes there is a fountain with cool sounds of falling water. Nearly always there is an orchid basket with pendant sprays of blossoms. Looking from the street down the dark entrance hallway into this sunny flower court makes every house to the passer-by seem a place of mysterious interest.

Our convent has three of these courts or patios, one behind the other, separated in each instance by a line of rooms and surrounded upstairs and downstairs by cloisters onto which the rooms open. The front patio has a pile or bathing pool sunk in the paved court among the roses and hibiscus. At any hour of the day or night you can hear the tinkle of the water as it falls from the side to the bottom of the pool. I love to take a cushion and sit in the shadowy cloister looking on the sunny patio and up to where the tower of the convent church with its three bells stands out white against the blue sky.

The Wampum Belt.

(FOR VERY LITTLE FOLK.)

How, How, How, How!

That, my dears, is Indian for "If you like." "Please do go on and tell us all about it!" Or "Do tell, do tell, do tell!"

You would grunt, too, if you were sitting on your legs in a large lodge covered with bark and half filled with the mingled smoke of pipes and a slow smudge of a fire. Remember, please, that you are a war party looking for scalps and the old man standing in the centre of the lodge is trying his best to dissuade you from killing his people. He is a very old and honorable chief of the Wyandots, so listen closely! Absolute silence except when you want to show your approval, then you can grunt How! How! How! How!

The old man is very much in earnest. He beats the pole of the lodge with his staff and with a pair of leather lungs proceeds to tell you some startling facts. How, How, How, How! "You call us women!"

"You say the Wyandots are old women. Good for nothing? Able only to kill deer in the forest and trap beavers in the stream?"

The passion in the old man's face turned his copper skin to a red purple and made his black bead eyes like two burning coals.

"Good for nothing but to kill beavers? I remember well when the Wyandots killed plenty of beavers. I was a boy then, now I am an old man, but if you don't believe me, oh Beavers of the Senecas, look at this belt!"

It is the custom, my dears, for important incidents in Indian history to be recorded in wampum. When a battle was fought or treaty of peace made, one tribe gave the other a belt of wampum shells. And this is exactly what had happened after the battle to which the old warrior referred. To prove his claim the Chief holds up a belt.

Note closely the belt the old man exhibits. One end of the belt is a beaver worked with purple beads in the wampum. This totem represents the tribe of Senecas just as the old man says. In the middle is a square standing on its point. This square with white beads inside of purple shells stands for the lodge or council house. On the left end is a turtle. The Wyandot chief who is speaking is a member of the turtle clan, the keepers of the tribal wampum amongst the Wyandots.

Now, my dears, if you will draw near, your uncle will show you the very belt about which the old chief was haranguing. The one and the same. Only then it was complete, fully ten inches wide and almost five feet long. Because of its size it was known as a platform belt, and because of its design it tells the story that the Wyandot sachem is trying to drill into the heads of his hearers.

He glares at the Seneca braves in true Indian style, describing with word and gesture how sixty years before a party of Senecas were discovered on Lake Erie by a war party of his own tribe. How the two flotillas of canoes drew near to each other, each group threatening the other. How the chief of the Senecas stood up in his canoe, crying in a loud voice that the Wyandots had no right on Lake Erie, and if they would go home and molest none their lives would be spared. Then the war chief of the Wyandots, according to the old man's tale, stood in his canoe declaring with equal vehemence that Lake Erie belonged to the Wyandots, and if the intruding Senecas would go home it would be well. Otherwise their blood would darken the bosom of Lake Erie. As neither party retired shots and arrows were exchanged with such deadly effect, by the Wyandots, that practically all of the Senecas were killed. This battle ended a feud of some fifty years. A treaty of peace was struck and certified by the belt, the same belt the old man exhibited, the same belt a part of which you now see.

You may well ask in what way this belt came to the family. You see the Senecas went back to their wigwams. The old chief died. Years rolled around and the Wyandots moved from the Detroit to the northern part of Ohio. Then the government of the United States decided to ship them to Indian territory about 1843. This was done, but bear in mind that all the tribal wampum was carefully kept by a custodian of the archives. Finally, an Indian, John W. Grey Eyes by name, was made custodian in the eighties, when your great grandfather was a young man. He gave the belt to a woman Friend from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Huldah Bonwell, who went amongst the Wyandots to help them. It was presented as distinct reward for such unselfish devotion, a great honor to a white. It is an easy step from Huldah Bonwell to your great grandfather in whose study it hung for years and a still easier step from him to grandfather and finally to your uncle. In genuine amazement you can grunt, How, How, How, How!

THE STARS.

O bright stars, twinkling from your dizzy height,
Come, tell me who you are, or whence you come,
For always, far o'er-head, your course you've run;
Untiring have you cheered men by your light.
You smile upon me, blinking not less bright
Tho' far away. When daily tasks are done
You whisper gently to me, all alone,
And fill my soul with holy peace, at night.
Are you, mysterious messengers of Heaven,
My guardian angels, in mercy to me given
To light me from what's sordid here below?
O tell me, sparkling ones, I fain would know.

YOUNG FRIENDS' EXECUTIVE BOARD.

The Executive Board of the Young Friends' Committee met on Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 1st. The Meeting was well attended, and the work before it was handled with interest on the part of all present. Reports were made by the different sub-committees, each one showing that its particular activities were receiving thought and attention. Some problems were brought before the meeting for solution, and were happily disposed of or set aside for further investigation.

Perhaps the most important action called for was the appointing of three delegates to represent Philadelphia Young Friends on a Conference Committee, which is to come together, composed of delegates from the six eastern Yearly Meetings, to plan and launch forth an eastern Young Friends' Conference. This conference is being looked forward to by many Young Friends in the East, who are perhaps not able to attend the Richmond Conference, and it is earnestly hoped that our Conference, held in or near Philadelphia, may give us all of the wonderful inspiration, and enduring strength and enlarging of spiritual sight, that those who have attended Richmond Conference have received there, without in any sense being in opposition to Richmond, which is in full accord with our desire to find here in the East, what Richmond so adequately gives in the middle West. In contemplating the task before the Committee, which is to hold its first meeting very shortly, we know that it will be one needing much prayerful thought and consecration, and our hearts go out in loving encouragement and support to them. To return to our Executive Meeting.

A very interesting letter from English Young Friends was read. It was an appeal for a tightening of the links of friendship, and sympathy in aim and ideal, which already bind us so closely; a desire that we get to know each other better and more personally. It told of the anticipated visit of a group of Young Friends, some of whom are to visit Richmond Conference, and others to remain long enough to visit our colleges. We were most glad to receive the letter and the good news it contained, and our Secretary had already speeded off to them an answer which said just the things we all would want to say in reply to such a splendid communication. This visit of English Young Friends will be another pleasant occurrence for us all to look forward to in the coming year. Then came a letter from the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's Social Order Committee, desiring the co-operation of Young Friends, and wishing to know in what way Young Friends wished to co-operate. The Meeting decided that Young Friends certainly wished to share in the interests and work of the Social Order Committee, and it felt that this could be better accomplished by individual Young Friends working in the already established channels of the different sub-committees of the Social Order Committee, rather than by appointing a special Young Friends' Social Order Committee. Young Friends please observe!

The last item on the list was a little more difficult to deal with. It was the question of Frederick Libby's appeal to Young Friends to help him in collecting funds and working locally in behalf of his work. While Young Friends feel that Frederick Libby is doing a great work, perhaps the greatest that is being done for peace in this country, and that he is consecrating his life's energy to it, and is therefore deserving of our hearty support, in whatever way we can give it, there is a little unclearness as to the reasons for the action and opinions of the older Friends, and as we do not all desire to work against their, undoubtedly, well founded conclusions, though we may not at the present time understand them, we decided to postpone the question, and in the meantime make further investigations as to how matters stand. We feel that it is an urgent question, and are most anxious that it may be settled to the satisfaction of all, and to the good of that cause which comes to us with such significance at this season, Peace on Earth, Goodwill to Men.

NOTES.

A YOUNG FRIENDS' CHRISTMAS PARTY will be held at 20 S. Twelfth Street, on Sixth-day Twelfth Month 29, 1922. We expect to have supper together, then Christmas Carols, followed by a short address by Rowntree Gillett.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' THANKSGIVING PARTY was held by invitation at the home of Lydia E. Morris, Olney, Pa., on Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 1st, 1922. Nearly 60 Young Friends enjoyed a jolly evening in the large home. After a sandwich supper the evening was spent in playing games and singing.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE of the Young Friends' Committee met together on Sixth-day, Twelfth Month 8, 1922, to solve its world-wide problems, in which its members are so greatly interested. It was decided that a Christmas greeting be sent to groups of Young Friends in Germany. Children's Missionary Bands were discussed and put aside for investigation and further report. How best to meet with, and make contact with, and give invitations to, foreign students at the International House was another question. Plans were made and the Committee is preparing to work on them, we trust, with good results to be reported later. Other matters were attended to in the sessions of nearly one hour and a half, and then the meeting adjourned to partake of supper and discussion of a lighter vein.

THE FINANCE COMMITTEE has held two supper meetings during the last two weeks in order that the reports might be received of the contributions which are being asked for at this time. The Committee feels cheered by the cordial response which has been given to the request for funds.

THE EXTENSION COMMITTEE met on Twelfth Month 4, 1922, to talk over the possibilities of helping small groups of Young Friends. The Committee Meeting proved very worth while, as the members went over the list of all our Meetings. This group is also interested in the college meetings and isolated Young Friends.

THE EDITORIAL COMMITTEE has been meeting too—as is evidenced by the very fact of this number—but the real interest of its members is a joy to all concerned.

One evening lately, your Editors met with their Elder Editors in a cosy little tea-room for supper and the evening. As we talked over the things we hoped THE FRIEND might accomplish, we rejoiced that we were working together to try to make our paper helpful—stressing both the inspirational aspect and the opportunity to express the thought of the younger members of our Society.

En Route to Germany.

LETTER III.

PARIS, Eleventh Month 12th.

DEAR FRIENDS:—

As we plan to leave Paris for Germany on Third-day morning, I will begin this letter following up our experiences here.

As I said before, Bertram Pickard, of the London Yearly Meeting Peace Society, Carl Heath and John Fletcher came here to meet with different French organizations that are working for international understanding and peace and to present to them the Quaker idea of peace as a way of life that must inevitably lead to right human relationships. "Wear thy sword as long as thou canst," they would say to France and to every nation, but meantime seek earnestly the way, which when found will make the wearing impossible.

On the afternoon of the 8th, the three English Friends and I repaired to the house of M. Le Foyer, a member of the French Parliament and President of the Council of the "Union Populaire" for Universal Peace. There we met several other officers of the Union and Vera Starkoff, a Tolstoyan pacifist. Carl Heath presented the Quaker view of pacifism and said that the object of the present visit was not only to present their own views, but to hear the views of others and to understand the difficulties in the way of the peace movement in France. M. Le Foyer pointed out the terrible difficulties that stand in the way of a young man's taking the absolutist stand in France. If he refuses the eighteen months' military training, which every youth must take when he is eighteen, the penalty is twenty years' imprisonment, which he would probably have to spend in a criminal colony in Algiers. Should he be able to evade the draft for a time he could not possibly get employment, for every young man must present, when he seeks employment, a paper stating that he has fulfilled the military requirements. M. Le Foyer believes that the only way to work for peace in France is to try to get these harsh laws changed, not to counsel young men to defy the law.

M. Valfort, Secretary of the Union, asked Carl Heath, Bertram Pickard, John Fletcher and me to lunch with him the next day, and Vera Starkoff asked us to tea the day after that. After the lunch with our genial host, John Fletcher and I came back to the Britannique, and joining Alfred Garrett, who had almost recovered from his severe cold, set out to keep an appointment which J. F. had made with Pastor Monod of the great family of Monod in the Protestant church of France. It was he who with Deissmann of Germany and our own William I. Hull, had been able to draw up a paper on peace that was accepted by the greatly divided Christian International at Copenhagen last Eighth Month. It was specially interesting to Alfred Garrett to make the visit, because he and Monod had been at Northfield together thirty-two years ago. As I find just here that Alfred is writing an account of this visit I will not enlarge on it. A deeply sensitive nature, "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," bearing the burdens of others beyond his strength, he seemed to us.

From there we went to the home of Mme. Duchene, a member of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. There we met Mme. Jouve, the Secretary of the League in France, and Mlle. Pottecher-Arnaud, how spoke with Gertrud Baer and an English woman at a League meeting in Philadelphia last year. She is starting a French branch of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. There was also present Louise Beachboard, who was Secretary of the W. I. L. P. F., Pennsylvania Branch, last year. She has her children in school here. I met her first in Paris at the meeting for worship last First-day.

In the evening I went with an English Friend to the home of M. and Mme. Puecha. He is Secretary of the Carnegie Foundation and editor of a periodical called "Peace by Law," and she is Secretary of the French League of Nations Union. Their apartment on the sixth floor offers a wonderful view of Paris. They are delightful people. Before her marriage she was professor of modern languages in the University of Montreal and had attended a modern language convention in Philadelphia. They have both visited America together since the war. They asked me to write for their periodical an article on the sentiment for peace in Germany, since they want to do everything they can to promote better relations between the two countries. He was in the front line during the war. I look with awe at such men thinking how much they have seen and suffered.

Seventh-day was Armistice Day. We went out to see the ceremonies for the dead. The Champs-Elysee was crowded to watch the procession. First came a small company of cavalry and soldiers in uniform—a worn and battered looking group. Then the endless procession in civilian dress, often with their families, those who had been demobilized, most of whom, it seemed to us, were maimed, halt or blind. A pitiful sight. France calls out our deepest compassion, for she has lost her best and is suffering from neurosis, brought on by grief and fear. One of the almost unbearable sights at the grave of the unknown soldier under the Arc was the forest of furred flags. Each flag carried by a soldier represented a regiment that had been entirely wiped out in the war.

In the afternoon we attended a meeting of the Union Populaire with M. Le Foyer in the chair. Just before it Carl Heath had spoken to an audience of five hundred at the Faubourg, a sort of forum for the discussion of public questions. At the Union Carl Heath spoke in French as usual. The Chairman then called for an American and I was pushed forward. M. Valfort translated for those who couldn't understand English. An Italian gentleman spoke forcibly in French, making a strong plea for disarmament. Late in the hour Professor Gide from the Sorbonne came in with a German editor from Berlin. They were received with applause. The editor spoke and then followed a lively discussion on the reparations, but without evident ill-feeling on either side. It was all very interesting. I am surprised to find how well I can follow the course of a discussion in French, although I miss fine points. I can understand every word Carl Heath says, because he speaks slowly. I can also carry on limited conversations on peace, because the vocabulary is so familiar.

This morning (First-day) there was a meeting for worship of thirty-five in the Embassy room. It was crowded to the door. There is great need of larger quarters for the Embassy. Many people would attend who shrink from coming to a room two flights up in a hotel. Adjoining the hotel on the ground floor is a store-house, consisting of several rooms, one of which would hold seventy or eighty people. It would cost about $700 to make it suitable for Embassy headquarters and about $700 a year to maintain. Mark Hayler says it could be almost, if not quite, self-sustaining. A Friends' book-store and a room in which to display needlework from the devastated regions would add to the income. Such a place in the very heart of Paris could be a centre only of beneficent influence. Even now, scarcely a day passes without a number of French people coming to inquire of Friends' work and principles. There were a number of students present this morning. Many more could probably be reached if quarters were more accessible and conspicuous.

13th.—Last evening a group of us met four young men representing four international organizations of young people whose object is to work for peace. Their appeal, signed by all four organizations, contains the following:—

"War is absurd, it enfeebles the conqueror as well as the conquered. War is immoral, it assures the triumph of force, but not of justice. War is inhuman, it obliges brothers to kill one another."

"In the name of justice, in the name of humanity, in the name of your country (la Patrie) itself, come work with us for the disarmament of hate and the advent of universal brotherhood."

If this great company of young people could have a deeper faith which would lead them to refuse to engage even in a defensive war, they would be more sure to stand firm when the test came.

Sincerely yours,
AGNES L. TIERNEY.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE STORY OF THE GOLDEN-CROWNED KINGLETS.

ALFRED C. GARRETT.

Now as the grey of morning began to show, the father dipped downward in his flight, when, coming out of the mist, oh! terror!—there lay beneath them, almost a mile below, nothing but the open ocean! Far as eye could see to the rim of the world on every side not a sign of land! And he could now see that the storm-wind was hurrying them still farther onward. It was impossible to turn back; they could never fight against that cruel wind; and soon he knew there lay almost certain death before them. As they came a little lower, the children began to ask to be taken down to rest and feed; but all of them before long had to understand that they were lost. The father and mother cheered them on as best they could to keep flying still; the children cried and pleaded for rest and food. After an hour or two they said they could fly no longer; they must go to sleep; their wings would not work much more. At last the smallest one began to fail. As he fell out of the flock, the others said, "See, our little brother has fallen asleep just while he was flying," or "I wonder if he is going all the way down; he will have a good, long rest." They tried to keep with him; but he fell so fast they had to give it up, and soon they could not even see him any more. Long after he was lost to their sight he dropped upon the sea, and like a little grey snowflake seemed to melt into the raging crest of one of those monstrous mid-ocean waves.

Before long, all at about the same time, the survivors of the little flock saw where a great ocean steamship was plunging along ten miles or more away. They began to bend every nerve to fly to it. In the last heart-breaking struggle they became separated; one other little one fell into the sea, and the poor mother felt that they were all scattered, and could never reach the ship, and would never meet again.

Now it happened that afternoon that our party of human travelers were pacing the deck of that same great ocean steamer; and we saw the sad little wanderers of the air reach the ship in safety! A number of birds of various kinds were brought to us by the northern storm. Among them I recognized the shrill "chirr" of the kinglet of our native woods. There they were, the tired little mites, fluttering around under the life-boats. We must have seemed like great giants to them, but they were too tired to care, and one by one they were captured by the sailors. Two of them—I think they must have been the father and mother birds—were taken into the handsome "Winter Garden," and put together among the ferns, and there the passengers saw them showing every sign of joy at meeting once again—fluttering together and billing like little lovers, reunited when they thought they were parted forever. Late in the evening, above the music of the orchestra, I heard the sweet "chirr-chirr-chirr" of their note, and knew that though wearied near to death, they were resting there together.

Finally, all the birds were gathered in a conservatory of flowers, and again there was a faint but joyous reunion; for the three children had been brought in too; and they fluttered before their parents, asking for food, as they had done on the fir-tree in their mountain home. But, alas, there was no food—scarcely an insect on the ship, and their poor parents too tired to search among the flowers. All of them were far too exhausted, and now that the great struggle was past, their life-force began to ebb. That afternoon one by one the children fell asleep, and by evening their mother, too. Next morning we saw the row of silent little forms, and the lonely father looking at them now and then as he feebly hopped about still trying to find for them a little food. The morning after that when we inquired the steward said the other birds seemed well, but the last of the kinglets had died that morning.

And so we stood before the five little dead bodies, each with its golden crown of courage and of martyrdom, and we thought of the awful experience they had been through and were now at rest. And we thought, too, of their warm and sunny mountain home in the sweet-scented spruce tree far away,—while around us roared the cold and cruel and terrible ocean still.

A VERY INTERNATIONAL SERVICE.—Under the above title the Manchester Guardian of Ninth Month 14th, published the following paragraph in its London Letter. The Friend whose correspondence is quoted is Joan Mary Fry, who recently returned to Berlin.

"Evidence of the truly international nature of the work being carried on by the Friends' Council for International Service at its 'Quaker Embassy' in Berlin is provided in a letter from one of the workers there. Here English, Irish and American Friends are working side by side with German Quakers, and in one afternoon the visitors included two parties of English people, a well-known Oxford don, an American from the United States student body on the look-out for two students to take back with him who could give first-hand information of conditions in Germany, and then a Rumanian living in Czernowicz, who had heard of the Friends and wanted to find out more about them.

"Next came a Korean, a student at Glasgow, who was occupying his vacation in Germany in learning the language, and with him an Indian on his way back to India, whose aim on his return was to help his fellow-countrymen, especially students, to get out of a too narrow nationalism and alleviate the distress in other countries.

"Shortly afterwards these were followed by a Polish lady, a Chinese student, who asked to 'be treated as your own child, because I know nobody but myself in Berlin,' and an Englishman, who handed over to the work the price of an aeroplane flight round Berlin, which he had offered to a German friend but which the latter pleaded might be handed to the Friends instead.

"The writer concludes: 'I sometimes feel that the contrast between the luxury on the one hand and the real state of the majority of the nation is unendurable. I have just finished supper with Frau ———, her two school-girl daughters, and a young student. There were potatoes and cauliflower, with some kind of sauce, and some pears and plums as a second course, but no bread. This is what thousands of cultured people in Germany have to be satisfied with.'"

QUAKERISM AND THE SPIRIT OF ADVENTURE.—The spirit of adventure is inherent in all boys, most girls, and even exists in some of those who have passed the rubicon. Apologists for War frequently insist that a pacifist nation would be a "soft" nation, from which the spirit of adventure had been squeezed out. Pacifism, if it were the negative thing which militarists attack, would deserve no quarter, but pacifism is but one facet of a many-sided religion; it does not conflict with the hundred and one other facets, but is complementary to them. Christianity has had its share of heroes, adventurers of the spirit, who needed a courage and a faith no less thrilling than the courage and faith which lead men to take up arms. The spirit which inspired David Livingstone when he faced incredible hardships and won a path through the heart of Africa, which seized Jeanne d'Arc, the little peasant girl of Domremy, and held her loyal through trials of almost unimaginable severity, which prompted Penn and was the mainstay of Columbus—this spirit is not dead today and should not go unrecorded.

Edward Thomas, an American Friend, is anxious that the adventures of Friends engaged in relief work should not be lost, but should be recorded as an inspiration to others. He puts forward his concern in the following words:—

"My concern arises from the fact that Christianity is an adventurous religion, that adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man is a foundation stone of Quakerism, and that in our highly organized civilization people looking for adventure cannot find it offered to them by most of the denominations or in industrial life.

"The Friends have such stories of present-day work, but in this country of widely-scattered people they must be printed to reach those who are to be inspired by them.

"Some of us are greatly concerned lest the peace movement and the relief work of the Society of Friends should gradually die out. The obvious remedy is the publication of large numbers of stories teaching the meaning of adventurous belief in the brotherhood of man. These must be put out while the Relief Work is still in full swing if they are to be read. Can you send us some?"

Will any of our workers who have experiences to relate, in which either they or their fellow-workers, have had a share, communicate direct with Edward Thomas, 841, West End Avenue, New York City?

Reconciling Influences Between American and German Churches.

[Reference has been made in numerous periodicals during the past few months to the meeting last Seventh Month of the Executive Committee of the Federated Churches. The article which we give below may have been sent to many of the Friends' periodicals; it has, we know, appeared in at least one of them. We print it because it throws some light on questions and conditions which deeply concern all who feel that no real and permanent advancement can be made toward a world peace until the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the spirit of truth and love, has become the moving power in the lives of men and nations.—Eds.]

"Forgetting the things which are behind, and pressing forward to the things which are before" are words indicating the central idea underlying two recent events of large significance in the relation of the American Churches with the Churches of the lands from which they were formerly separated by the vicissitudes of war. One of these events was the reception of Dr. Georg Michaelis, formerly Chancellor of Germany, as a guest at last summer's meeting of the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Chancellor Michaelis is President of the Student Christian Federation of Germany, and it was in this connection that he was especially welcomed. In addressing the representatives of the thirty denominations which constitute the Federal Council of Churches, he spoke in part as follows:—

"I appreciate more than I can say the warmth of your greetings to me and the privilege of meeting with the representatives of the Christian forces of America. It will be a source of great encouragement to the Christians of Germany to know that we can join together in facing the future.

"We are living in Germany in a very hard time. The situation appears to us very dark—so dark that I do not know what I shall find when I get back home after an absence of nearly six months. There are those who feel that the worst period for Germany has only just begun.

"I have just come from an International Conference in China—the meeting of the World Student Christian Federation which brought together representatives of the Christian forces from all over the world; thirty-three nations in all, representing all races. This meeting gave me an insight into the possibility of fellowship of the Christian Churches of all nations, and made me feel that the great hope for the future lies in the development of this spirit of unity."

Robert E. Speer, who presided at the meeting, responded to Dr. Michaelis' address and in behalf of the Churches of America welcomed the co-operation of the German Churches in working together for the building of a better world. He said in part:—

"The divisions between nations and races cannot be argued away; they have to be lived away. It is in our common efforts to work out the Christian ideal in the life of the world today that we find the one influence which can break through racial and national differences. The spirit of fellowship represented within this room is an evidence of the larger unity that is still possible. Here in the Federal Council of the Churches we see the marks of the healing of a former war which divided our own nation, for the representatives of both the Northern and Southern States are here, at one in their loyalty to their common Lord and in the task of winning the world to Him. There are also here the representatives of both the white and negro races. If there can be developed such a spirit of unity as we now have within the Church, we need not doubt that it is possible to secure a unity which shall take in all nations and all races of the world. We hope that this meeting is only an indication of the reconciling influences that are now at work between the Churches of America and the Churches of Germany, and that we shall be able to co-operate in the future in the great tasks which require the full strength of the Christian forces of all lands."

At the same meeting of the Federal Council, an official message was received from the newly-formed German Evangelical Church Federation in response to the message of goodwill authorized by the Executive Committee of the Federal Council at its meeting last winter. The message from the German Churches, giving interesting sidelights on the present situation, reads in part as follows:—

"Dear Brothers in Christ:—

"On Ascension Day, 1922, at the grave of Martin Luther in Wittenberg, the city of the Reformation, the document creating the German Evangelical Church Federation was solemnly signed. Thereby the task which was begun in 1919 and 1921 in the Church Conferences at Dresden and Stuttgart has been completed. Thereby the wish of German Evangelical Christianity, which recognized the seriousness of the present hour and which sought to clasp hands in united service of the heavenly King, has been fulfilled. We pray that God may bless our work and that through it we may have added faith and brotherly love manifested among us. Several weeks ago before the days of federation, the German Evangelical Church Committee received your message which you kindly sent to the Christian Churches of Germany, and which, at your suggestion, was graciously delivered by Professor Deissmann. The significance of this message seemed to call for a postponement of an answer until a reply could be sent under the name of the new Church Federation itself. We heartily thank you for the friendly expression of your readiness to enter into a relation of economical co-operation with the German Churches. We are certain that the mutual contact of our two great federations can become a blessing for the whole of Christendom. With heartfelt thankfulness we have noted during the past years that streams of brotherly helpfulness have flowed into our land not only from the National Lutheran Council and other Lutherans, but also from prominent churches of the Federal Council.

"The only hope for a torn world is that all nations may bow under the mind and will of the Prince of Peace, Jesus Christ, our universal Lord and Saviour. You will understand, honored Sirs and Brothers, if we for truth's sake sincerely acknowledge that under the pressure of our present conditions we look to the future with heavy hearts.

"Our nation laid down its arms upon the reliance of a peace of justice and co-operation. As these promises have been fulfilled, it is difficult for us to realize that the war is over. For we are still under the sway of unfriendly forces, both in other lands and at home. The German is still considerably outlawed and even German missionaries are excluded from the fields of their blessed labors in the Kingdom of God. Under the pressure of unbearable burdens placed upon us the best element of our nation suffers most, especially that part upon which our Churches depend. The anxious care for daily bread has a destructive effect upon the moral elasticity and the cheerfulness of faith of hundreds of thousands. The impudent luxury of a small number of profiteers is only a special sign of our moral need.

"With you we are convinced that the outer and inner burdens which cause our nation and other nations to sigh have their roots in the fact that the Spirit of Jesus Christ, the Spirit of truth and love, has not become the moving power in the lives of men and nations. Thus we consider this time of darkness in which we find ourselves as an urgent call of God to the hearts of all people to seek with renewed earnestness that which serves the peace of the world. We are convinced that all the Christian Churches should follow this call of God in the spirit of brotherliness and truth by unitedly seeking to uplift the life of mankind with the renewing power of the Gospel."

IN THE ARTS AND CRAFTS SHOP AT VIENNA.

There is a long queue standing in the hall of Singerstrasse 16, on Third and Sixth-days, and the room in which the Society of Friends receives, judges and distributes the work of this department is crowded to the full.

It is a heterogeneous collection of people waiting there, but the common bond between them is that of a poverty which fights courageously against almost overwhelming difficulties.

A blind orphan girl, Fr. S., is standing at the counter,—a thin, anæmic child of about 17. She lives in a home for the blind, paying 20,000 Kr. monthly for her board and lodging and sleeping in a room with 20 other girls. The sitting-room of the home has been unheated until the first of Eleventh Month, and her apology for bringing back her orders so slowly is that her hands are always too stiff and cold to knit quickly. But the woolen jumper and the children's dresses are finished at last and the money she receives for them will at least assure her board and lodging and a pair of shoes this month.

The wife of General A., stands next with a bundle of embroidered underwear and ivory carvings; the former her own work, the latter made by her husband, who now works in a factory from 7 in the morning until 6 in the evening, and then adds to the family income by carving hat pins, umbrella handles, bell-pushes, watch-hangers and belt-buckles.

An old man brings a box of little toys. It is the Baron S., who now devotes his time to carving and painting quaint wooden character figures—they are really delightful both in their humor and delicate workmanship. Poverty has also driven the Baronin B. to turning her artistic talent to batique work, excellent jumpers, and very original pyjamas.

Quite at the back of the room, too shy to present herself until the last possible moment, is Fraulein S., very tall, very thin, very nervous, with angular, stooping shoulders and weak ankles, and clad always in a long, narrow, brown ulster. She is utterly dependent on what she can earn by making silk underclothing, but wrapped in her bundle is a small antique, the property of a starving artist friend in Munich, and which she is trying to sell for him.

They work for others, nearly all these people; in their own need they are always willing to try and help others, and any help given to this department of the Society of Friends through buying the work produced there is in no sense charity. It is a practical method of assisting a talented class of people to organize themselves into a self-supporting body, useful both to itself and to other countries who need the results of their labors.

ETHEL COOPER.

FROM DUGOUT TO NEW HOME IN EIGHT MONTHS.

It is sometimes said that to contribute to European relief is to "pour money into a sieve." Such is not the case with Friends' work in Poland. The following paragraphs, taken from the report of one of the Quaker workers, show that Friends' Service is not merely relieving the suffering of the refugees, but is enabling them to begin life on a self-supporting basis within a remarkably short time:

"A very poor family returned from Russia in the autumn of 1921. They lived in a dugout and potatoes were the only food that they had tasted during the winter. I visited the family in Fourth Month and decided that the spring crop must reconstruct their lives. The mother came three times to ask for horses to plough the land. When our column reached her village the controller ploughed two morgs of land for her. A week later she received 8 puds of oats to seed the desolate.

"The land was of a fine quality and yielded over 100 puds of oats in return. Besides, the family received a number of garden tools in the fields for the neighbors and together earned a substantial sum. To seed the fall rye crop the family no longer asked for Mission help in ploughing their field, but were able to pay their neighbor to do the ploughing. Later they were able to buy a sheep and horse from the Mission. Now they are hauling timber to build a new house. Not all is the material help received, for they have worked very diligently since the Mission offered to start them, but without this stimulation they might have got no further than during the previous seven months.

"About 100 families have received help from the Mission in this district, and there are a great many who have progressed equally well as the family mentioned above."

NOTES FROM THE SERVICE FIELD.

REPORTS from the Polish Mission covering Ninth and Tenth Months, 1922, tell of a successful conclusion of the fall plowing by the Mission plowing columns. Between Ninth Month 7th and Eleventh Month 4th the columns plowed approximately 2283 acres for 1734 families in 108 different villages. The outpost at Holoby is now closing down, as the peasants in that section are well on their feet again. Twelve hundred and sixty-eight acres were put under cultivation during the summer, while in the Bruganski district 1900 acres were plowed for nearly 3,000 families.

In conjunction with the fall plowing, rye was distributed to the peasants for fall sowing. At the conclusion of the plowing many of the Mission horses were sold at nominal rates to poor peasants who were without stock and had not sufficient means to purchase any at the regular market rates.

THE Polish Mission is hoping to secure several portable motor-run saws in order to help cut up the lumber that the horses are hauling for housing reconstruction. Possessing only primitive tools, the peasants mill their lumber very slowly, while many refugee families have lost their men members and so have great difficulty in getting the sawing done. With mechanical saws, under the direction of Mission workers, it will be possible to saw in a day more than a Polish peasant could saw in weeks.

HOME industry work continues to help the peasants to support themselves while they are getting repatriated. At the Kobryn and Horodec outposts, members of 1020 families are spinning, weaving or embroidering for the Mission.

THE reports from Vienna indicate that during Ninth and Tenth Months 406 cows were imported by the Mission and sold to various institutions. These institutions are to pay for them in milk, which will in turn be used for relief purposes.

DURING the Tenth Month the total amount of milk distributed by the Vienna Mission was 154,420 litres a day. During the month the Mission began supplying half a litre of fresh milk daily to the groups who had hitherto been given dried or condensed milk. These include 2,000 tubercular patients, 500 children under six in particularly needy families, and 500 other children being cared for under the Mission's "Adoption scheme."

THE report of the Middle-Class Department for the same period says: "The outlook for the professional and salaried classes this winter is going to be very difficult. Owing to the reduction of government personnel demanded by the League of Nations, there is sure to be a large number of state officials dismissed and unable to get other work. The first great demand has been for food, and so we are giving tickets to the municipal 'communal kitchens,' where a daily hot meal can be obtained more cheaply than food packets can be made up and cooked."

THE Old Age Department distributed food, or meal tickets, to about 400 cases during Tenth Month. Coal is being sent to about 100 different persons who are sick or only poor—250 kilos to each household. "It is not much, but it will give them a fire in their room and be a little comfort."

SHIPMENTS received during week ending Twelfth Month 9, 1922—84 boxes and packages; 6 anonymous.
Contributions received for week ending Twelfth Month 11, 1922—$13,920.42.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL NOTES.—Through the kindness of Maria C. Scattergood, the school has received a copy of the portfolio of paintings by Violet Oakley "The Holy Experiment." It is a gift which is much appreciated.

Work on the erection of the Home Economics building is progressing rapidly, the fine weather of the fall having been a helpful factor. The brickwork of the wall has now been carried well above the first story, and it is hoped that this will be completed before extreme cold weather, so as to permit work on the interior to go forward without interruption.

At the invitation of Henry W. Leeds, boys from a distance who were unable to go home for the Thanksgiving recess spent the week-end at Atlantic City, at Haddon Hall.

Though the records are not yet wholly complete, it appears that there are one hundred and seventy-two former students at Westtown now in attendance at various colleges and universities. Fifty different institutions are represented, the most distant ones being the Universities of California, Oxford, England, and Toulouse, France. Mary F. Wildman, '18, who is at Toulouse, graduated last year from Leland Stanford University, and was awarded an honor scholarship for study abroad. The numbers at some of the colleges are as follows:—Haverford, 20; University of Pennsylvania, 18; Bryn Mawr, 4; Penn State, 6; Mt. Holyoke, 11; Wellesley, 8; Earlham, 30; Harvard, 4; Cornell, 4.

At the Winter Exhibit at the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia, there are two pictures by George Gillett Whitney, head of our Art Department,—one, a pen and ink sketch of the Westtown Farm House, the other a water color, made as illustration for a book of Fairy Tales.

The Senior Class has elected William B. Test as Valedictorian and Mary R. Worth as Historian. Carroll T. Brown was chosen as Honorary Member.

The World To-morrow for Eleventh Month is the second strong Peace number of this excellent review. An exchange says: "If we want Peace more than Oil, or Coal, or Foreign Concessions, or Spheres of Influence, we need to read these contributions by prominent and well-informed people, among them William I. Hull and Henry T. Hodgkin and others well known to Friends."

WHITTIER's letters to Elizabeth Lloyd of Philadelphia, written 1850-63, have been recently issued from the press of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The book is peculiarly chaste and characteristic of all that the public knows of this good man. The edition is limited to 635, and only a portion of these will be offered for sale, the price being $5.00 a copy.

CROSSING THE LINE.

"The wave is breaking on the shore,
The echo fading from the chime;
Again the shadow passes o'er
The dial-plate of Time."

There are many experiences of life which become dulled by repetition, but probably no one of us passes from one year to another, from the "old" to the "new" without a moment of serious thought.

The boundaries may be less sharply defined than once they were, it is true.

On the maps of the little geography books we studied as children, each State was colored differently, and thereby entirely separated from every other State. So that we could understand why a small boy, being called upon to admire the beautiful country, said in disappointment, "But on my map Maine was pink!" And I well remember when my father first pointed out to me a State "line." Only a stone in a field! I had expected something like the great wall of China!

"It was a childish ignorance." And yet have we not all had some such conception of the marked days of our lives? How they have loomed up before us! The first day at school, the college commencement, coming of age, choosing a career, marriage, motherhood. They stand before us like mountain peaks on the horizon, these great days. When we reach that elevation, we shall be different, shall we not? greater, stronger, truer to the highest that is in us? The wonderful day comes, passes, and how often we become conscious of the old weakness, the same shortcomings. The line is crossed, but we are not really changed.

Yet, when "the year lies white in the distance, like snow, that no step has marred," the old hope stirs again within us. The New Year holiday is perhaps the least spoiled of any which comes in the season's round. We are reminded everywhere in this paper how "Love Came Down at Christmas," and helped to place the right emphasis on the Christmas season.

An uncultured but earnest Christian minister, preaching his "Thanksgiving sermon" this year, used the story of the ten men, cleansed of leprosy, and our Saviour's question, "Where are the nine?" to illustrate what may still be the proportion of the truly thankful hearts, to those who forget to "give glory to God," when our national holiday reminds us of this duty.

But, if gratitude marks Thanksgiving, and love "comes down at Christmas," surely hope is with us when the New Year opens its portals.

Long ago a young girl put into crude verse her New Year hopes, and perhaps the sincerity of the sentiment excuses the faulty lines—

"O let us do the thing we would be doing,
And let us be the thing we fain would be,
In the new paths still higher aims pursuing,
To nobler destiny.

"Let it be now! Real work, not idle scheming,
The grand life-story, truly, plainly told,
Then blessed days shall come, as in our dreaming,
When this New Year is old."

CHRISTIANITY AND INDUSTRY.

"Jesus' denunciation of the Pharisees could have been edited by a committee of ministers so as to have been made entirely unoffensive," said Bishop Francis J. McConnell in his address at Friends' Select School on Eleventh Month 24th.

The church is sometimes urged to stick to general principles. When we do this nobody makes the application. It is the concrete application which drives the subject home and which hurts.

Bishop McConnell told of visiting a silk mill in Shanghai on his recent trip to China. There he saw an eight-year old girl moistening cocoons with her hands in water that would scald one of us. She worked thirteen hours a day with no time off at noon, but could eat her lunch as she stood at her work. Her wages were seven to ten cents per day, and the mill paid 100 per cent. profit on the English and American capital invested.

This story was told to illustrate Bishop McConnell's meaning when he said that the missionary to-day is blocked by the glaring contrast between the teaching and life of the missionary and the aggressiveness of western capitalism.

The church is told not to criticize industrial or political conditions, unless it can propose a solution. "That is the business of the technical engineers," said Bishop McConnell. The church can see the social results of a given condition and has a duty to call attention to it.

It is admitted that the twelve-hour day still exists in the steel industry. It is admitted that the spy system exists. The engineers of industry will find the way to remove these evils as they did the dangerous stove in the railway cars when our enlightened conscience demands it.

We cannot get rid of war and leave out the economic causes of war. No young men in the United States would volunteer for war in Mexico for oil; but the treasures in oil are the economic cause that puts us in constant danger of a war with Mexico. American missionaries can do nothing in Mexico because of the standing contradiction to their teaching in the fact that the United States army may at any time swoop down across the border.

Bishop McConnell said that the personal and social gospel must go along together. He recognized that the "radical" groups are ahead of the church at many points, and pleaded for a recognition of the light which they see.

J. B. WALTON.

"Love Came Down at Christmas."

Albert D. Belden.

What is the supreme fact about Christmas? What is its first and last message to mankind?

It is not enough to reply, as some might do, the Incarnation—the entry of God into flesh. The wonder of Christmas is not complete until there bursts upon one's soul the deeper fact that the God, thus incarnated, is Pure and Perfect Love.

The Incarnation might have been the world's despair had it brought into evidence a God of different character. A God of Hate or Indifference thus revealed would have meant the final breaking of human faith. What made the Incarnation the World's Hope was the character of Love that stood revealed as the truth about God. The splendor of Christmas is focussed here, as Christina Rossetti discovered,

"Love came down at Christmas,
Love all lovely, love Divine,
Love was born at Christmas,
Star and Angels gave the sign."

This is the true, the fundamental Gospel—the character of God as Love. The Gospel, as Jesus Himself described it when He began His preaching ministry, is "the Gospel of God." This is the only salvation there is—to know what God is really like and to become like Him. "This is life eternal—to know Thee." It is this tremendous achievement which calls for all the solemn array of events known as the Incarnation, Ministry, Atonement and Resurrection. These are not in themselves the Gospel, they are the great means whereby the Good News became available for humanity—the Incarnation bringing to us the Revealer; the Ministry unfolding His Revelation; the Atonement clearing away the great obstacles of Sin; and the Resurrection setting the seal of Universal Power to the witness of the Revealer.

Man has no greater need than this Gospel. He must at all costs know that God is Love or his life is hopelessly impoverished. In no other way than by the overwhelming conviction of Love as Divine can Love become the character of humanity and the principle of human society. Man must worship before he can become. In all he does, he works consciously or unconsciously to a model. He is incorrigibly imitative and he fashions himself individually and at last socially according to the object of his most constant regard, his real worship. In the absence of the highest object of worship he gravitates downwards like a stone, towards his lower and more selfish instincts. The old classic instance of the Israelites slipping back to the worship of the golden calf as they grew tired of waiting for the return of their prophet-leader, is typical of the fatal ease with which slackness in the worship of the true and only God betrays humanity into the worship that degrades and destroys.

There is only one salvation for humanity, and it comes by the most intense conviction that God is in Christ and that God is therefore Love.

Such a conviction cannot be spun simply from the filmy threads of human desire and imagination. It can be produced only by a Love which is a living reality. No exaltation of Love merely as a virtue, impersonal and theoretical, can command the obedience of the soul in the fierce emergencies of life. The aspect of such love is too cold and distant and lifeless. Love to have real power with mankind must be seen, real and vivid in One who is Himself faced by the tests of life. Love to dominate life must come to life as itself alive.

Love to dominate humanity must come to man as itself human.

If God's Love were left at what we might call the "guessing" level of human apprehension—if it were only a great and beautiful human idea without any special confirmation from the World beyond humanity, would not the resources of our faith be most seriously reduced—robbed of a decisive factor?

Life imposes an ever-increasing test upon human faith and it is doubtful if our faith could stand that test at all were it not for the glowing possibility held out by the Christian Gospel—that God has spoken the truth about Himself in a unique and indisputable manner.

When one considers the strain of life and the urgency of man's need to know that truth, it seems the most reasonable thing that could possibly happen that God should utter Himself in this Living Word, giving to human faith a mighty guarantee with which to counter all the tragedy of our common experience. The incredible thing would be that God should not long since have sent forth into this world, so oppressed by hate, so hungry for love, a Voice unmistakably His own, crying,

"O heart I made, a heart beats here."

In that subtle and convincing argument for faith, "Bishop Blougram's Apology," Browning expresses something of this incredibility.

"This good God—what He could do if He would,
Would, if He could—then must have done long since:
If so, when, where, and how? some way must be,—
Once feel about, and soon or late you hit
Some sense, in which it might be, after all.
Why not, 'The Way, the Truth, the Life?'"

That inspired artist G. F. Watts entitles one of his pictures, "Love Steering the Barque of Humanity." It is a strenuous presentation of man's ultimate dependence upon Love. There he is in his little vessel, bending to the oars, every muscle astring and almost at the point of exhaustion. The sail is blown about the mast in confusion, the seas are hurling themselves to the skies. It is a picture of dire and imminent calamity. But one figure redeems it—all—Love, beautiful, just as strenuous as man, but full of an inviolable calm, is holding the rudder in firm grasp and guiding the vessel through the storm. This is the truth that dawned upon the world on the first Christmas morning.

Is it any wonder then that Christmas witnesses a great revival of human friendliness year by year? It is our great annual festival of love, and it becomes that the more surely and the more freshly as we get back to that central scene with which it all began.
